The policy of the Administration having been ently epitomized and promulgated anew by the ghest officer of the government, it has struck us at its character may be best illustrated by con-ast; just as an unskilful architect is best discred-ed by erecting a shapely edifice beside his mis-roportioned structure. After deciding to adopt is method, we were somewhat at a loss, from the ct that no statement of our own would carry that eight of authority which could entitle it to be nsidered as an exposition of Democratic doctrine orthy to be set in contrast with a manifesto from ie President of the United States. Our National onvention has not yet spoken; and of the emi-ent statesmen of the party some, like ex-Presi-ent PIERCE, Mr. GUTHRIE, and Mr. CUSHING, ave made no public utterances since the outbreak f the war; while others, like Governor SEYMOUR nd our ablest members of Congress, have gone ito these subjects with a copiousness of argument nd a force of just invective, which renders it diffi-ult to extract a compendious statement of Demo-ratic policy, without, on the one hand, a compres-ion which would do injustice to their eloquence, r, on the other, a profusion which would exceed ur limits. Besides, among the expounders of the Democratic faith there are some divergencies of

"To whom it may Concern."

It is impossible to overrate the importance of President LINCOLN'S letter to the Niagara commissioners. It is a public announcement by the Chief Magistrate of the nation that he has abandoned, finally, all pretence or appearance of waging a constitutional war for the restoration of the territorial integrity of the Union, and the supremacy of its fundamental laws; and an open declaration that hereafter it shall be waged for the destruction of slavery. His policy has long tended in this direction, but he has concealed its real purport by double-faced acts and specious language. He has looked one way and rowed another. Now he avows his purpose. Now he declares his long-concealed policy. He has been assiduously prostituting the war for the Union into a war for the abolition of slavery. Now he avows this prostitution, and glories in it.

MR. LINCOLN did not write his "To whom it may concern" letter without a purpose. He is a buffoon, but he is no fool. His purpose was a personal one. It was to recover the radical vote and support in time for the next November election. The radicals have distrusted him. The most honest and sincere anti-slavery men among them have long had no confidence in Mr. LINCOLN'S moral integrity, and therefore no confidence in his avowals of anti-slavery sentiments. They have there opinion not quite consistent with that harmony of impression which would best contribute to concerted action.

In view of these circumstances, it has seemed to us that a succinct and satisfactory statement of the Democratic policy could be more easily selected from the writings of General McClellan than from any other source not requiring abridgment to bring it within a moderate compass, or a balancing of different authorities to render it acceptable to the whole party. A noted French critic of the last century propounded a theory of beauty, which, whatever its merits, will serve us a good turn for illustration. This critic, who was Secretary to the Academy, held that beauty consisted in the mean or average of all things of the same kind. A beautiful human face, for example, was a face neither too long nor too short, neither too smooth in its outline nor too sharp, neither too fixed nor too mobile; a face, in short, which bore a nearer resemblance to all other human faces than they bear to each other, as if nature, in fashioning the others, had shot all around the mark, and in this alone had exactly hit it. This theory of beauty is like what we call common sense, the rarest and the most readily appreciated of all mental endowments. He who possesses it will always find his opinion agreeing more nearly with that of every man in the company, than the other opinions do with one another. So it has struck us that a collection of the purely political passages in General McClellan's orders, etc., would form an exposition of the Democratic policy which hits it so exactly in the middle as to show to the party the mark at which all other expounders have been aiming; some with nearly equal skill, some with less.

This eminent citizen and soldier having been selected by the Administration for the peculiar object of its hostility and venom, as signalized by more than two years of persistent persecution, the Democratic party naturally recognizes merit deemed by Mr. Lincoln so dangerous to his pretensions. Besides, the relations which General McClellan has, by his profession, held to the war, and his fidelity to Democratic principles, have placed him in a stand-point favorable for judging of the conjoint bearing of political and military considerations, neither of which can be omitted in a just estimate of public affairs when the country is engaged in a great war. Touching upon these subjects only in the way of statement, without argumentative expansion, the soldier-like directness of General McClellan's style secures the brevity we were in quest of when the idea of this selection occurred to us. We begin with the earliest of General McClellan's manifestoes, to show that neither complaisance towards the Administration in the beginning, nor a sense of its subsequent injustice has had the slightest influence on his opinions, which are the evident fruit of a clear head, a magnanimous spirit, and great rectitude of understanding. The following is from his Address to the people of Western Virginia when he crossed into their State, in the spring of 1861: —

The general government has heretofore carefully abstained from sending troops across the Ohio, or even from posting them along its banks, although frequently urged by many of your prominent citizens to do so. It determined to await the result of the State election, desirous that no one might be able to say that the slightest effort had been made from this side to influence the free expression of your opinions, although the many agencies brought to bear upon you by the rebels were well known.

The Republican Convention at Chicago, whi nominated Mr. Lincoln, passed this resolution:

Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rig of the States, and especially the right of each State order and control its own domestic institutions accor ing to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to th balance of power on which the perfection and endura of our political fabric depend, and we denounce the la less invasion by armed force of the soil of any State territory, no matter under what pretext, as among t gravest of crimes.

In his Niagara letter, Mr. Lincoln declares th the control over the domestic institutions of t States, confirmed to them in our Constitution an in the Confederate Constitution not less explicitl shall be assumed by "an authority that can contr the armies now at war against the United States, and transferred to him who now controls the a mies and navies of the United States, and tha otherwise he will not listen to overtures of peace.

I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfer with the institution of slavery in the States where i exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, an I have no inclination to do so. I now reiterate thes sentiments, and in doing so I only press upon the pub lic attention the most conclusive evidence of which th case is susceptible that the property, peace, and securit of no section are to be in any wise endangered by th now incoming administration.

Mr. Lincoln now justifies the rebels in disbelieving these solemn asseverations, by proving that they were false. He now does what he then declared he had no lawful right to do, and, for the sake of reëlection, confesses the inclination which he then disavowed.

In his first message to Congress, at the extra session in the summer of 1861, Mr. Lincoln said:

Lest there be some uneasiness in the minds of candid men as to what is to be the course of the government toward the Southern States after the rebellion shall have been suppressed, the executive deems it proper to say it will be his purpose then, as ever, to be guided by the Constitution and the laws; and that he probably will have no different understanding of the powers and duties of the Federal Government rela-ances, that the great mass of the people of Western irginia are true and loyal to that beneficent govern-ent under which we and our forefathers have lived so ng. As soon as the result of the election was known, traitors commenced their work of destruction. The

It is proper to state that the italics in this and following extracts are a liberty which we have ken with the original. We desire, by this means, fix attention on the idea, so often insisted upon General McClellan, that the war should be so nducted as to foster whatever of loyal sentiment mained in the South, and to interpose no needless obstacles to the resumption of fraternal relations at its close. It stands to common sense that e Union, even if it could be restored, would be he political passages in these exhibit the steadiss of purpose with which he carried out his ideas.

To General Halleck:

In regard to the political conduct of affairs you will ease labor to impress upon the inhabitants of Mis-uri and the adjacent States, that we are fighting solely r the integrity of the Union, to uphold the power of r national government, and to restore to the nation the essings of peace and good order.

To General Buell:

And it is absolutely necessary that we shall hold all e State of Kentucky; not only that, but that the ma- rity of its inhabitants shall be warmly in favor of our use, it being that which best subserves their interests.
is possible that the conduct of our political affairs in entucky is more important than that of our military perations. I certainly cannot overestimate the imortance of the former. You will please constantly bear mind the precise issue for which we are fighting—hat issue is the preservation of the Union and the res-oration of the authority of the general government ver all portions of our territory. We shall most readily uppress this rebellion, and restore the authority of the overnment by religiously respecting the constitutional ights of all. I know that I express the feelings and pinions of the President when I say that we are fight-ng only to preserve the integrity of the Union and the onstitutional authority of the general government.
The inhabitants of Kentucky may rely upon it that heir domestic institutions will in no manner be interfered with, and that they will receive at our hands every constitutional protection. I have only to repeat that ou will, in all respects, carefully regard the local institutions of the region in which you command, allow-ng nothing but the dictates of military necessity to ause you to depart from the spirit of these instructions.

To General Buell again:

In regard to political matters, bear in mind that we are fighting only to preserve the integrity of the Union, and to uphold the general government; as far as military necessity will permit, religiously respect the constitutional rights of all. Preserve the strictest discipline among the troops, and while employing the utmost energy in military movements, be careful so to treat the unarmed inhabitants as to contract, not widen, the breach existing between us and the rebels. I mean by this, that it is the desire of the government to avoid

tively to the rights of the States and the people, under the Constitution, than that expressed in the inaugural address. He desires to preserve the government that it may be administered for all, as it was administered by the men who made it. Loyal citizens everywhere have the right to claim this of their government, and the government has no right to withhold or neglect it. It is not perceived that, in giving it, there is any coercion, any conquest, or any subjugation, in any just sense of those terms.

Now, avowing that the abandonment of slavery shall precede the acceptance of overtures of peace, Mr. Lincoln's message can be interpreted only as the confession that he is doing what "loyal citizens" have a right to protest against his doing, and what he violates the Constitution and the laws of the United States in doing.

In August, 1862, Mr. Lincoln wrote to Mr. Greeley:—

My paramount object is to save the Union, and not either save or destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it; if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the colored race, I do because I believe it helps to save the Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do dot believe it would help to save the Union. I shall do less whenever I shall believe that what I am doing hurts the cause; and I shall do more whenever I believe doing more will help the cause.

Mr. Lincoln's last letter to Mr. Greeley declares two objects of the war, without which it shall not cease, "the integrity of the whole Union, and the abandonment of slavery." He does not base the latter upon the former, as effect upon cause. Each is the coequal and coördinate of the other. His paramount object is not now to "save the Union, and either to save or destroy slavery." He avows openly that slavery must be destroyed as well as the Union saved. The salvation of the Union is not even professed to be the exclusive and paramount object.

That hereafter, as heretofore, the war will be prosecuted for the object of practically restoring the constitutional relation between the United States and each of the States and the people thereof, in which States that relation is or may be suspended or disturbed.

Mr. Lincoln now avows that hereafter the war shall be prosecuted for the object of practically compelling "the abandonment of slavery," even after the integrity of the Union may be restored, for even the Chicago platform declared that in a "constitutional relation," freedom was national and slavery sectional, and even Mr. Lincoln will not pretend that to compel "the abandonment of slavery" is to "restore the constitutional relation between the United States and each of the States and the people thereof."

On December 12, 1862, Mr. Lincoln wrote to the Hon. Fernando Wood:—

Understanding the phrase in the paragraph above quoted, "the Southern States would send representatives to the next Congress," to be substantially the same as that "the people of the Southern States would cease resistance, and would reinaugurate, submit to, and maintain the national authority within the limits of such States, under the Constitution of the United States,"—I say that in such case the war should cease on the part of the United States; and that, if within a reasonable time "a full and general amnesty" were necessary to such end, it would not be withheld.

At the very first overture of peace from any people of the Southern States, Mr. Lincoln is now so unnecessary irritation by causeless arrests and persecution of individuals. Where there is good reason to believe that persons are actually giving aid, comfort, or information to the enemy, it is, of course, necessary to arrest them; but I have always found it is the tendency of subordinates to make vexatious arrests on mere suspicion. You will find it well to direct that no arrests shall be made except by your order, or that of your generals, unless in extraordinary cases, always holding the party making the arrest responsible for the propriety of his course. It should be our constant aim to make it apparent to all that their property, their comfort, and their personal safety, will be best preserved by adhering to the cause of the Union.

It is apparent in the persistent earnestness of these inculcations, that the ideas with which General McClellan had entered on his brilliant campaign in Western Virginia, were deeply rooted convictions. It is also apparent from intimations in these extracts, that he had (or thought that he had) the concurrence and approval of the President. When he had discovered that the constitutionalism with which Mr. Lincoln had professed to begin his administration was like the morning cloud or the early dew, he sent to him the urgent representations contained in the well-known letter from Harrison's Landing. We insert an extract:

This rebellion has assumed the character of war; as such it should be regarded; and it should be conducted upon the highest principles known to Christian civilization. It should not be a war looking to the subjugation of the people of any State in any event. It should not be at all a war upon populations, but against armed forces and political organizations. Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organization of States nor forcible abolition of slavery, should be contemplated for a moment. In prosecuting the war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject only to the necessity of military operations. All private property taken for military use should be paid or receipted for; pillage and waste should be treated as high crimes; all unnecessary trespass sternly prohibited, and offensive demeanor by the military towards citizens promptly rebuked. Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist, and oaths not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. Military government should be confined to the preservation of public order and the protection of political rights. Military power should not be allowed to interfere with the relations of servitude, either by supporting or impairing the authority of the master, except for suppressing disorder, as in other cases. Slaves contraband under the act of Congress seeking military protection, should receive it. The right of the government to appropriate permanently to its own service claims to slave labor, should be asserted, and the right of the owner to compensation therefor should be recognized.

We will bring these extracts to a conclusion by inserting passages from recent popular addresses on occasions which permitted only incidental allusions to politics.

From the West Point oration: —

It [the Constitution] was accepted as giving us a form of government under which the nation might live happily and prosper, so long as the people should continue to be influenced by the same sentiments which actuated those who formed it; and which would not be liable to destruction from internal causes, so long as the people preserved the recollection of the miseries and calamities which led to its adoption. Under this beneficial Constitution the progress of the nation was unsurpassed in history. The rights and liberties of its citizens were secured at home and abroad; vast territories were rescued from the control of the savage and wild beasts, and added to the domain of the Union and civilization. The arts, the sciences, and commerce grew apace; our flag floated upon every sea, and we took our place among the great nations of the earth. But under this smooth surface of prosperity upon which we glided swiftly, with all the sails set before the common breeze, dangerous reefs were hidden, which now and then caused ripples upon the surface, and made far from being inclined to a full and general a nesty that he imposes a new and impossible co dition of peace. An impossible condition, we sa not merely because it is impossible for us with our armies to compel the abandonment of slave but because it is much worse than impossible those who "control the armies now at war" wi us to assume to themselves and then transfer Mr. Lincoln the control of a subject over whi neither of them has the least authority either the federal or rebel constitutions. Instead of th professed approval of an amnesty, he now spur the very first lispings of peace.

A little more than a year ago Mr. Linco seized the occasion of the meeting of the Repub can Convention at Springfield to declare himse still more emphatically than ever, as waging t war exclusively to save the Union. He had be charged with waging it for abolition purposes, a his reply was: —

You say you will not fight to free negroes. Some them seem willing to fight for you. But no matte fight you then exclusively to save the Union. I issue the proclamation on purpose to aid you in saving t Union. Whenever you shall have conquered all resis ance to the Union, if I shall urge you to continue figh ing, it will be an apt time then for you to declare yo will not fight to free negroes.

President Lincoln has now justified the declara tion that the Northern people will not fight to fre negroes. He makes abolition the yoke-fellow o Union, and does urge the continuance of fightin for other purposes than the only one which i lawful or attainable. He thus falsifies ever pledge, disregards every declaration, and violate his official oath.

Collate this "To whom it may concern" lette with Mr. Lincoln's past declarations and avowals and it will be difficult to restrain within decorou language the sense of moral indignation whic arises in contemplating its unblushing and shame less perjury. Lighter terms do not fit. His firs official act was an oath, a solemn oath, calculated to bind the conscience of an honorable man and restrain the acts of a dishonorable one. Many times has Mr. Lincoln violated his oath. Let the political causists defend him. Now he violates his oath openly and publishes his shame. His own words in past time, denying to himself any such purpose as he is now accomplishing, are all that is necessary to convict him of perjury. Other commentary is needless. Political opponents can afford to be dumb. Out of his own mouth is the President condemned. He has again and again disclaimed that the object of the war was abolition; he has again and again characterized such a prostitution of the war for the Union as lawless and wicked; he has accepted the pledges of his party, whose platform disavowed any such purpose in its creed or hopes as abolition by the Federal Government; to his party, to the public, to Congress, he has reiterated these disavowals, to foreign nations, by the pen of his Secretary of State, he has declared the same thing, branded such a purpose as unconstitutional, and declared its impossibility of accomplishment, even if united in by Congress, the people, and the executive, for the reason that judicial authority would be interposed to prevent it.

Said Mr. Seward, in the well-known Dayton letter: —

It is hardly necessary to add to this incontestable statement [that the rights of the States and the condition of every human being in them would remain the he same elements of discord, sectional prejudices, rests, and institutions which had rendered the nation of the Constitution so difficult, threatened e than once to destroy it. But for a long time the ion was so fortunate as to possess a series of politi- leaders, who to the highest abilities united the e spirit of conciliation which animated the founders this republic, and thus for many years the threat- d evils were averted. Time, and the long continu- e of good fortune, obliterated the recollection of the mities of years preceding the adoption of the Con- ution. They forget that conciliation, common inter- t, and mutual charity, had been the foundation, and st be the support, of our government and all the rela- ns of life. At length men appeared with abuse, sec- nal and personal prejudices, and interests outweigh- all considerations of the general good. Extremists one section furnished the occasion, eagerly seized as pretext by equally extreme men in the other, for ndoning the pacific remedies afforded by the Consti- ion. Stripped of all sophistry and side issues, the ect cause of the war, as it presented itself to the nest and patriotic citizens of the North, was simply s: —

Certain States, or rather a portion of the inhabitants certain States, feared, or professed to fear that in- ry would result to their rights and property from the vation of a particular party to power. Although the nstitution and the actual condition of the govern- nt provided them with a peaceable and sure protec- n against the apprehended evil, they prepared to ek security in the destruction of the government hich could protect them, and in the use of force ainst National troops holding a National fortress. efface the insult offered to our flag, to save ourselves om the fate of the divided Republics of Italy and outh America; to preserve our government from de- ruction; to enforce its just power and laws; to main- in our very existence as a nation, — these were the uses which impelled us to draw the sword. Rebellion ainst a government like ours, which contains within self the means of self-adjustment and a pacific remedy r evils, should never be confounded with a revolution ainst despotic power, which refuses redress of wrongs. ich a rebellion cannot be justified upon ethical grounds, d the only alternative for our choice are its suppres- on or the destruction of our nationality.

I am confident that you will never consent willingly be citizens of a divided and degraded nation; but at you will so support the action of your fellow-coun- ymen in the field, that we shall be victorious, and gain have peace and a re-united country; when the earts of the North and the South shall again beat in nison, as they did in the good old times of the Revolu- ion; when our Union and Constitution shall be as firm s the mountains which encircle this lovely lake, and he future of the Republic shall be as serene and pure s the waters of Horican when no breeze ripples its urface.

We find that we have only space to add that if here has been made, during this war, any exposi- ion of Democratic doctrine more consistent with tself, more statesmanlike in conception, or more ikely to command the universal assent of conser- ative men, than this which we have now laid be- ore our readers, it has not been our good fortune o meet it.

same, the rebellion succeeding or failing] the further fact that the new President, as well as the citizens through whose suffrage he has come into the administration, has always repudiated all designs whatever and wherever imputed to him and them of disturbing the system of slavery as it is existing under the Constitution and the laws. The case, however, would not be fully presented if I were to omit to say that any such effort on his part would be unconstitutional, and all his actions in that direction would be prevented by the judicial authority, even though they were assented to by Congress and the people.

Could language be more explicit? Yet compare this with Mr. Lincoln's Niagara letter. He does thus interfere with slavery. He persists in keeping thirty millions of people at war rather than listen to an overture of peace in which the abandonment of slavery is not the key-note, and yet has thus publicly and officially avowed, over and over again, his repudiation of purposes now disclosed, and the lawless character of acts now boldly done.

The coup d'état does not show a more shocking political immorality. Other Presidents have been inconsistent, contradictory, and illogical. Mr. Lincoln is the first President who has dared to do that which, when charged upon him, he had before repudiated, branded as lawless, as a perjury, and as a crime. Louis Napoleon shed some blood to get power, violated some oaths, broke some pledges. But he broke not half so many as Abraham Lincoln has confessedly broken, and where the present Emperor shed rills of blood the present President will pour rivers, if thirty millions of people are to be kept waging the bloodiest and most gigantic of the world's civil wars until the South surrenders its property, its prejudices, and its local self-government.

That we approve the determination of the government of the United States not to compromise with rebels, or to offer any terms of peace except such as may be based upon an unconditional surrender of their hostility, and a return to their first allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States; and that we call upon the government to maintain their position and to prosecute the war with the utmost possible vigor to the complete suppression of the rebellion, in full reliance upon the self-sacrificing patriotism, the heroic valor, and the undying devotion of the American people to their country and its free institutions.

Even the Convention "of office-holders and contractors," as they were dubbed by one of his own organs; even the men of corruption and of shoddy who renominated Mr. Lincoln, made but one condition to peace — "the unconditional surrender of hostility," which can only mean the restoration of the authority and integrity of the Union. To this single condition Mr. Lincoln subjoins "the abandonment of slavery." And the Times, his own organ, confesses that the people will not sustain him in demanding that ultimatum. Indeed, they will not. What right has the President to plant an insurmountable barrier in the paths of peace?

BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

FELLOW-CITIZENS: — I do not love the oors of political discussion. But the crisis of nation has been reached in which no man n be neutral. The differences between po- ical parties are so broad and so fundamental, at there is no middle ground on which hesita- on or doubt can linger. Believing that I ve no right to be silent, I propose now to dress you upon the situation of the country, d the duties of the hour.

And first, let me express my cordial sym- athy in the sentiment of enthusiastic approval hich has universally greeted the name of the outhful patriot, soldier, and statesman selected bear our standard in the great civil contest hich is to decide the fate of the republic. In eorge B. McClellan we find the noblest combi- ation of the qualities demanded by the alarm- ig crisis in which the country is placed. As soldier, I consider him immeasurably first mong those who have led our armies in this nhappy and deplorable civil war. I would ot tarnish a single one of the laurels earned y other commanders in the field. But the blest of them must yield to him in genius for upreme command in military combinations, in he comprehensive survey of great campaigns, nd, above all, in the qualities which endear him to armies, and inspire in them courage, en- ergy, and hope.

If, therefore, a wise conciliation and prudent statesmanship shall fail to accomplish the object supremely desired by every patriotic heart, to whom can we most safely entrust the power of the nation? If after more than three years of desolating and fruitless war; if, after peaceful effort shall be exhausted, it shall be necessary once more for the Government to exert its military power, once more to clothe itself in the thunders and panoply of war, to whom can the nation more wisely entrust the command of its fleets and armies than to the humane and Christian hero who twice saved its capital from destruction, and whose conquering march to the capital of the enemy was only arrested by the political hate and fanatical passions which preferred humiliation and defeat to victory under his banner?

But, fellow-citizens, military glories have in them little which can dazzle my vision. I admit that in great national exigencies wars may be justified, after all the instrumentalities of peace have been tried; but I abhor them in the depths of my soul. And I am thankful to the Great Giver of all mercies that in this terrible struggle, which has caused a shudder throughout the civilized world, there is no stain of blood upon my hands. I am grateful to Him that I can look back at the origin, the commencement, and the progress of this war — which I think is the most shocking in the history of nations — without a sense of personal guilt for the unspeakable desolation it has caused. I would not for an empire, nay, I would not for whatever of felicity and power this world contains, be a sharer in that incredible folly, fanaticism, and wickedness which excited and provoked this fearful contest, and which have prolonged the bloody and desolating struggle by arousing a resistance sustained by the energies of despair, and by every motive which can animate the hearts and nerve the arms of men.

I therefore infinitely prefer to present our candidate for the suffrage of the American people, not as a military hero, but as a statesman who grasps the political not less than the military situation; as a civilian accomplished in knowledge, as a patriot who not only understands but loves the institutions of his country;

as a Christian gentleman of pure and spotless character, upon whose record there is no stain or reproach. So far as the thoughts and wishes of any human being can be known to others, we know it to be his passionate desire to see the laws of this country peacefully obeyed throughout its whole extent, and all the States once more bound together in fraternal Union, based upon the proper sovereignty and equal rights of each one of them. This great purpose of his soul breathes in the varied productions of his pen, with which you are familiar. It shines conspicuously in the fervid burning patriotism of his letter from Harrison's Landing, written in the midst of perils which threatened his destruction. And need I refer to that noble letter of acceptance, that chaste and beautiful exposition of his principles, which has been received by the acclamations of a people, which, like the blast of a trumpet, has awakened the echoes of the hills, the mountains, and the valleys of our country? We proudly present him to you, fellow-citizens, not merely as the able soldier and consummate military commander, but as a patriot of unalterable devotion to the Union which you love. We present him, above all, as the statesman endowed with the exact comprehension of the nature of our government and the political situation of the country, without which the terrible agencies of war are powerless to save the union of the States, or preserve society from the fathomless gulf of anarchy to which it is rapidly tending.

Fellow-citizens: I have no blind devotion to any political party; but wherever free institutions exist, party names and organizations are a necessity of human nature and human society. A nation is now to be saved or lost, and the peace of thirty millions of people is to be restored or forever destroyed by the influence and action of one party or another upon the theories and practices of government in this country. In a crisis of such fearful import, while truth and candor should be observed, the utmost freedom and latitude of discussion are both a duty and a right.

I speak first of the Democratic party. It has proclaimed as the first and fundamental article in its creed the Federal Union of all the States. The great national council at Chicago, speaking in its name, and by its authority, has declared that in all circumstances, and under all conditions in the future, as in the past, we adhere "with unswerving fidelity" to the national Union. Such a declaration, coming from the assembled Democracy of the nation, and approved by all the enlightened conservatism of the country, has no doubtful meaning. It means the Union of the States under the limitations of a written constitution or compact, into which the States enter as coequal sovereignties, and with equal dignity and rights. It does not mean the impossible unity and consolidation of the people of this continent, under a single empire or republic, but a constitutional alliance of states or republics, presenting them as one nation to the other powers of the earth, while reserving to each the supreme co over its local affairs and domestic institut Such is the Union established by our fo thers. Such is the Union to which "unsw ing fidelity" is pledged by the Democratic ty, and to which our candidate will devot the future, as in the past, all the faculties o nature and all the energies of his soul.

But I rejoice with unspeakable joy in pledge, now given to the nation by the sec article of our Platform, that first of all, blessed influences of peace and conciliat are to be invoked to reunite the sundered alienated fragments of our once glorious Un For more than three years this terrible fruitless contest of arms has carried mourn and grief, desolation and ruin, over the la The awful waste of human life; the fearful mands upon the country made by the jest and fiddling Nero at Washington for new tims of battle and disease; the smoke of bu ing cities and towns blackening the sky; shrieks of the wounded and dying daily ascen ing from fields of slaughter to the God of pea all these appeal with resistless eloquence a power for a cessation of arms, and for one gr and noble effort to accomplish a peaceful justment of this horrid controversy. To su an effort we are pledged, and it is the nobl pledge which a political convention ever ga to a people. It is the first ray of light which h penetrated the surrounding gloom. I can s in it the rainbow of promisestretched acro the storm, giving to us hopes of future securi and repose.

And why, let me ask, in the name of th peaceful and holy religion which we profess, the name of the Divine Instructor who said his followers, "Blessed are the peace-makers why should we not arrest the devouring flam of war? why should we continue to swell th tide of human slaughter without one effort fo a peaceful arrangement of the strife? Tha we cannot fight always, and that negotiatio in some form must at last terminate the strug gle, is a truth so obvious that no one will call in question. And if this be true, then, in th name of our common humanity, let us negoti ate now, if honorable negotiation is possible Let us now invoke the white-robed angel of peace to descend between the contending hosts and arrest the conflict, and let the still, small voice of reason and conscience be heard, in stead of the roar of arms, the thunder of cannon, and the murderous rattle of musketry.

Fellow-citizens: I propose on this, and on other occasions, before the assemblies of the people, to stand as one of the accusers of the opposing political party, and of the man who, as its candidate for the highest office in the nation, represents its principles and purposes. I impeach them for high crimes and misdemeanors against the Constitution, and against the peace and order of society — crimes and misdemeanors which ought forever to forfeit the confidence of a free, a humane, and a Christian people.

carcely more than eight years ago the ublican party arose in one section of the on, and cast its ominous shadow over the le republic. After little more than four rs of reckless agitation, of reckless apl to all that is bigoted and fanatical in an nature, it attained to power by the es of little more than one third of the peoof all the States, and Abraham Lincoln ame the President of the United States.
at was the saddest day in all our history.
ss than four years' actual possession of wer have sufficed to accomplish the ruin of country. If the providence of God had t upon this nation the calamities of pesti-ce and famine; if the destroying angel had ead his wings over it, the desolation could have been more complete. Among the net ults of this brief but disastrous domination a new-born party are nearly a million of es, sacrificed to the Moloch of abolition phi-nthropy, not less than three thousand mill-ns of federal, state, and municipal debt;
d taxation present and prospective, such as people ever suffered, and which must be dured from age to age, unless the nation nks into bankruptcy and repudiation. To ese may be added the destruction of prop-ty beyond all the powers and means of callation, cities and towns consigned to the mes, vast tracts of the country once inhab-ed by a prosperous and happy people, deso-ted and destroyed, and above all the fires of nplacable hate planted in the bosoms of mill-ns of American citizens.

With this fearful record, this record of hu-iliation and calamity, a record which time annot blot out, which ages of repentance canot wash away, the same political organization, ow, demands a new lease of power. Its lead-rs and guides exhibit no change of heart or urpose. Instead of repenting in dust and shes for the mischief and desolation they ave brought upon the country, instead of call-ng upon the rocks and the mountains to cover them from the wrath of the people they have be-rayed, instead of penitential gratitude to heaven that they have not been consumed by its lightnings and blasted by its thunder-bolts, the leaders of this party, I say, with an incredible assurance, demand four years longer to revel in the desolation they have made. And even Abraham Lincoln, chosen as a constitutional magistrate, clothed with the highest of all human trusts, that of protecting and defending the Constitution, with his solemn oath of office trampled in the dust, with the Constitution bleeding under his feet — Abraham Lincoln, the very architect of ruin, now reaches forth his hands for the imperial purple. I say the imperial purple, because I know if many years of devoted study of the Constitution and laws of my country have taught me anything, that, under a baseless and groundless pretence of military necessity, he has administered the government of this country upon the theories and doctrines of a pure and simple despotism, unrestrained by a single principle of constitutional liberty and law. And if this people shall now acquiesce in his vast and stupendous assumption of power; if, in the madness of the hour, if, struck with worse than judicial blindness, they shall once more intrust power to his hands, it will be a deliberate abandonment of the Constitution, it will be national suicide, and the throne of Abraham will be more despotic than those of the princes or potentates of the old world.

I arraign the Republican party and its chief because they did not, and would not, when they could, save the country from the revolution which has overwhelmed it. I impeach them because, in the phrensy of partisan passion and fanatical hate, to save a platform, they rushed upon the ruin of a nation. I here and now assert, what is capable of the most exact and demonstrative proof, that, even before Mr.
Lincoln and his associates were installed in the actual possession of power before the inaugural ceremony, the salvation of the country was in their hands, and it might have been saved by a moderate and just concession which did not involve the liberty, the welfare, the honor, or the happiness of a single human being. Who does not remember the breathless suspense in which the nation stood between the election and the inauguration of the new President? Who does not remember that while the distant storm was gathering and the thunders were muttering, when the very earth was trembling with the first throes of revolution, the compromise of the patriot Crittenden came with healing on its wings? And let the truth be now proclaimed to the everlasting condemnation of those who rejected this healing measure, that it yielded nothing to Southern feeling and rights except a rock-bound territory which contained less than fifty slaves.
Nor was this a concession, because it was less than a constitutional right solemnly affirmed by the supreme judicial tribunal of the nation.
The evidence is overwhelming, nor is it even disputed, that if this measure had been adopted rebellion would not have reared its crest, the Union would have been preserved, and the nation saved. In vain were Lincoln and Seward and Chase and Sumner appealed to by an anxious people to approve a compromise which Jefferson Davis and Toombs and Hunter and Mason were willing to accept. Not a single Republican vote could it obtain in the Senate of the United States. History affords no example of such reckless disregard of the public welfare, of such total abnegation of statesmanship, as the Republican leaders exhibited in that great crisis pregnant with the fate of the nation. Nor has the world ever seen such a sublime assurance as that which again demands a continuation of power in the blood-stained hands of men who deliberately chose the ruin of their country in preference to the surrender of a senseless and mischievous partisan dogma.

I arraign the Republican party, and I arraign Abraham Lincoln, because, when entrusted by a patriotic people with the control of great armies and boundless resources, they have wielded them, and are now wielding them in violation of solemn pledges made to the whole nation, in violation of the most sacred constitutional obligations, and for the destruction, instead of the salvation, of the Union. I know the full meaning and gravity of this impeachment. But the whole history of the Administration will prove its literal and exact truth.

Let us recall the pledges under which this Administration commenced its inglorious career. On the solemn occasion of the inaugural ceremony, Mr. Lincoln, not wholly insensible to the public danger, and anxious to bring to his support all parties in the North, made the emphatic declaration that he had neither "the intention nor the lawful right" to interfere with the laws and institutions of the States, and that the maintenance of the "right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, was essential to the perfection and endurance of our political fabric." At the period when this declaration was made, seven of the States had passed ordinances of secession. If, by their attempt to withdraw from the Union, State sovereignty and rights were forfeited and lost, the President of the United States had not yet made the discovery. The doctrine thus enunciated by him, founded as it is in the fundamental limitations of the Constitution, was universally acquiesced in and approved by his political opponents.

And we find a pledge not less imposing, given by the legislative branch of the government, which was also under the complete control of the Republican party. In the month of July, 1861, the withdrawal of Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Arkansas had completed the circle of secession, and we stood in the midst of the realities of war. The disastrous defeat of Bull Run had somewhat humbled the Republican chiefs, and they desired to rally the whole people to the support of the Administration in the contest with the rebellion which they had provoked. Congress, therefore, passed with extraordinary unanimity a resolution which the President approved, declaring in precise and exact terms that the war was prosecuted "with no purpose of disturbing the domestic institutions of the States, but to maintain the Constitution and preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the States unimpaired, and that as soon as these objects should be accomplished the war ought to cease."

Such were the pledges given to the nation by Mr. Lincoln and his party. They were accepted by a united North, and they saved to the Union the powerful States of Kentucky and Missouri, which otherwise were lost. They were received with especial satisfaction by the great army of loyal and conservative men, who had profoundly distrusted the purpose of the Republican party. Throughout the length and breath of the land Democrats rallied to the support of a government administered by men not of their choice. If those pledges were given to deceive the country with a great and desolating war, to be prosecuted for the purpose of subjugating States to the imperial will of the President and his party, and overthrowing their institutions and laws, no language can describe the utter infamy of that deception. If, on the other hand, they were honestly given, then, in the name of our violated Constitution, in the name of Christian civilization and of humanity, I ask why should they not be honestly kept?

The world has never witnessed such an astounding breach of faith as that exhibited in the violation by Mr. Lincoln and his party of those solemn and imposing pledges. Relying upon them, a loyal and patriotic people contributed mighty fleets and armies, poured out their treasure and shed their blood like water. How have they been kept? Solemnly committed to the preservation of the Union under the Constitution, and to the restoration of the States with all their dignity and rights, one of the first lawless acts of the President and Congress was the dismemberment of the great State of Virginia, and the creation of a new State out of her territory. Tell me, you Republican doctors of law, if you have ever read the Constitution, where is your authority for this stupendous usurpation and wrong? Do you not know, and did you not know when the wrong was committed, that by an explicit provision of the Constitution no State shall be divided, nor any new State erected out of its territory without its consent? I wish to speak with all the moderation that becomes me, but I shall be false to my convictions, I do not charge this usurpation as a wicked and deliberate violation of a fundamental provision of the Constitution. And how, let me ask, is Virginia, the mother of States, to be restored to the Union with her original dignity and rights, while her territory is dismembered and her unity destroyed? Suppose, to-day, you ask her rebellious people to lay down their arms and bring back the State to the embraces of the Union, under the Constitution. They must answer, you have dismembered our State in violation of the Constitution, and thrown up an insuperable barrier to the Union you profess to desire. Such is the Republican mode of maintaining the Constitution and restoring the States to their places in the Union.

Passing now to other usurpations, if possible still more revolutionary and alarming. I suppose the humblest mind can comprehend the constitutional status and legal consequences of rebellion. Rebellion is simply treason against the government of the Union. Treason is an offence defined by the Constitution, and like all other offences against the government, can be punished only by indictment and trial in the civil courts, and before a jury of the State or district in which the crime is committed. Such ne letter of the Constitution. Treason can- be the offence of a State or political society. n cannot indict a State. You cannot im- son, banish, or hang it, or subject it to any ceivable punishment or forfeiture. I appeal he bar of this country, I appeal to Republi- lawyers and jurists, to say if I am not it.

Take, for illustration, even the consolidat- government of a single State. If a large nber, a majority, or even all, of the inhab- its of a county should rebel against the te government, each individual would be lty of treason, and subject to trial by jury his crime, nor could be punished in any er manner. The traitors may be dispersed, unded, or slain in battle, if they offer armed l organized resistance. But this is not the stitutional idea of punishment. No one can to see that the county itself remains an in- ral portion of the State, and cannot be pun- ed, forfeited, or lost; certainly not if fixed l established as a political division by the ate constitution or organic law.

The illustration is feeble, because the States e not an emanation from the federal govern- nt. On the contrary, the States created, d, in their union, now compose that govern- nt. The only doctrine, however, which can opposed to the right of secession, is that the ates are unchangeably fixed in the Union by e constitutional compact, as the planets are ed in their orbits around the sun by an irre- rsible law of nature, and can no more depart m the Union than a planet can fly into the undless regions of space. If this is not true, en by secession the States are effectually, to l intents whatever, out of the Union, and one of their citizens can be guilty of treason. hen Jefferson Davis is not a traitor to the overnment of the United States. Then the onstitution is simply a treaty which may be nulled at pleasure. Tell me again, Republi- an judges and lawyers, if this is not so?

Now the States, in a constitutional sense, eing perpetually members of the Union, and he national government having jurisdiction nd sovereignty over all their inhabitants for he special purposes limited and defined in the Constitution, the results are inevitable. First, he contest of this government is not with it- elf, is not with its own component parts, is not vith the States, or their reserved political sov- reignty and rights, but is with the treasonable ersons who, in great numbers, resist the lim- ted and defined sovereignty of the federal overnment, and oppose the execution of its aws. Second, when that opposition ceases the work is done, the mission of government is ac- omplished, unless the judicial power proceeds, by indictment and trial according to constitu- ional forms, to arraign and punish the offend- ng individuals who have been engaged in the nsurrection. I say the work is done. The Union does not need, nor can it possibly have, any other salvation. The States do not need, nor can they possibly have, any other restora- tion. The Union remains, and the States re- main. The noble structure of our government is always constitutionally perfect and complete. It is complete not only in theory, but in prac- tice also, over all the confederacy, the very in- stant that resistance ceases to its just and con- stitutional laws. Every other doctrine beside this imputes imperfection to our government, and inevitably terminates either in revolution or in the lawful and peaceful secession of States.

If these principles are true, — and I appeal to you again, Republican lawyers, to tell me if they are not, they pronounce the utter and ev- erlasting condemnation of Mr. Lincoln and his advisers, and of the party which owns him as its chief and its candidate. I arraign them all because in direct and palpable violation of those principles which underlie the entire fab- ric of liberty and law in this country, they have enacted bills of attainder, confiscation of property, and punishment without the process or trial which the Constitution requires. The entire population of the Southern States are already sentenced without trial by sweeping statutes of Congress, inflicting universal con- fiscation and deprivation of the right of citi- zenship. I cannot pause to enumerate them all. One of them, not more atrocious than others, disqualifies the entire male population of the South forever from holding office under the government unless by test oath unknown to the Constitution, and in direct violation of it, they can show that they have never had any connection with the existing rebellion. Now who does not know that this is an utter disfranchisement of the people of eleven States of this Union? And who is so ignorant as not to understand that this is one of the forms of punishment for crime which can only be in- flicted by the tribunals of justice and the ver- dict of a jury? Who does not know that the united power of the President and Congress can not lawfully touch, in this manner, the rights of a single citizen of this country! How vast, how astonishing, then, is the usurpa ion which sweeps to destruction the property and rights of millions of citizens by presidential and legislative edicts having no foundation in constitutional law, but yet to be enforced by the soldiers and bayonets entrusted by a con- fiding people to the chief magistrate of this nation!

And this is Republican doctrine for restor- ing the Union! Did madness and folly ever reach such astonishing heights? Is a Union of the States possible or conceivable unless you have in them a population clothed with the common rights of citizenship? Can Vir- ginia or Georgia be a member of the Union if inhabited by an alien population, without rights as citizens of the United States? Re- publicans! I ask you to pause and reflect. Can you, by such a policy, restore the States or their people to their allegiance? Let me tell you that battles and sieges and blockades may be persuasive arguments to bring back an insurgent people to the mild and just authority of the Constitution and the laws; but battles and sieges and blockades will never bring them to you in the dust of humiliation; will never subject to your authority, as abject servants or slaves, a brave and powerful people.

I know that among the horrid delusions propagated by Republican orators and papers, is the astounding fallacy that the people of the South having withdrawn from the Union, are not entitled to the protection of the Constitution. But if we are Union men, we necessarily affirm that they cannot withdraw from the Union nor emancipate themselves from the unchangeable law of the Constitution. Whoever says more or less than this rejects the Union and rejects the Constitution. If we accept the secession postulate that the Union is dissolved and the Constitution abrogated, then we have no cause of war, no motive for its continuance. Then our armies ought to be instantly withdrawn and the tide of human slaughter arrested. If not for the sake of our Constitution, and our whole Constitution, why are we engaged in this desolating strife? Why do we wrap a continent in the devastating flames of war? Why do we enact scenes at which humanity and civilization are compelled to shudder? Republicans! do you not say that rebels ought everywhere to submit themselves to the Constitution? But do you mean less than the whole Constitution, with all its authority and all its protection? Will you divide it in two portions, and maintain the one while you destroy the other? Will you demand the submission required, and yet withdraw the protection afforded by the same great instrument? Do you say that rebellion shall yield to the supreme law, and deny to the rebel the citizenship and the rights to which the same law entitles him? I pray you look your doctrine in the face, and let us away with such monstrous. such destructive fallacies.

These vast assumptions of power take their origin in a fanaticism, folly, and hatred to me incomprehensible, or else they flow from deliberate and wicked desire and intention to drive away forever a disfranchised people from the embraces of the Union and the Constitution. But the usurpation by Mr. Lincoln and his administration, of unlimited authority over States, their institutions, constitutions, and laws, are yet more fatal and revolutionary. To these I briefly invite your attention.

I have shown that if the Union is a perpetual government, if secession is not a constitutional right, the States are unalterably fixed as members of the Union, and the mission of our national government is not to subjugate itself, or the States of which it is composed, by simply and solely to quell resistance and execute everywhere its constitutional laws. Now, if there is one principle more than any other which lies at the very foundation of our Union, which is the very corner stone of our noble political structure, which determ the rights of the citizen, and even the cha ter of civilization and society in this cour it is the constitutional partition of power tween the Federal and the State gov ments. It is known to and admitted b persons having the most moderate degre political knowledge, that the States, bein the possession of separate sovereignty rights before the formation of our federal ernment, entered by compact into a nati Union, and transferred to that Union cer specified powers for national purposes, reserved all other sovereignty and right themselves. That compact was the Const tion of the United States, separately agr to by each of the States, and if to-day Constitution is not the national governm then we have no such government, for other national government has ever b established in this country.

These principles, too trite and familiar to disputed, — these principles being admitt it is nothing else than revolution and anar to attempt to overthrow the partition of s ereignty, or obliterate the line which divi the functions and powers of the States fr the functions and powers of the federal g ernment. If the people of the States atte to resume the powers granted to the Union is revolution. If the Union oversteps the l and invades the rights and powers of States, it is also revolution; and I say to y fellow-citizens, this is the very revoluti which is now shaking the pillars of gove ment and society in this country.

If secession is not a constitutional right, th we arraign Jefferson Davis and his Confed ate States for a revolutionary attempt to ov throw the powers granted by those Stat to the government of the Union. If t Union is perfect and all the States which co pose it are equal, as necessarily they are dignity and rights, we arraign Abraham Li coln for the kindred treason of overleapi the sacred line traced by the Constitution i self, which divides the powers of governme and sovereignty, and invading the domain State sovereignty and rights, with the rev lutionary purpose of reorganizing society an overthrowing the constitutions and laws eleven States of this Union. Jefferson Dav is the revolutionist of the South, but Jefferso Davis is not within the reach of my voice o my vote. Abraham Lincoln is the revolution ist and anarchist of the North, and he de mands your suffrages and mine. Both of then must be removed from power before the Unio can be restored and the blessings of peac once more descend upon this unhappy country

In proof of the revolutionary design of Mr Lincoln, I refer to the most authentic and im posing records of his administration. The first great act which signalized his betrayal o the Constitution and of the principles and pledges under which the country had united in his support, was the Proclamation of Emantion, in which, by a single stroke of his suddenly enfranchised four millions of less human beings and overthrew the con- itions and laws of the States under which were held in servitude; and this imperial t was attended by a pledge of the army navy under his command to maintain it ver. It is not material what name we to this proceeding. It may be called a tery order, a political decree, or an impe- release. Its name does not alter its char- r. Nor will its character be changed by of the pretences for its justification. In and all aspects its exact letter and mean- were, and its undoubted effect is, provid- it be a constitutional exercise of power, emancipate every slave in the States to ch it applied, and to abrogate forever laws of those States. But you say it was unconstitutional act, and therefore void of no effect. And precisely this is what ffirm, and this is the very ground of my eachment. It was a vast revolutionary for which the President had no shadow authority in the Constitution. It was a which the revolutionists and radicals who him in their keeping will never permit to revoke, and which in his latest message Congress he has declared he never will re- e. For the enforcement of that decree usurper is now wielding half a million of ronets under the false pretence of a war the Union of the States. It is a war inst the Union of the States, because there o lawful Union except under the Consti- ion, and based on the equal dignity and hts of each one of them.

That I do not misinterpret the design of Mr. ncoln or the meaning of this extraordinary ree, is proved with absolute demonstration his so-called "amnesty," or plan of recon- ucting the seceding States, and restoring m to the Union. Now this "plan" is not a re theory without practical consequence or ult. Under it, two spurious States have ung into being, whose votes are expected to given to the author of their existence. her spurious States are to arise in the track our armies, and take the place on the now isting States of the Union.

This grotesque and crude conception of Mr. ncoln is, therefore, a terrible reality, and not rely a hideous conceit of his brain. He heres to it with such tenacity, that he refused sanction a plan of Congress, equally unconsti- tional, but less absurd than his own. It is a an which proceeds on the monstrous doctrine at the States are in some sense out of the nion, that thei constitutions and laws are for- ited, their State sovereignty gone, and that , the imperial sovereign at Washington, may rce upon them new constitutions and laws. assumes that all the citizens of the rebellious tates are already, without trial or conviction, the situation of convicts and outlaws, to hom a pardon is necessary in order to be stored to the rights of citizenship. This par- don the considerate and merciful dictator extends to so many of them as will take an oath to support his proclamation of emancipa- tion, and all proclamations which he may issue. All other persons are outlawed, although they may be willing to lay down their arms, and return to the true allegiance which they owe to the Union. So soon as one-tenth part of the voting population have taken the oath, a new State may be organized, with a free constitu- tion, to be received by the President into the Union. The existing constitutions of the States are necessarily abrogated, and nine- tenths of the people who will not obey the im- perial behest, and take the degrading oath, are not left in the enjoyment of a single right of citizenship, not even the sacred right of suf- frage.

Time does not permit to me a further discus- sion of the mighty issues now to be determined. We have a noble mission before us — the res- toration of peace, and the salvation of the country. There is revolution, there is war, in- terminable, cruel, and exhausting war, in the policy against which we protest. There are bright pledges of peace and a Union saved and restored in the candidates we present and the principles we profess. Let good men, then, rally to our standard.

We know the enlightened sentiment of the people is with us, and we believe its unrestrain- ed expression will result in the triumph of our cause. But we must be equal to all the duties that may be cast upon us. We know also that the usurper has his armed heel upon the freeman's right of suffrage. Let him be warned in time. If our candidate is fairly chosen, and yet the nation shall be defrauded of its will by the presence and exercise of military power, in whatever place, then, so surely as the throne of justice is established in the heavens, the people will take George B. McClellan in their arms, and will bear him over and through all opposi- tion to the Capitol in Washington, and there inaugurate him as the constitutional President of this republic.

If any one shall say that I have overstated this extraordinary, this revolutionary scheme, I say to him, go to the record and there you will find it. You will find it in the resulting bogus States of Louisiana and Arkansas. You will find it on the blood-stained fields of Flor- ida, where an army was sacrificed to put it in force. So far as we can know, the President adheres to it with a fixed tenacity of purpose, and he has told us that he does not propose to abandon it. Four years more he now asks to carry forward this revolution of States upon which he has entered. For this his mandate issues for five hundred thousand more men. For this the nation is tottering on the verge of bankruptcy and ruin.

And when are we to have peace and re- pose? The country was struck with needless astonishment at Mr. Lincoln's recent mani- festo, "To all whom it may concern," declar- ing not merely the Union, but also "the abandonment of slavery," as one of the conditions of peace. What else could he say without revoking his proclamation, which he has told us he never will revoke? What else could he say, without recalling his "amnesty" and annulling the baseless political organizations which he has already called into existence, and which he tells us he cannot abandon?

What less could he say without rejecting the platform of the political convention which has nominated him for re-election, and which he says he "cordially accepts," a platform which explicitly declares the abolition of slavery as one of the objects of this desolating and exterminating war?

And now over and against this manifesto of Lincoln, ominous of eternal war, let me place the noble words of McClellan, which may well be written on the sky, "THE UNION IS THE ONE CONDITION OF PEACE; WE ASK NO MORE." And, fellow-citizens, we have no right to ask more. If the States are in the Union under the Constitution, or if we demand their return to the Union under the Constitution, then the great instrument we seek to uphold forbids us to ask more. If they are out of the Union, according to the wild and fantastic theories of some of the most eminent Republican leaders, then the rebellious States are to us a foreign nation, and by the public law of the world, as well as eternal rules of justice, their independ ought to be respected; and whether insi outside of the Constitution, we have no r right to invade their soil, to change their toms and laws than we have to invade Bu to abolish slavery, or the empire of Turke abolish polygamy.

It is time to awaken the slumbering science of the nation to the moral aspects duties of the crisis. Are there no moral t which ought to determine the conduct c Christian people? Have the eternal sta ards of right and wrong perished in the of arms and the whirlwind of revoluti Tell me you ministers of a peaceful relig — tell me, you disciples of Him whose mis on earth was peace and good-will to m where is your commission to make war, cept for the Constitution and laws as t are? Where is your authority to inv other communities and States with desolat and fire in the track of your armies, not to force the laws, but to make new laws for the Such a war, let me say to you, never ought succeed, and it never can succeed, while a gle arm can be raised to defend firesides homes, or repel an invasion which has no sa tion, human or divine.

COMPLETE REPORT

ON THE

ORGANIZATION AND CAMPAIGNS

OF THE

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,

BY MAJOR-GENERAL

GEORGE B. McCLELLAN.

FIRST PERIOD.

NEW YORK, August 4th, 1863.

BRIG.-GENERAL L. THOMAS, Adjutant-General U. S. Army.

SIR:—I have the honor to submit herein e Official Report of the operations of the my of the Potomac, while under my charge. companying it are the reports of the corps, ision and subordinate commanders, pertain- to the various engagements, battles, and currences of the campaigns, and important cuments connected with its organization, sup- and movements. These, with list of maps l memoranda submitted, will be found ap- nded, duly arranged and marked for conve- nt reference.

Charged, in the spring of 1861, with the op- tions in the department of the Ohio, which luded the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, l latterly, Western Virginia, it had become duty to counteract the hostile designs of enemy in Western Virginia, which were mediately directed to the destruction of the ltimore and Ohio Railroad, and the possess- n of the Kanawha Valley, with the ultimate ject of gaining Wheeling, and the control of e Ohio River. The successful affairs of Phil- pi, Rich Mountain, Carrick's Ford, etc., had en fought, and I had acquired possession of Western Virginia, north of the Kanawha Val- y, as well as of the lower portion of that val- y.

I had determined to proceed to the relief of e upper Kanawha Valley, as soon as provis- n was made for the permanent defense of the ountain passes leading from the east into the gion under our control, when I received at verly, in Randolph County, on the 21st July, 61, intelligence of the unfortunate result of e battle of Manassas, fought on that day.

On the 22d, I received an order by telegraph, recting me to turn over my command to Brig.- neral Rosecrans, and repair at once to Wash- ton.

I had already caused reconnoissances to be made for intrenchments at the Cheat Mountain Pass; also on the Huntersville road, near Elk- water, and at Red House, near the main road from Romney to Grafton. During the afternoon and the night of the 22d, I gave the final in- structions for the construction of these works, turned over the command to Brig.-Gen. Rose- crans, and started, on the morning of the 23d, for Washington, arriving there on the afternoon of the 26th. On the 27th, I assumed command of the Division of the Potomac, comprising the troops in and around Washington, on both banks of the river.

With this brief statement of the events which immediately preceded my being called to the command of the troops at Washington, I pro- ceed to an account from such authentic data as are at hand, of my military operations while commander of the Army of the Potomac.

The subjects to be considered, naturally ar- range themselves as follows: The organization of the Army of the Potomac; the military events connected with the defenses of Washington, from July, 1861, to March, 1862; the campaign on the Peninsula, and that in Maryland.

The great resources and capacity for power- ful resistance, of the South, at the breaking out of the rebellion, and the full proportions of the great conflict about to take place, were sought to be carefully measured; and I had also en- deavored, by every means in my power, to im- press upon the authorities the necessity for such immediate and full preparation as alone would enable the government to prosecute the war on a scale commensurate with the re- sistence to be offered.

On the 4th of August, 1861, I addressed to the President, the following memorandum, pre- pared at his request:

MEMORANDUM.—The object of the present war differs from those in which nations are usually engaged, mainly in this: That the purpose of ordinary war is to conquer a peace, and make a treaty on advantageous terms. In this contest it has become necessary to crush a population sufficiently numerous, intelligent and warlike to constitute a nation. We have not only to defeat their armed and organized forces in the field but to display such an overwhelming strength as will convince all our antagonists, especially those of the governing, aristocratic class, of the utter impossibility of resistence. Our late reverses make this course imperative. Had we been successful in the recent battle (Manassas), it is possible that we might have been spared the labor and expense of a great effort; now we have no alternative. Their success will enable the political leaders of the rebels to convince the mass of their people that we are inferior to them in force and courage, and to command all their resources. The contest began with a class; now it is with a people, our military success can alone restore the former issue.

By thoroughly defeating their armies, taking their strong places, and pursuing a rigidly protective policy as to private property, and unarmed persons, and a lenient course as to private soldiers, we may well hope for a permanent restoration of a peaceful Union. But, in the first instance, the authority of the government must be supported by overwhelming physical force.

Our foreign relations and financial credit also imperatively demand that the military action of the government should be prompt and irresistible.

The rebels have chosen Virginia as their battle-field, and it seems proper for us to make the first great struggle there. But while thus directing our main efforts, it is necessary to diminish the resistence there offered us, by movements on other points, both by land and water.

Without entering at present into details, I would advise that a strong movement be made on the Mississippi, and that the rebels be driven out of Missouri.

As soon as it becomes perfectly clear that Kentucky is cordially united with us, I would advise a movement through that State into Eastern Tennessee, for the purpose of assisting the Union men of that region, and of seizing the railroads leading from Memphis to the east.

The possession of those roads by us, in connection with the movement on the Mississippi would go far towards determining the evacuation of Virginia by the rebels. In the meantime all the passes into Western Virginia, from the east, should be securely guarded; but I would advise no movement from that quarter toward Richmond, unless the political condition of Kentucky renders it impossible, or inexpedient for us to make the movement upon Eastern Tennessee, through that State. Every effort should however, be made to organize, equip and arm as mamy troops as possible in Western Virginia, in order to render the Ohio and Indiana regiments available for other operations. At as early a day as practicable, it would be well to protect and re-open the Baltimore and O[hio] Railroad.

Baltimore and Fort Munroe should he oc[cu]pied by garrisons sufficient to retain them in our possession. The importance of Harp[er's] Ferry and the line of the Potomac, in the di[rec]tion of Leesburg, will be very materially di[mi]nished so soon as our force in this vicin[ity] becomes organized, strong and efficient, be[ca]use no capable general will cross the riv[er] north of this city, when we have a strong ar[my] here, ready to cut off his retreat.

To revert to the West, it is probable th[at] no very large additions to the troops now i[n] Missouri, will be necessary to secure th[at] State.

I presume that the force required for t[he] movement down the Mississippi, will be d[e]termined by its commander and the Pre[si]dent. If Kentucky assumes the right positio[n] not more than 20,000 troops will be needed together with those that can be raised in th[e] State and Eastern Tennessee, to secure th[e] latter region and its railroads, as well as ultim[a]tely to occupy Nashville.

The Western Virginia troops, with mo[re] than 5,000 to 10,000 from Ohio and Indiana should, under proper management, suffice f[or] its protection. When we have reorganized our main army here, 10,000 men ought to b[e] enough to protect the Baltimore and Ohio Rai[l]road and the Potomac. Five thousand wi[ll] garrison Baltimore, 3,000 Fort Monroe, and no[t] more than 20,000 will be necessary, at the u[t]most, for the defense of Washington.

For the main army of operations, I urge th[e] following composition:

250 Regiments of Infantry, say - - -	225,000	men.
100 Field Batteries, 600 guns - - - -	15,000	"
28 Regiments Cavalry, - - - - - - -	25,500	"
5 " Engineer troops - - -	7,500	"
Total - - - - - - - - - -	273,000.

The force must be supplied with the necessary engineer and pontoon trains, and with transportation for everything save tents. Its general line of operations should be so directed that water transportation can be availed of from point to point, by means of the ocean and the rivers emptying into it. An essential feature of the plan of operations, will be the employment of a strong naval force, to protect the movements of a fleet of transports intended to convey a considerable body of troops from point to point of the enemy's sea-coast, thus either creating diversions, and rendering it necessary to detach largely from their main body, in order to protect such of their cities as may be threatened, or else landing and forming establishments on their coast at any favorable places that opportunity might offer. This naval force should also co-operate with the main army, in its efforts to seize the important sea-board town of the rebels.

It cannot be ignored that the construction of railroads, has introduced a new and very portant element into war, by the great facili-s thus given for concentrating at particular sitions, large masses of troops from remote tions, and by creating new strategic points l lines of operations. It is intended to over-ne this difficulty by the partial operations ggested, and such other as the particular e may require. We must endeavor to seize ces on the railways, in the rear of the ene's points of concentration, and we must eaten their sea-board cities, in order that h State may be forced, by the necessity of own defense to diminish its contingent to Confederate army.

The proposed movement down the Missis-pi, will produce important results in this nection. That advance, and the progress the main army at the East, will materially ist each other by diminishing the resistance be encountered by each. The tendency of e Mississippi movement upon all questions nnected with cotton, is too well understood the President and Cabinet, to need any illusation from me. There is another independt movement which has often been suggested d which has always recommended itself to y judgment. I refer to a movement from nsas and Nebraska, through the Indian Terory upon Red River and Western Texas, for e purpose of protecting and developing the tent Union and free state sentiment, well own to predominate in Western Texas, and hich, like a similar sentiment in Western Vir-nia, will, if protected, ultimately organize at section into a free state. How far it will e possible to support this movement by an lvance through New Mexico from California, a matter which I have not sufficiently ex-mined to be able to express a decided opinion.
at all practicable, it is eminently desirable, bringing into play the resources and war-ke qualities of the Pacific States, as well as lentifying them with our cause, and cement-g the bond of Union between them and the eneral Government.

If it is not departing too far from my pro-ince, I will venture to suggest the policy of n intimate alliance and cordial understanding ith Mexico; their sympathies and interests re with us; their antipathies exclusively gainst our enemies, and their institutions. I hink it would not be difficult to obtain from he Mexican government the right to use, at east during the present contest, the road from Guaymas to New Mexico. This concession would very materially reduce the obstacles of the column moving from the Pacific. A similar permission to use their territory for the passage of troops between the Panuco and the Rio Grande, would enable us to throw a column of troops, by a good road from Tampico, or some of the small harbors north of it, upon and across the Rio Grande, without risk, and scarcely firing a shot. To what extent, if any, it would be desirable to take into service and employ Mexican soldiers, is a question entirely political, on which I do not venture to offer an

The force I have recommended is large, the expense is great. It is possible that a smaller force might accomplish the object in view; but I understand it to be the purpose of this great nation to re-establish the power of its government, and to restore peace to its citizens, in the shortest possible time. The question to be decided is simply this; shall we crush the rebellion at one blow, terminate the war in one campaign, or shall we leave it for a legacy to our descendants?

When the extent of the possible line of operations is considered, the force asked for the main army under my command cannot be regarded as unduly large. Every mile we advance carries us further from our base of operations, and renders detatchments necessary to cover our communications, while the enemy will be constantly concentrating as he falls back. I propose with the force which I have requested, not only to drive the enemy out of Virginia and occupy Richmond, but to occupy Charleston, Savannah, Montgomery, Pensacola, Mobile and New Orleans; in other words to move into the heart of the enemy's country, and crush out the rebellion in its very heart.

By seizing and repairing the railroads as we advance, the difficulties of transportation will be materially diminished. It is perhaps, unnecessary to state, that in addition to the forces named in this memorandum, strong reserves should be formed, ready to supply any losses that may occur.

In conclusion, I would submit that the exigencies of the treasury may be lessened by making only partial payments to our troops, when in the enemy's country, and by giving the obligations of the United States for such supplies as may there be obtained.

GEO. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General.

I do not think the events of the war have proved these views, upon the methods and plans of its conduct, altogether incorrect. They certainly have not proved my estimate of the number of troops and scope of operations too large. It is probable that I did under-estimate the time necessary for the completion of arms and equipments. It was not strange, however, that by many civilians intrusted with authority there should have been an exactly opposite opinion held in both these particulars.

The result of the first battle of Manassas had been almost to destroy the morale and organization of our army, and to alarm government and people. The national capital was in danger. It was necessary, besides holding the enemy in check, to build works for its defense, strong and capable of being held by a small force.

It was necessary also to create a new army for active operations, and to expedite its organization, equipment, and the accumulation of the material of war, and to this not inconsiderable labor all my energies for the next three months were constantly devoted.

Time is a necessary element in the creation of armies, and I do not therefore think it necessary to more than mention the impatience with which many regarded the delay in the arrival of the new levies, though recruited and pressed forward with unexampled rapidity—the manufacture and supply of arms and equipments, or the vehemence with which an immediate advance upon the enemy's works directly in our front was urged by a patriotic but sanguine people.

The President too was anxious for the speedy employment of our army, and although possessed of my plans through frequent conferences, desired a paper from me upon the condition of the forces under my command, and the immediate measures to be taken to increase their efficiency. Accordingly, in the latter part of October, I addressed the following letter to the Secretary of War:

To the Hon. Simon Cameron,

Secretary of War:

Sir,—In conformity with a personal understanding with the President, yesterday, I have the honor to submit the following statement of the condition of the army under my command, and the measnres required for the preservation of the government and the suppression of the rebellion:

It will be remembered that, in a memorial I had the honor to address to the President soon after my arrival in Washington, and in my communication addressed to Lieut-General Scott, under date of 8th of August; in my letter to the President authorizing him, at his request, to withdraw the letter written by me to General Scott; and in my letter of the 8th of September, answering your note of inquiry of that date, my views on the same snbject are frankly and fully expressed.

In these several communications I have stated the force I regarded as necessary to enable this army to advance with a reasonable certainty of success, at the same time leaving the capital and the line of the Potomac sufficiently guarded not only to secure the retreat of the main army, in the event of disaster, but to render it out of the enemy's power to attempt a diversion in Maryland.

So much time has passed, and the winter is approaching so rapidly, that but two courses are left to the government, viz., either to go into winter quarters, or to assume the offensive with forces greatly inferior in numbers to the army I regarded as desirable and necessary.

If political considerations render the first course unadvisable the second alone remains. While I regret that it has not been deemed expedient, or perhaps possible to concentrate the forces of the nation in this vicinity, (remaining on the defensive elsewhere,) keeping the attention and efforts of the government fixed upon this as the vital point, where the issue of the great contest is to be decided, it may still be that, by introducing unity of action and design among the various armies of the land, by determining the courses to be pursued by the various commanders under one general plan, transferring from the other armies the superfluous strength not required for the purpose in view, and thus re-inforcing this main army, whose destiny it is to decide the controversy, we may yet be able to move with a reasonable prospect of success before the winter is fairly upon us. The nation feels, and I share that feeling, that the army of the Potomac holds the fate of the country in its hands. The stake is so vast, the issue so momentous, and the effect of the next battle will be so important throughout the future, as well as the present, that I continue to urge, as I have ever done since I entered upon the command of this army, upon the government to devote its energies and its available resources towards increasing the numbers and efficiency of the army on which its salvation depends.

A statement, carefully prepared by the chiefs of engineers and artillery of this army gives as the necessary garrison of this city and its fortifications 33,795 men—say 35,000. The present garrison of Baltimore and its dependencies is about 10,000. I have sent the chief of my staff to make a careful examination into the condition of these troops, and to obtain the information requisite to enable me to decide whether this number can be diminished or the reverse. At least 5,000 men will be required to watch the river hence to Harper's Ferry and its vicinity; probably 8,000 to guard the lower Potomac.

As you are aware, all the information we have from spies, prisoners, &c., agree in showing that the enemy have a force on the Potomac not less than 150,000 strong, well drilled and equipped, ably commanded and strongly intrenched. It is plain, therefore, that to ensure success, or to render it reasonably certain, the active army should not number less than 150,000 efficient troops, with 400 guns, unless some material change occurs in the force in front of us.

The requisite force for an advance movement by the army of the Potomac may be thus estimated:

Column of active operations....	150,000	men,	400 guns,
Garrison of city of Washington	35,000	"	40 "
To guard Poto'c to Hrp's Ferry	5,000	"	12 "
To guard lower Potomac.....	8,000	"	24 "
Garrison for Balt. and Annapolis	10,000	"	12 "
Total effective force required	208,000	men,	488 guns.

Or an aggregate, present and absent, of about 240,000 men, should the losses by sickness, &c., not rise to a higher per-centage than at present.

Having stated what I regard as the requisite force to enable this army to advance, I now proceed to give the actual strength of the army of the Potomac.

The aggregate strength of the army of the mac by the official report on the morning e 27th inst. was 168,318 officers and men ll grades and arms. This includes the ps at Baltimore and Annapolis, on the up- and lower Potomac, the sick, absent, &c. e force present for duty was 147,695. his number 4,268 cavalry were completely med, 3,163 cavalry only partially armed, 0 infantry unequipped, making 13,410 un- r the field, (irrespective of those not yet iently drilled,) and reducing the effective e to 134,285, and the number disposable n advance to 76,285. The infantry regi- ts are, to a considerable extent, armed unserviceable weapons—quite a large ber of good arms, which had been intend- for this army, were ordered elsewhere, ing the army of the Potomac insufficiently in some cases, badly armed.

n the 30th of September there were with army 228 field guns ready for the field, ar as arms and equipments are concerned: e of the batteries are still quite raw, and t to go into action. I have intelligence eight new batteries are en route hither: others are ready for the field. I will still the New York batteries have six guns h) be 112 guns short of the number requir- for the active column, saying nothing for present of those necessary for the garri- s and corps on the Potomac, which would ke a total deficiency of 200 guns.

have thus briefly stated our present condi- n and wants: it remains to suggest the ans of supplying the deficiencies.

First. That all the cavalry and infantry ns, as fast as procured, whether manufac- ed in this country or purchased abroad, be nt to this army, until it is fully prepared the field.

Second. That the two companies of the artillery, now understood to be en route m Fort Randall to Fort Monroe, be ordered this army, to be mounted at once; also that e companies of the 3d artillery, en route om California, be sent here. Had not the rder for Smead's battery to come here from arrisburgh, to replace the battery I gave eneral Sherman, been so often countermand- d, I would again ask for it.

Third. That a more effective regulation ay be made, authorizing the transfer of men rom the volunteers to the regular batteries, nfantry and cavalry; that we may make the est possible use of the invaluable regular skeletons."

Fourth. I have no official information as to he United States' forces elsewhere; but from he best information I can obtain from the War Department, and other sources, I am led o believe that the United States troops are,

In Western Virginia about	30,000
In Kentucky about	40,000
In Missouri about	80,000
In Fortress Monroe about	11,000
Total,	161,000

Besides these, I am informed that more than 100,000 are in progress of organization in other northern and western states.

I would therefore recommend that, not interfering with Kentucky, there should be retained in Western Virginia and Missouri a sufficient force for defensive purposes, and that the surplus troops be sent to the army of the Potomac, to enable it to assume the offensive, that the same course be pursued in respect to Fortress Monroe, and that no further outside expeditions be attempted until we have fought the great battle in front of us.

Fifth. That every nerve be strained to hasten the enrollment, organization, and armament of new batteries and regiments of infantry.

Sixth. That all the battalions now raised for the new regiments of regular infantry be at once ordered to this army, and that the old infantry and cavalry en route from California, be ordered to this army immediately on their arrival in New York.

I have thus indicated, in a general manner, the objects to be accomplished, and the means by which we may gain our ends.

A vigorous employment of these means will in my opinion, enable the army of the Potomac to assume successfully this season, the offensive operations which, ever since entering upon the command, it has been my anxious desire and diligent effort to prepare for and prosecute. The advance should not be postponed beyond the 25th of November, if possible to avoid it.

Unity in councils, the utmost vigor and energy in action, are indispensable. The entire military field should be grasped as a whole, and not in detatched parts.

One plan should be agreed upon and pursued; a single will should direct and carry out these plans.

The great object to be atcomplished—the crushing defeat of the rebel army [now] at Manassas—should never for one instant be lost sight of, but all the intellect and means and men of the government poured upon that point. The loyal States possess ample force to effect all this, and more. The rebels have displayed energy, unanimity, and wisdom worthy of the most desperate days of the French Revolution—should we do less?

The unity of this nation, the preservation of our institutions, are so dear to me that I have willingly sacrificed my private happiness, with the single object of doing my duty to my country. When the task is accomplished I shall be glad to return to the obscurity from which events have drawn me.

Whatever the determination of the government may be, I will do the best I can with the army of the Potomac, and will share its fate, whatever may be the task imposed upon me.

Permit me to add, that on this occasion as heretofore, it has been my aim neither to exaggerate nor underrate the power of the enemy, nor fail to express clearly the means by which, in my judgment, that power may be broken. Urging the energy of preparation and action, which has ever been my choice, but with the fixed purpose by no act of mine to expose this government to hazard by premature movement, and requesting that this communication may be laid before the President,

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant, G. B. McC. Maj.-Gen.

When I assumed command in Washington on the 27th of July, 1861, the number of troops in and around the city was about 50,000 infantry, less than 1,000 cavalry, and 650 artillery men, with nine imperfect field-batteries of thirty pieces.

On the Virginia bank of the Potomac the brigade organization of General McDowell still existed, and the troops were stationed at and in rear of Fort Corcoran, Arlington, and Fort Albany, at Fort Runyon, Roach's Mills, Cole's Mill, and in the vicinity of Fort Ellsworth, with a detachment at the Theological Seminary.

There were no troops south of Hunting Creek, and many of the regiments were encamped on the low grounds bordering the Potomac,—seldom in the best positions for defense, and entirely inadequate in numbers and condition to defend the long line from Fort Corcoran to Alexandria.

On the Maryland side of the river, upon the heights overlooking the Chain Bridge, two regiments were stationed, whose commanders were independent of each other.

There were no troops on the important Tenallytown road, or on the roads entering the city from the south.

The camps were located without regard to purposes of defense or instruction; the roads were not picketed, and there was no attempt at an organization into brigades.

In no quarter were the dispositions for defense such as to offer a vigorous resistance to a respectable body of the enemy either in the positions and numbers of the troops, or the number and character of the defensive works. Earthworks in the nature of "tetes-de-pont" looked upon the approaches to the Georgetown aqueduct and ferry, the Long Bridge, and Alexandria by the Little River Turnpike and some simple defensive arrangements were made at the Chain Bridge. With the latter exception, not a single defensive work had been commenced on the Maryland side.

There was nothing to prevent the enemy shelling the city from heights, within easy range, which could be occupied by a hostile column almost without resistance. Many soldiers had deserted, and the streets of Washington were crowded with straggling officers and men, absent from their stations without authority, whose behavior indicated the general want of discipline and organization.

I at once designated an efficient staff, afterwards adding to it, as opportunity offered and necessity required, who zealously co-opera with me in the labor of bringing order out confusion, reassigning troops and comman projecting and throwing up defensive wor receiving and organizing, equipping and p viding for the new levies arriving in the ci

The valuable services of these officers their various departments, during this a throughout the subsequent periods of the h tory of the army of the Potomac, can hardly sufficiently appreciated. Their names and d ties will be given in another part of this r port, and they are commended to the favorab notice of the War Department.

The restoration of order in the city Washington was effected through the appoir ment of a provost marshal, whose authori was supported by the few regular troops wit in my command. These troops were thus i position to act as a reserve, to be sent to an point of attack where their services migh be most wanted.

The energy and ability displayed by Col. A Porter, the provost marshal and his assistant and the strict discharge of their duty by th troops, produced the best results, and Wash ington soon became one of the most quie cities in the Union.

The new levies of infantry, upon arrivin in Washington, were formed into provisiona brigades, and placed in camp in the suburb of the city for equipment, instruction and dis cipline. As soon as regiments were in fit con dition for transfer to the forces across the Potomac, they were assigned to the brigades serving there.

Brig.-Gen. F J. Porter was at first assigned to the charge of the provisional brigades. Brig.-Gen. A. E. Burnside was the next officer assigned to this duty, from which, however, he was soon relieved by Brig.-Gen. S. Casey, who continued in charge of the newly arriving regiments until the army of the Potomac departed for the Peninsula, in March, 1862. The newly arriving artillery troops reported to Brig.-Gen. Wm. F. Barry, the Chief of Artillery, and the cavalry to Brig.-Gen. Geo. Stoneman, the Chief of Cavalry.

By the 15th of October, the number of troops in and about Washington, inclusive of the garrison of the city and Alexandria, the city guard, and the forces on the Maryland shore of the Potomac, below Washington, and as far as Cumberland above, the troops under the command of Gen. Dix at Baltimore, and its dependencies, was as follows:

Total present for duty	133,261
" sick	9,230
" in confinement	1,156
Aggregate present	143,647
" absent	8,404
Grand aggregate	152,051

The following table exhibits similar data for the periods stated, including the troops in Maryland and Delaware:

In organizing the army of the Potomac, and preparing it for the field, the first step taken was to organize the infantry into brigades of four regiments each; retaining the newly arrived regiments on the Maryland side, until their armament and equipment were issued, and they had obtained some little elementary instruction, before assigning them permanently to brigades.

When the organization of the brigades was well established, and the troops somewhat disciplined and instructed, divisions of three brigades each were gradually formed.

As is elsewhere stated in this report, although I was always in favor of the organization into army corps as an abstract principle, I did not desire to form them until the army had been for some little time in the field, in order to enable the general officers first to acquire the requisite experience as division commanders in active service, and that I might be able to decide from actual trial who were best fitted to exercise those important commands.

For a similar reason, I carefully abstained from making any recommendations for the promotion of officers to the grade of Major-General.

When new batteries of artillery arrived, they also were retained in Washington until their armament and equipment were completed, and their instruction sufficiently advanced, to justify their being assigned to divisions.

The same course was pursued in regard to the cavalry. I regret that circumstances have delayed the Chief of Cavalry, Gen. Geo. Stoneman, in furnishing his report upon the organization of that arm of service. It will, however, be forwarded as soon as completed, and will, doubtless, show that the difficult and important duties intrusted to him were efficiently performed. He encountered and overcame, as far as it was possible, continual and vexatious obstacles arising from the great deficiency of cavalry arms and equipments, and the entire inefficiency of many of the regimental officers first appointed; this last difficulty was, to a considerable extent, overcome in the cavalry, as well as in the infantry and artillery, by the continual and prompt action of courts-martial and boards of examination.

As rapidly as circumstances permitted, every cavalry soldier was armed with a sabre and revolver, and at least two squadrons in every regiment with carbines.

It was intended to assign at least one regiment of cavalry to each division of the active army, besides forming a cavalry reserve of the regular regiments, and some picket regiments of volunteer cavalry. Circumstances beyond my control rendered it impossible to carry out this intention fully, and the cavalry force, serving with the army in the field, was never as large as it ought to have been.

It was determined to collect the regular infantry to form the nucleus of a reserve. The advantage of such a body of troops at a critical moment, especially in an army constituted mainly of new levies, imperfectly disciplined, has been frequently illustrated in military history, and was brought to the attention of the country at the first battle of Manassas. I have not been disappointed in the estimate formed of the value of these troops. I have always found them to be relied on; whenever they have been brought under fire, they have shown the utmost gallantry and tenacity.

The regular infantry, which had been collected from distant posts, and which had been recruited as rapidly as the slow progress of recruiting for the regular service would allow, added to the small battalion with McDowell's army, which I found at Washington, on my arrival, amounted, on the 30th of August, to 1040 men; on the 28th of February, 1862, to 2682, and on the 30th of April, to 4603.

On the 17th of May, 1862, they were assigned to Gen. Porter's corps, for organization as a division with the 5th regiment of New York Volunteers, which joined, May 4th, and the 10th New York Volunteers, which joined subsequently. They remained from the commencement, under the command of Brig.-Gen. Geo. Sykes, Major 14th Infantry, U. S. Army.

ARTILLERY.

The creation of an adequate artillery establishment, for an army of so large proportions, was a formidable undertaking; and had it not been that the country possessed, in the regular service, a body of accomplished and ener-gular artillery officers, the task would have been almost hopeless.

The charge of organizing this most important army was confided to Major (afterwards Brig.-Gen.) W. M. F. Barry, Chief of Artillery, whose industry and zeal achieved the best results. The report of Gen. B. is appended among the accompanying documents. By referring to it, it will be observed that the following principles were adopted as the basis of organization:

"1st. That the proportion of artillery should be in the ratio of at least 2½ pieces to 1,000 men, to be expanded, if possible, to 3 pieces to 1,000 men.

"2d. That the proportion of rifled guns should be restricted to the system of the U. S. Ordnance Department, and of Parrott, and the smooth bores (with the exception of a few howitzers for special service) to be exclusively the 12-pounder gun, of the model of 1857, variously called the 'gun-howitzer,' the 'light 12-pounder,' or the 'Napoleon.'

"3d. That each field-battery should, if practicable, be composed of 6 guns, and none to be less than 4 guns, and in all cases the guns of each battery should be of uniform calibre.

"4th. That the field-batteries were to be assigned to divisions, and not to brigades, and in the proportion of 4 to each division, of which one was to be a battery of regulars, the remainder of volunteers, the captain of the regular battery to be the commandant of artillery of the division. In the event of several divisions constituting an army corps, at least one-half of the divisional artillery was to constitute the reserve of the corps.

"5th. That the artillery reserve of the whole army, should consist of 100 guns, and should comprise, besides a sufficient number of light 'mounted batteries,' all the guns of position, and until the cavalry was massed, all the horse artillery.

"6th. That the amount of ammunition to accompany the field batteries, was not to be less than 400 rounds per gun.

"7th. A siege train of 50 pieces. This was subsequently expanded—for special service at the siege of Yorktown—to very nearly 100 pieces, and comprised the unusual calibres, and enormously heavy weight of metal of 2 200-pounders; 5 100-pounders, and 10 thirteen-inch sea-coast mortars."

As has been before stated, the Chief of Artillery reports:

"The whole of the field-artillery of the army of the Potomac, July 28th, 1861, was comprised of 9 imperfectly equipped batteries of 36 guns, 650 men, and 400 horses. In March, 1862, when the whole army took the field, it consisted of 92 batteries of 520 guns, 12,500 men, and 11,000 horses, fully equipped, and in readiness for active field service. Of the whole force, 30 batteries were regulars, and 62 batteries volunteers. During the short period of seven months, all of this immense amount of material was issued by the Ordnance Department, and placed in the hands of the artillery troops after their arrival in Washington.

"About one-fourth of all the volunteer batteries brought with them from their respective States a few guns and carriages, but these were nearly all of such peculiar calibre, as to lack uniformity with the more modern and more serviceable ordnance, with which the other batteries were armed, and they, therefore, had to be withdrawn and replaced by more suitable material. While about one-sixth came supplied with horses and harness, less than one-tenth were apparently fully equipped for service when they reported, and every one of these required the supply of many deficiencies of material, and very extensive instruction in the theory and practice of their special arm.

"The operations on the Peninsula by the army of the Potomac, commenced with a full field-artillery force of 52 batteries of 299 guns. To this, must be added the field-artillery of Franklin's division, of McDowell's corps, which joined a few days before the capture of Yorktown, but was not disembarked from its transports for service until after the battle of Williamsburg; and the field-artillery of McCall's division, of McDowell's corps—4 batteries, 22 guns—which joined in June, a few days before the battle of Mechanicsville, (June 26th, 1862), making a grand total of field-artillery, at any time with the army of the Potomac of 60 batteries, of 343 guns. With this large force serving in six corps-d'armee of eleven divisions, and the artillery reserve, the only general and field-officers were 1 brigadier-general, 4 colonels, 3 lieutenant-colonels, and 3 majors; a number obviously insufficient, and which impaired, to a great degree, in consequence of the want of rank and official influence of the commanders of corps and division artillery, the efficiency of the arm. As this faulty organization can be suitably corrected only by legislative action, it is earnestly hoped that the attention of the proper authorities may be at an early day invited to it.

"When there were so many newly organized volunteer field-batteries, many of whom received their first and only instruction in the intrenched camps covering Washington, during the three or four inclement months of the winter of 1861-62, there was, of course, much to be improved. Many of the volunteer batteries, however, evinced such zeal and intelligence, and availed themselves so industriously of the instructions of the regular officers, their commanders and the example of the regular batteries, their associates, that they made rapid progress, and attained a degree of proficiency highly creditable."

The zeal and services of Major A. S. Webb, assistant to General Barry, entitle him to especial praise. At the close of the Peninsula

paign, General Barry assumed the duties hief of artillery of the defenses of Wash-on, and was relieved in his former position ol. H. J. Hunt, who had commanded the lery reserve with marked skill, and brought is duties as chief of artillery the highest ifications. The services of this distin-hed officer in re-organizing and re-fitting batteries prior to and after the battle of letam, and his gallant and and skillful con- on that field, merit the highest enconiums y power to bestow. His assistant, Major ll, deserves high credit for his services gallantry throughout both campaigns.

Detailed statement of the distribution of ous' regiments and batteries, as they ar-d in Washington at this period; and, also, ccount of the composition of the army on 15th of October, 1862, which are given in don's edition of the Report, are omitted in edition.]

n the 8th of March. 1862, the President di-ed, by the following order, the organization he active portion of the Army of the Poto-, into four army corps, and the formation fifth corps, from the divisions of Banks Shields. The following is the text of the sident's order:

Executive Mansion,
Washington, March 8th, 1862.

sident's General War Order, No. 2.

Ordered 1*st*. That the Major-General com-nding the Army of the Potomac, proceed, hwith, to organize that part of said army igned to enter upon active operations, (in-ling the reserve, but excluding the troops e left in the fortifications about Washing-), into four army corps, to be commanded ording to seniority of rank, as follows:

st Corps. To consist of four divisions, and e commanded by Maj.-Gen. I. McDowell.

d Corps. To consist of three divisions, and e commanded by Brig.-Gen. E. V. Sumner.

d Corps. To consist of three divisions, and e commanded by Brig.-Gen. S. P. Heintzel-n.

4th Corps. To consist of three divisions, and e commanded by Brig.-Gen. E. D. Keyes.

2d. That the divisions now commanded by officers above assigned to the commands army corps, shall be embraced in and form t of their respective corps.

3d. The forces left for the defense of Wash-ton, will be placed in command of Brig.-n. James Wadsworth, who shall also be litary Governor of the District of Columbia.

4th. That this order be executed with such omptness and dispatch, as not to delay the mmencement of the operations already di-ted to be undertaken by the Army of the tomac.

5th. A fifth army corps to be commanded by aj.-Gen. N. P. Banks, will be formed from his vn, and General Shields', late Gen. Lander's, vision.

A. LINCOLN.

The following order, which was made as soon as circumstances permitted, exhibits the steps taken to carry out the requirements of the Preisdent's War Order, No. 2:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac.
Fairfax Court House, Va., March 13, 1862.

General Orders, No. 101:

In compliance with the President's War Order, No. 2, of March 8th, 1862, the active portion of the army of the Potomac is formed into corps, as follows:

1*st. Corps*, Major-Gen. Irwin McDowell, to consist, for the present, of the divisions of Franklin, McCall, and King.

2*d. Corps*, Brig.-Gen. E. V. Sumner, divisions, Richardson, Blenker and Sedgwick.

3*d. Corps*, Brig.-Gen. S. P. Heintzelman, divisions, F. J. Porter, Hooker, and Hamilton.

4*th. Corps*, Brig.-Gen. E. D. Keyes, divisions, Couch, Smith, and Casey.

5*th. Corps*, Maj.-Gen. N. P. Banks, divisions, Williams and Shields.

The cavalry regiments attached to divisions, will, for the present remain so; subsequent orders will provide for these regiments, as well as for the reserve artillery, regular infantry, and regular cavalry.

Arrangements will be made to unite the divisions of each army corps, as promptly as possible. The commanders of divisions will at once report in person, or where that is impossible, by letter to the commander of their army corps. By command of

MAJ.-GEN. MCCLELLAN,
A. V. COLBURN, Ass't. Adjt.-Gen'l.

THE STAFF.

In a staff charged with labors so various and important as that of the army of the Potomac, a chief was indispensible to supervise the various departments, and to relieve the commanding general of details. The office of chief-of-staff, well known in European armies, had not been considered necessary in our small peace establishment. The functions of the office were not defined, and, so far as exercised, had been included in the adjutant-general's department. The small number of officers in this department, and the necessity for their employment in other duties, have obliged commanding generals during this war to resort to other branches of the service to furnish suitable chiefs-of-staff.

On the 4th of September, 1861, I appointed Colonel R. B. Marcy, of the inspector-general's department, chief-of-staff, and he entered upon service immediately, discharging the various and important duties with great fidelity, industry, and ability, from this period until I was removed from command at Rectortown.

Many improvements have been made during the war in our sysnem of staff administration; but much remains to be done.

Our own experience and that of other armies agree in determining the necessity for an efficient and able staff. To obtain this, our staff establishment should be based on correct principles and extended to be adequate to the necessities of the service, and should include a system of staff and line education.

The affairs of the adjutant-general's department, while I commanded the army of the Potomac, were conducted by Brig.-Gen. S. Williams, assisted by Lieut.-Col. James A. Hardie, A. D. C.

Their management of the department during the organization of the army, in the fall and winter of 1861, and during its subsequent operations in the field, was excellent.

They were, during the entire period, assisted by Capt. Rd. B. Irwin, A. D. C., and during the organization of the army by the following named officers:

Capt. Jos. Kirkland, A. D. C.; Capt. Arthur McClellan, A. D. C.; Capt. M. T. McMahon, A. D. C.; Capt. W. P. Mason, A. D. C.; Capt. W. F. Biddle, A. D. C.

My personal staff, when we embarked for the peninsula, consisted of—

Col. T. M. Key, additional A. D. C.; Col. E. H. Wright, do., and Major 6th U. S. Cavalry; Col. T. T. Gantt, add. A. D. C.; Col. J. J. Astor, Jr., volunteer aid-de-camp; Lieut.-Col. A. V. Colburn, add. A. D. C., and Captain in adjutant-general's department; Lieut.-Col. N. B. Sweitzer, add. A. D. C., and Capt. 1st U. S. Cavalry; Lieut.-Col. E. M. K. Hudson, add. A. D. C. and Capt. 14th U. S. Infantry; Lieut. Col. Paul Von Radowitz, add. A. D. C.; Maj. H. Von Hammerstein, add. A. D. C.; Maj. W. W. Russell, U. S. Marine Corps; Maj. F. Lecompte, of Swiss army, volunteer aid-de-camp; Capt. Jos. Kirkland, add. A. D.C.; Capt. Arthur McClellan, add. A. D. C.; Capt. L. P. D'Orleans, do.; Capt. R. D'Orleans, do.; Capt. M. T. McMahon; do.; Capt. W. P. Mason, Jr., do.; Capt. W. F. Biddle, do.; Catp. E. A. Raymond.

To this number I am tempted to add the Prince de Joinville, who constantly accompanied me through the trying campaign of the peninsula, and frequently rendered important service.

Of these officers, Capt. McMahon was assigned to the personal staff of Brig.-Gen. Franklin, and Capts. Kirkland and Mason to that of Brig.-Gen. F. J. Porter, during the siege of Yorktown: they remained subsequently with those general officers.

Before its termination, Capts. W. S. Abert and Chas. R. Lowell, of the 6th U. S. Cavalry, and Capt. G. A. Custer, 1st Lieut. 5th U. S. Cavalry, joined my staff as aids-de-camp, and remained with me until I was relieved from the command of the army of the Potomac.

All of these officers served me with great gallantry and devotion; they were ever rea to execute any service, no matter how dang ous, difficult, or fatiguing.

INSPECTOR GENERAL'S DEPARTMEN

The highly important duties of this depa ment were performed by Col. D. B. Sacket a Major N. H. Davis, to my entire satisfactic They introduced many valuable changes the system of inspections and in the forms reports, and so systematized the labors of t inspectors of corps and divisions that excelle results were obtained. The intelligent a energetic performance of their duties by the officers enabled me to keep myself well i formed of the condition of the troops and c rect evils promptly.

ENGINEERS.

When I assumed command of the Army the Potomac, I found Major J. G. Barnard, S. Engineers, subsequently Brig.-Gen. of v unteers, occupying the position of chief e gineer of the army. I continued him in t same office, and at once gave the necessa instructions for the completion of the defenc of the capital, and for the entire reorganiz tion of the department.

Under his direction the entire system defences was carried into execution. Th was completed before the army departed f Fort Monroe, and is a sufficient evidence the skill of the engineers and the diligent l bor of the troops.

For some months after the organization the army of the Potomac was commence there were no engineer troops with it; length, however, three companies were a signed. Under the skillful management Capt. J. C. Duane, U. S. Engineers, these ne companies rapidly became efficient, and, will be seen, rendered most valuable servic during the ensuing campaigns.

The number of engineer troops being entir ly inadequate to the necessities of the army an effort was made to partially remedy th defect, by detailing the 15th and 50th New Yor Volunteers, which contained many sailors an mechanics, as engineer troops. They were firs placed under the immediate superintendenc of Lieut.-Col. B. S. Alexander, U. S. Engineer by whom they were instructed in the dutie of pontooneers, and became somewhat familia with those of sappers and miners. Previou to the movement of the army for the Penin sula, this brigade was placed under the com mand of Brig.-Gen. D. P. Woodbury, Majo U. S. Engineers.

The labor of preparing the engineer an bridge trains devolved chiefly upon Capt Duane, who was instructed to procure th new model French bridge train, as I was satis fied that the India-rubber pontoon was entirel useless for the general purposes of a cam paign.

The engineer department presented the fol lowing complete organization when the army moved for the Peninsula:

Brig.-Gen. J. G. Barnard, Chief Engineer; Lieut. H. L. Abbott, Top. Engineers, A.D.C.; Brigade Vol. Engineers, Brig.-Gen. Woodbury, comm'g.; 15th New York Vols., Col. McLeod Murphy; 50th do., Col. C. B. Stewart; Battalion 3 Cos. U. S. Engineers, Capt. J. C. Duane, comm'g.

Companies respectively commanded by 1st Lieut. C. B. Reese, U. S. Engineers; 1st C. Cross, do.; 1st Lieut. O. E. Babcock, do.

The chief engineer was ably assisted in his duties by Lieut.-Col. B. S. Alexander, U. S. Engineers; 1st Lieut. C. R. Comstock, do.; 1st Lieut. M. D. McAlester, do.; 1st Lieut. Merrill, do.

Capt. C. S. Stewart, and 2d Lieut. F. U. Farquhar, U. S. Engineers, joined after the army arrived at Fort Monroe.

The necessary bridge equipage for the operations of a large army had been collected, consisting of batteaux with the anchors and boring material, (French model.) trestles and engineers' tools, with the wagons for their transportation.

The small number of officers of this corps available rendered it impracticable to detail engineers permanently at the headquarters of corps and divisions.

The companies of regular engineers never had their proper number of officers, and it was necessary, as a rule, to follow the principle of detailing engineer officers temporarily where ever their services were required.

TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS.

To the corps of Topographical Engineers was intrusted the collection of topographical information and the preparation of campaign maps. Until a short time previous to the departure of the army for Fort Monroe, Lieut.-Col. John W. Macomb, was in charge of this department, and prepared a large amount of valuable material. He was succeeded by Brig.-Gen. A. A. Humphreys, who retained the position throughout the peninsular campaign.

These offiers were assisted by Lieut. H. L. Abbot, Topographical Engineers; Lieut. O. G. Wagner, do.; Lieut. N. Bowen, do.; Lieut. John M. Wilson, do.; Lieut. James H. Wilson, do.

This number, being the greatest available, was so small that much of the duty of the department devolved upon parties furnished by Professor Bache, Superintendent of Coast Survey, and other gentlemen from civil life.

Owing to the entire absence of reliable topographical maps, the labors of this corps were difficult and ardous in the extreme. Notwithstanding the energy and ability displayed by General Humphreys, Lieut.-Col. Macomb and their subordinates, who frequently obtained the necessary information under fire, the movements of the army were sometimes unavoidably delayed by the difficulty of obtaining knowledge of the country in advance. The result of their labors has been the preparation of an excellent series of maps, which will be invaluable to any army traversing the same ground.

During the campaign it was impossible to draw a distinct line of demarcation between the duties of the two corps of engineers, so that the labors of reconnoissances of roads, of lines for trenches, of fields for battle, and of the positions of the enemy, as well as the construction of siege and defensive works, were habitually performed by detail from either corps as the convenience of the service demanded.

I desire to express my high appreciation of the skill, gallantry, and devotion displayed by the officers of both corps of engineers under the most trying circumstances.

During the Maryland campaign I united the two corps under Captain J. C. Duane, U. S. Engineers, and found great advantages from this arrangement.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

For the operations of the medical department I refer to the reports transmitted herewith, of Surgeon Chas. S. Tripler, and Surgeon Jonathan Letterman, who, in turn, performed the duties of medical director of the army of the Potomac: the former from August 12, 1861, until July 1, 1862, and the latter after that date.

The difficulties to be overcome, in organizing and making effective the medical department, were very great, arising principally from the inexperience of the regimental medical officers, many of whom were physicians taken suddenly from civil life, who, according to Surgeon Tripler, "had to be instructed in their duties from the very alphabet," and from the ignorance of the line officers as to their relations with the medical officers, which gave rise to confusion and conflict of authority.

Boards of examination were instituted, by which many incompetent officers were removed, and by the successive exertions of Surgeons Tripler and Letterman the medical corps was brought to a very high degree of efficiency.

With regard to the sanitary condition of the army while on the Potomac, Dr. Tripler says, that the records show a constantly increasing immunity from disease. "In October and November, 1861, with an army averaging 130,000 men, we had 7,932 cases of fever of all sorts; of these about 1,000 were reported as cases of typhoid fever. I knew that errors of diagnosis were frequently committed, and therefore this must be considered as the limit of typhoid cases. If any army in the world can show such a record as this, I do not know when or where it was assembled."

From September, 1861, to February, 1862, while the army was increasing, the number of sick decreased from 7 per cent. to 6.18 per cent.; of these, the men sick in the regimental and general hospitals, were less than one-half, the remainder were slight cases under treatment in quarters. "During this time, so far as rumor was concerned, the army was being decimated by disease every month."

Of the sanitary condition of the army during the peninsular campaign, up to its arrival at Harrison's Landing, Dr. Tripler says:

"During this campaign the army was favored with excellent health. No epidemic disease appeared. Those scourges of modern armies—dysentery, typhus, cholera—were almost unknown. We had some typhoid fever, and more malarial fevers; but even these never prevailed to such an extent as to create any alarm. The sick reports were sometimes larger than we cared to have them, but the great majority of the cases reported were such as did not threaten life, or permanent disability. I regret that I have not before me the retained copies of the monthly reports, so that I might give accurate statistics. I have endeavored to recover them, but have been unsuccessful. My recollection is that the whole sick report never exceeded 8 per cent. of the force, and this included all sorts of cases—the trivial as well as the severe. The army of the Potomac must be considered to have been the most healthy army in the service of the United States."

His remarks at the conclusion of his report upon our system of medical administration, and his suggestions for its improvement, are especially worthy of attention.

The severe labors and privations of the troops during the seven day's battles, had of course a great effect on the health of the army after it reached Harrison's Landing, increasing the number of sick to about 20 per cent. of the whole force.

The nature of the military operations had also unavoidably placed the medical department in a very unsatisfactory condition. Supplies had been almost entirely exhausted, or necessarily abandoned; hospital tents abandoned or destroyed; and the medical officers deficient in numbers and broken down by fatigue.

All the remarkable energy and ability of Surgeon Letterman were required to restore the efficiency of his department, but before we left Harrison's Landing he had succeeded in fitting it out throughout with the supplies it required, and the health of the army was vastly improved by the sanitary measures which were enforced at his suggestion.

The great haste with which the army was removed from the Peninsula, made it necessary to leave at Fort Monroe, to be forwarded afterwards, nearly all the baggage and transportation, including medical stores and ambulances, all the vessels being required to transport the troops themselves and their ammunition; and when the army of the Potomac returned to Washington, after General Pope's campaign, and the medical department came once more under Surgeon Letterman's control, he found it in a deplorable condition.

The officers were worn out by the labor they had performed, and the few supplies that had been brought from the Peninsula had been exhausted or abandoned, so that the work of reorganization and resupplying had to be again performed, and this while the army was moving rapidly and almost in the face of the enemy. That it was successfully accomplished is shown by the care and attention which the wounded received after the battles of South Mountain and Antietam.

Among the improvements introduced into his department by Surgeon Letterman, the principal are, the organization of an ambulance corps, the system of field-hospitals, and the method of supplying by brigades; all of which were instituted during the Maryland campaign, and have since proved very efficient.

QUARTER-MASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

On assuming command of the troops in and about Washington, I appointed Captain S. Van Vliet, A. Q. M., (afterwards Brigadier General,) Chief Quarter-master to my command and gave him the necessary instructions for organizing his department, and collecting the supplies requisite for the large army then called for.

The disaster at Manassas had but recently occurred, and the army was quite destitute of quarter-masters' stores.

General Van Vliet, with great energy and zeal, set himself about the task of furnishing the supplies immediately necessary, and preparing to obtain the still larger amounts which would be required by the new troops which were moving in large numbers towards the capital.

The principal depot for supplies in the city of Washington was under charge of Col. D. H. Rucker, A. Q. M., who ably performed his duties.

Lieut.-Col. R. Ingalls, A. Q. M., was placed in charge of the department on the south side of the Potomac. I directed a large depot for transportation to be established at Perryville, on the left bank of the Susquehanna, a point equally accessible by rail and water. Capt. C. G. Sawtelle, A. Q. M., had immediate charge of the transportation in and about Washington, as well as of the large number of horses purchased for the use of the artillery and cavalry. The principal difficulties which Gen. Van Vliet had to encounter arose from the inexperience of the majority of the officers of his department in the new regiments and brigades. The necessity of attending personally to minor details rendered his duties arduous and harassing in the extreme. All obstacles, however, were surmounted by the untiring industry of the chief-quarter master and his immediate subordinates, and when the army was prepared to move, the organization of the department was found to be admirable.

When it was determined to move the army to the peninsula, the duties of providing water transportation were devolved, by the Secretary

War, upon his assistant, the Hon. J. Tucker. he vessels were ordered to Alexandria, and ent.-Col. Ingalls was placed in immediate harge of the embarkation of the troops, transortation, and material of every description. perations of this nature on so extensive a ale had no parallel in the history of our ountry.

The arrangements of Lieut.-Col. Ingalls were erfected with remarkable skill and energy, nd the army and its material, were embarked nd transported to Fort Monroe in a very short pace of time, and entirely without loss.

During the operations on the Peninsula, until e arrival of troops at Harrison's Landing, en. Van Vliet retained the position of Chief uartermaster, and maintained the thorough rganization and efficiency of his department.

The principal depots of supplies were under he immediate charge of Lieut.-Col. Ingalls and ewtalle.

On the 10th of July, 1862, Gen. Van Vliet, aving requested to be relieved from duty ith the army of the Potomac, I appointed ieut.-Col. Ingalls Chief Quartermaster, and he ontinued to discharge the duties of that office uring the remainder of the Peninsular and he Maryland campaigns, in a manner which illy sustained the high reputation he had preiously acquired.

The immense amount of labor accomplished, ften under the most difficult circumstances, he admirable system under which the duties f the department were performed, and the ntire success which attended the efforts to upply so large an army, reflect the highest redit upon the officers upon whom these nerous duties devolved. The reports of Gen. an Vliet, and Lieut.-Col. Ingalls, with the accompanying documents, give, in detail, the istory of the department, from its organizaon until I was relieved from the command of he army of the Potomac.

SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT.

On the 1st of August, 1861, Colonel H. F. larke, C. S., joined my staff, and at once enterd upon his duties as Chief Commissary of the rmy of the Potomac. In order to realize the esponsibilities pertaining to this office, as well s to form a proper estimate of the vast amount f labor which must necessarily devolve upon s occupant, it is only necessary to consider he unprepared state of the country to engage n a war of such magnitude as the present, nd the lack of practical knowledge on the art of our officers, with reference to supplying and subsisting a large, and, at that time, n unorganized army. Yet, notwitstanding he existence of these great obstacles, the manner in which the duties of the commissary department were discharged, was such as to merit, and call forth the commendation of the entire army. During the stay of the army of he Potomac in the vicinity of Washington, prior to the Peninsular campaign, its subsistence was drawn chiefly from the depots which had been established by the commissary department at Washington, Alexandria, Forts Corcoran and Runyon. In the important task of designating and establishing depots of supplies, Colonel Clarke was ably seconded by his assistants, Col. Amos Beckwith, C. S., U. S A., Lieut.-Col. Geo. Bell, C. S., U. S. A., Lieut.-Col. A. P. Porter, C. S., U. S. A., Capt. Thomas Wilson, C. S., U. S. A., Capt Brownell Granger, C.S., U. S. Vols., Capt. W. H. Bell, C. S., U. S. A., Capt.. I H. Woodward, C. S., U. S. Vols., and Captain W. R. Murphy, C. S., U. S. Vols. For a full knowledge of the highly creditabe manner in which each and all of the above mentioned officers discharged their duties, I invite attention to the detailed report of Col. Clarke. The remarks and suggestions contained in this report, are worthy of attention, as affording valuable rules for the future guidance of the subsistence department, in supplying armies in the field. The success of the subsistence department of the army of the Potomac, was, in a great measure, attributable to the fact, that the subsistence department at Washington made ample previous provision for sending supplies to the peninsula, and that it always exercised the most intelligent foresight. It morever gave its advise and countenance to the officers charged with its duties and reputation in the field, and those officers, I am happy to say, worked with it and together, in perfect harmony, for the public good.

During the entire period that I was in command of the army of the Potomac there was no instance within my knowledge, where the troops were without their rations from any fault of the officers of this department.

ORDINANCE DEPARTMENT.

This very important branch of the service was placed under the charge of Capt. C. P. Kingsbury, ordnance corps, Colonel and A. D. C. Great difficulty existed in the proper organization of the department, from the want of a sufficient number of suitable officers to perform the duties at the various headquarters and depots of supply. But far greater obstacles had to be surmounted, from the fact that the supply of small arms was totally inadequate to the demands of a large army, and a vast proportion of those furnished, were of such inferior quality, as to be unsatisfactory to the troops, and condemned by their officers. The supply of artillery was more abundant, but of great variety. Rifled ordnance was just coming into use for the first time in this country, and the description of gnn and kind of projectile, which would prove most effective, and should therefore be adopted, was a mere matter of theory.

To obviate these difficulties, large quantities of small arms of foreign manufacture were contracted for; private enterprise in the construction of arms and ammunition was encouraged; and by the time the army was ordered to move to the peninsula, the amount of ordnance and ordnance stores was ample.

Much, also, had been done to bring the quality both of arms and ammunition, up to the proper standard, Boards of officers were in session continually, during the autumn and winter of 1861, to test the relative merits of new arms and projectiles. The reports of these boards, confirmed by subsequent experience in the field, have done much to establish the respective claims of different inventions and manufactories. During the campaigns of the Peninsula and Maryland, the officers connected with the department, were zealous and energetic, and kept the troops well supplied, notwithstanding the perplexing and arduous nature of their duties. One great source of perplexity, was the fact, that it had been necessary to issue arms of all varieties and calibres giving an equal diversity in the kinds of ammunition required. Untiring watchfulness was therefore incumbent upon the officers in charge to prevent confusion and improper distribution of cartridges. Colonel Kingsbnry discharged the duties of his office with great efficiency, until the —— of July, 1862, when his health required that he should be relieved. 1st Lieut. Thomas G. Baylor, ordnance corps, succeeded him, and peformed his duty during the remainder of the Peninsular and Maryland campaigns, with marked ability and success. The want of reports from Colonel Kingsbury and Lieut. Baylor, renders it impossible for me to enter, at all, into the details of the organization of the department.

PROVOST-MARSHAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Immediately after I was placed in command of the "Division of the Potomac" I appointed Col. Andrew Porter, 16th U. S. Infantry, Provost-Marshal of Washington. All the available regular infantry, a battery, and a squadron of cavalry, were placed under his command; and by his energetic action, he soon corrected the serious evils which existed, and restored order in the city.

When the army was about to take the field, General Porter was appointed Provost-Marshal General of the army of the Potomac, and held that most important position until the end of the Peninsular campaign, when sickness, contracted in the untiring discharge of his duties compelled him to ask to be relieved from the position he had so ably and energetically filled. The provost-marshal general's department had the charge of a class of duties, which had not before, in our service, been defined and grouped under the management of a special department. The following subjects indicate the sphere of this department:

Suppression of marauding and depredations and of all brawls and disturbances.

Preservation of good order and suppression of drunkenness beyond the limits of the camps.

Prevention of straggling on the march.

Suppression of gamb'ing-houses, drinking-houses, or bar-rooms and brothels.

Regulation of hotels, taverns, markets, and places of public amusement.

Searches, seizures and arrests.

Execution of sentences of general cou martial, involving imprisonment or cap punishment.

Enforcement of orders prohibiting the s of intoxicating liquors, whether by tradesm or sutlers, and of orders respecting passes.

Deserters from the army.

Prisoners of war taken from the enemy.

Countersigning safe-guards.

Passes to citizens, within the lines and purposes of trade.

Complaints of cititizens as to the conduct the soldiers.

General Porter was assisted by the follo ing named officers:

Major W. H. Wood, 17th U. S. Infantr Capt. James McMillan, A. A. A. G., U. S. Inf try; Capt. W. T. Gontry, 17th U. S. Infantr Capt. J. W. Forsyth, 18th U. S. Infantry; Lie J. W. Jones, 12th U. S. Infantry; Lieut. C. Trowbridge, 16th U. S. Infantry; Lieut. C. Mehaffey, 1st U. S. Infantry.

The provost guard was composed of the U. S. Cavalry, Major Pleasonton, and a ba talion of the 8th and 17th U. S. Infantry, Maj Willard.

After General Porter was relieved, Maj Wood was in charge of this department, un after the battle of Antietam, when Brigadie General Patrick was appointed Provost Ma shal General.

COMMANDANT OF GENERAL HEAD-QUARTERS.

When the army took the field, for the pu pose of securing order and regularity in th camp of headquarters, and for facilitating it movements, the office of commandant of ge eral headquarters was created, and assigned t Major G. O. Haller, 7th U. S. Infantry. Si companies of infantry were placed under hi orders for guard and police duty. Among th orders appended to this report, is the one de fining his duties, which were always satisfac torily performed.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE.

From August, 1861, the position of judge advocate was held by Col Thos. Gantt, A. D. C. until compelled by ill health to retire, at Har rison's Landing, in August, 1862. His reviews of the decisions of courts-martial during this period, were of great utility in correcting the practice in military courts, diffusing true notions of discipline and subordination, and setting before the army a high standard of soldierly honor.

Upon the retirement of Colonel Gantt, the duties of judge-advocate were ably performed by Col. Thomas M. Key, A. D. C.

SIGNAL CORPS.

The method of conveying intelligence and orders, invented and introduced into the service by Maj. Albert J. Myer, signal officer, U. S. A., was first practically tested in large operations, during the organization of the army of the Potomac.

Under the direction of Major Myer, a signal orps was formed by detailing officers and en from the different regiments of volun- ers, and instructing them in the use of the gs by day, and torches by night.

The chief signal officer was indefatigable in s exertions to render his corps effective, and soon became available for service, in every vision of the army.

In addition to the flags and torches, Major yer introduced a portable insulated tele- aph wire, which could be readily laid from oint to point, and which could be used under e same general system.

In front of Washington, and on the lower otomac, at any point within our lines not ached by the military telegraph, the great efulness of this system of signals was made anifest. But it was not until after the ar- val of the army upon the Peninsula, and uring the siege and battles of that, and the aryland campaign, that the great benefits to e derived from it on the field, and under fire, ere fully appreciated.

There was scarcely an action or skirmish which the signal corps did not render im- ortant services. Often, under heavy fire of rtillery, and not unfrequently while exposed musketry, the officers and men of this corps ave information of the movements of the nemy, and transmitted directions for the evo- utions of our own troops.

The report of the chief signal officer, with ccompanying documents, will give the details f the services of this corps, and call attention o those members of it who were particularly istinguished.

TELEGRAPHIC.

The telegraphic operations of the army of he Potomac were superintended by Major Thos. J. Eckert, and under the immediate di- ection of Mr. —— Caldwell, who was with he corps of operatives attached to my head- uarters during the entire campaigns upon he peninsula and in Maryland.

The services of this corps were arduous nd efficient. Under the admirable arrange- nents of Major Eckert they were constantly rovided with all the material for construct- ng new lines, which were rapidly estab- ished whenever the army changed position; nd it was not unfrequently the case that he operatives worked under fire from the nemy's guns, yet they invarialy performed ll the duties required of them with great lacrity and cheerfulness, and it was seldom that I was without the means of direct tele- graphic communication with the War Depart- ment, and with the corps commanders.

From the organization of the army of the Potomac, up to Nov. 1, 1862, including the Peninsular and Maryland campaigns, upwards of 1,200 miles of military telegraph lines had been constructed in connection with the operations of the army, and the number of peratives and builders employed was about 200.

To Professor Lowe, the intelligent and en- terprising aeronant, who had the management of the balloons, I was greatly indebted for the valuable information obtained during his ascensions.

I have more than once taken occasion to re- commend the members of my staff, both ge- neral and personal, for promotion and reward. I beg leave to repeat these recommendations, and to record their names in the history of the army of the Potomac as gallant soldiers, to whom their country owes a debt of gratitude, still unpaid, for the courage, ability and un- tiring zeal they displayed during the eventful campaigns in which they bore so prominent a part.

POSITION OF THE ARMY, OCT., 1862.

On the 15th of October, the main body of the army of the Potomac was in the immedi- ate vicinity of Washington, with detachments on the left bank of the Potomac as far down as Liverpool Point, and as far up as Williams- port and its vicinity. The different divisions were posted as follows:

Hooker, at Budd's Ferry, lower Potomac; Heintzelman, at Fort Lyon and vicinity; Frank- lin, near the Theological Seminary; Blenker, near Hunter's Chapel; McDowell, at Upton's Hill and Arlington; F. J. Porter, at Hall's and Miner's Hills; Smith, at Mckall's Hill; McCall, at Langley; Buell, at Tenallytown, Meridian Hill, Emory's Chapel, &c., on the left bank of the river; Casey at Washington; Hunt's Ar- tillery, do.; Banks, at Darnstown, with De- tachments at Point of Rocks, Sandy Hook, Williamsport, &c.; Stone at Poolesville; Dix, at Baltimore, with detachments on the eastern shore.

THE AFFAIR AT BALL'S BLUFF.

On the 19th of October, 1861, Gen. McCall marched to Drainesville with his division, in order to cover reconnoissances to be made in all directions the next day, for the purpose of learning the position of the enemy, and of covering the operations of the topographical engineers in making maps of that region.

On the 20th, acting in concert with Gen. McCall, Gen. Smith pushed strong parties to Freedom Hill, Vienna, Flint Hill, Peacock Hill, &c., to accomplish the same purpose in that part of the front.

These reconnoissances were successful.

On the morning of the 20th I received the following telegram from Gen. Banks' head- quarters:

DARNESTOWN, Oct. 20, 1861.

GEN. MARCY.

SIR,—The signal station at Sugar Loaf tele- graphs that the enemy have moved away from Leesburg. All quiet here.

R. M. COPELAND, A. A. G.

Whereupon I sent to Gen. Stone, at Poles- ville, the following telegram:

CAMP GRIFFIN, Oct. 20, 1861.

Brig.-Gen. C. P. STONE, Poolesville:

Gen. McClellan desires me to inform you that Gen. McCall occupied Drainesville, yesterday, and is still there. Will send out heavy reconoissances to-day in all directions from that point. The general desires that you keep a good lookout on Leesburg, to see if this movement has the effect to drive them away. Perhaps a slight demonstration on your part would have the effect to move them.

A. V. COLBURN, Ass'-Adj.-Gen.

Deeming it possible that Gen. McCall's movement to Drainesville, together with the subsequent reconnoissances, might have the effect of inducing the enemy to abandon Leesburg, and the dispatch from Sugar Loaf appearing to confirm this view, I wished Gen. Stone, who had only a line of pickets on the river, the mass of his troops being out of, and beyond range from the Virginia bank, to make some display of intention to cross, and also to watch the enemy more closely than usual. I did not direct him to cross, nor did I intend that he should cross the river in force for the purpose of fighting.

The above dispatch was sent on the 20th, and reached Gen. Stone as early as 11 A. M. of that day. I expected him to accomplish all that was intended on the same day; and this he did, as will be seen from the following dispatch received at my headquarters in Washington, from Poolesville, on the evening of October 20th.

To MAJ.-GEN. MCCLELLAN:

Made a feint of crossing at this place this afternoon, and at the same time started a reconnoitring party towards Leesburg from Harrison's Island. The enemy's pickets retired to intrenchments. Report of reconnoitring party not yet received. I have means of crossing 125 men once in ten minutes at each of two points. River falling slowly.

C. P. STONE, Brig. Gen.

As it was not foreseen or expected that Gen. McCall would be needed to co-operate with Gen. Stone in any attack, he was directed to fall back from Drainsville to his original camp near Prospect Hill, as soon as the required reconnoissances were completed. Accordingly he left Drainesville on his return at about 8 1-2 A. M. of the 21st, reaching his old camp at about 1 P. M.

In the meantime I was surprised to hear from Gen. Stone that a portion of his troops were engaged on the Virginia side of the river, and at once sent instructions to Gen. McCall to remain at Drainesville if he had not left before the order reached him.

The order did not reach him until his return to his camp at Langley. He was then ordered to rest his men, and hold his division in readiness to return to Drainesville at a moments notice, should it become necessary.

Similar instructions were given to other divisions during the afternoon.

The first intimation I received from Gen. Stone of the real nature of his movements was in a telegram as follows:

Edward's Ferry, 11.10 A. M. Oct. 2

Maj.-Gen. McClellan,—

The enemy have been engaged opposi Harrison's Island. Our men are behaving a mirably.

C. P. STONE, Brigadier-Gen.

Darnstown, Oct. 21, 1861, 2 P.

Gen. R. B. Marcy,—

Gen. Stone safely crossed the river th morning. Some engagements have taken plac on the other side of the river; how importa is not known.

R. M. COPELAND, A. A. A. G.

Gen. Stone sent the following dispatches o the same day at the hours indicated:

Edwards' Ferry, Oct. 21, 1861, 2. P

Maj.-Gen. McClellan,—

There has been sharp firing on the right our line, and our troops appear to be advanc ing there under Baker. The left under Go man, has advanced its skirmishers nearly on mile, and if the movement continues successfu will turn the enemy's right.

C. P. STONE, Brigadier-General.

Edward' Ferry, Oct. 21st. 1861, 4 P. M.

Gen. McClellan,—

Nearly all my force is across the river. Ba ker on the right, Gorman on the left, righ sharply engaged.

C. P. STONE, Brigadier-General.

Edward's Ferry, Oct. 21, 1861, 9.30 P. M

Maj.-Gen. McClellan,—

I am occupied in preventing further disas ter, and trying to get into position to redeem We have lost some of our best commanders— Baker dead, Cogswell a prisoner, or secreted The wounded are being carefully and rapidly removed, and Gorman's wing is being cautiously withdrawn. Any advance from Drainesville must be made cautiously. All was reported going well up to Baker's death, but in the confusion following that, the right wing was outflanked. In a few hours I shall, unless a night attack is made, be in the same position as last night, save the loss of many good men.

C. P. STONE, Brigadier-General.

Although no more fully informed of the state of affairs, I had, during the afternoon, as a precautionary measure, ordered Gen. Banks to send one Brigade to the support of the troops at Harrison's Island, and to move with the other two to Seneca Mills, ready to support Gen. Stone if necessary. The 9.30 P. M dispatch of Gen. Stone did not give me an entire understanding of the state of the case. Aware of the difficulties, and perhaps fatal consequences of recrossing such a river as the Potomac after a repulse, and from these telegrams supposing his whole force to be on the Virginia side, I directed Gen. Stone to intrench himself, and hold the Virginia side at all hazards until re-enforcements could arrive, when he could safely withdraw to the Maryland side or hold his position on the Virginia side, should that prove advisable.

Gen. Banks was instructed to move the rest of his division to Edward's Ferry, and to send over as many men as possible before daylight, to re-enforce Stone. He did not arrive in time to effect this, and was instructed to collect all the canal boats he could find, and use them for crossing at Edwards' Ferry in sufficient force to enable the troops already there to hold the opposite side.

On the 22d I went to the ground in person, and reaching Poolesville learned for the first time the full details of the affair.

The following extracts from the evidence of Gen. Stone before the "Committee on the Conduct of the War," on the 5th of January, 1862, will throw further light on this occurrence.

Gen. Stone says he received the orders from my headquarters, to make a slight demonstration, at about 11 o'clock A.M of the 20th, and that in obedience to that order he made the demonstration on the evening of the same day.

In regard to the reconnoissance on the 21st, which resulted in the battle of Ball's Bluff, he was asked the following questions:

"Question. Did this reconnoissance originate with yourself, or had you orders from the General-in-Chief to make it?"

To which he replied: "It originated with myself—the reconnoissance."

"Question. The order did not proceed from General McClellan?"

"Answer. I was directed, the day before, to make a demonstration. That demonstration was made the day previous."

"Question. Did you receive an order from the General-in-Chief to make the reconnoissance?"

"Answer. No, sir."

Making a personal examination on the 22d I found that the position on the Virginia side at Edward's Ferry was not a tenable one, but did not think it wise to withdraw the troops by daylight. I therefore caused more artillery to be placed in position on the Maryland side, to cover the approaches to the ground held by us, and crossed the few additional troops that the high wind permitted us to get over, so as to be as secure as possible against any attack during the day. Before night-fall, all the precautions were taken to secure an orderly and quiet passage of the troops and guns. The movement was commenced soon after dark, under the general supervision of Gen. Stone, who received the order for the withdrawal at 7.15 P.M. By 4 A.M. of the 24th every thing had reached the Maryland shore in safety.

A few days afterwards I received information, which seems to be authentic, to the effect that large bodies of the enemy had been ordered from Manassas to Leesburg, to cut off our troops on the Virginia side. Their timely withdrawal had probably prevented a still more serious disaster. I refer to Gen. Stone's Report of this battle furnished to the War Department, and his published testimony before the "Committee on the Conduct of the War" for further details.

THE NORTH CAROLINA EXPEDITION.

The records of the War Department show my anxiety and efforts to assume active offensive operations in the fall and early winter. It is only just to say, however, that the unprecedented condition of the roads and Virginia soil would have delayed an advance till February had the discipline, organization and equipment of the army been as complete at the close of the fall as was necessary, and as I desired and labored, against every impediment, to make them. While still in command only of the army of the Potomac, namely, in early September, I proposed the formation of a corps of New Englanders for coast service in the bays and inlets of the Chesapeake and Potomac to co-operate with my own command, from which most of its material was drawn.

On the 1st of November, however, I was called to relieve Lieut.-Gen. Scott in the chief and general command of the armies of the Union. The direction and nature of this coast expedition, therefore, were somewhat changed, as will soon appear in the original plan submitted to the Secretary of War, and the letter of instructions later issued to Gen. Burnside, its commander. The whole country indeed had now become the theatre of military operations from the Potomac to and beyond the Mississippi, and to assist the Navy in perfecting and sustaining the blockade, it became necessary to extend those operations to points on the sea-coast, Roanoke Island, Savannah, and New Orleans. It remained also to equip and organize the armies of the West, whose condition was little better than that of the army of the Potomac had been.

The direction of the campaigns in the West, and of the operations upon the sea-board enabled me to enter upon larger combinations, and to accomplish results the necessity and advantage of which had not been unforeseen, but which had been beyond the ability of the single army formerly under my command, to effect.

The following letters and a subsequent paper addressed to the Secretary of War sufficiently indicate the nature of those combinations to minds accustomed to reason upon military operations.

HEADQUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
WASHINGTON, Sept. 6, 1861.

Hon. SIMON CAMERON, Secretary of War.

SIR: I have the honor to suggest the following proposition, with the request that the necessary authority be at once given me to carry it out; to organize a force of two brigades of five regiments each of New England men, for the general service—but particularly adapted to coast service. The officers and men to be sufficiently conversant with boat service to manage steamers, sailing vessels, launches, barges, surf boats, floating batteries, &c. To charter or buy for the command a sufficient number of propellers or tug-boats for transportation of men and supplies, the machinery of which should be amply protected by timber: the vessels to have permanent experienced officers from the merchant service, but to be manned by details from the command. A naval officer to be attached to the staff of the commanding officer. The flank companies of each regiment to be armed with Dahlgren boat-guns, and carbines with water-proof cartridges; the other companies to have such arms as I may hereafter designate, to be uniformed and equipped as the Rhode Island regiments are. Launches and floating batteries, with timber parapets of sufficient capacity to land or bring into action the entire force.

The entire management and organization of the force to be under my control, and to form an integral part of the army of the Potomac.

The immediate object of this force is for operations in the inlets of Chesapeake Bay and the Potomac: by enabling me thus to land troops at points where they are needed—this force can also be used in conjunction with a naval force operating against points on the sea-coast. This coast division to be commanded by a general officer of my selection. The regiments to be organized as other land forces. The disbursements for vessels, &c., to be made by the proper department of the army, upon the requisitions of the general commanding the division, with my approval.

I think the entire force can be organized in thirty days, and by no means the least of the advantages of this proposition is the fact, that it will call into the service a class of men who would not otherwise enter the army.

You will immediately perceive that the object of this force is to follow along the coast, and up the inlets and rivers, the movements of the main army when it advances.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen. Comdg.

Owing chiefly to the difficulty in procuring the requisite vessels, and adapting them to the special purposes contemplated, this expedition was not ready for service until January, 1862.

Then in the chief command I deemed it best to send it to North Carolina with the design indicated in the following letter:

General:—In accordance with verbal instructions heretofore given you—you will, after uniting with flag-officer Goldsborough, at Fort Monroe, proceed under his convey to Hatteras Inlet, where you will in connection with him, take the most prompt measures for crossing the fleet over the bulkhead into the waters of the sound. Under the accompanying general order constituting the Department of North Carolina, you will assume command of the garrison at Hatteras Inlet, and make such dispositions in regard to that place, as your ulterior operations may render necessary—always being careful to provide for the safety of that very important station in any co[n]tingency.

It is presumed that the navy can reduce th[e] batteries on the marshes, and cover the land[ing] of your troops on the main island b[y] which, in connection with a rapid movemen[t] of the gun-boats to the northern extremity—as soon as the marsh battery is reduced—may be hoped to capture the entire garriso[n] of the place. Having occupied the island an[d] its dependencies, you will at once proceed t[o] the erection of the batteries and defenses n[e]cessary to hold the position with a small forc[e] should the flag-officer require any assistanc[e] in seizing or holding the debouches of th[e] canal from Norfolk—you will please afford [it] to him.

The commodore and yourself having com[-]pleted your arrangments in regard to Roanok[e] Island, and the waters north of it; you wi[ll] please at once make a descent on Newbern[,] having gained possession of which, and th[e] railroad passing through it you will at onc[e] throw a sufficient force upon Beaufort, an[d] take the steps necessary to reduce Fort Maco[n] and open that port. When you seize New[-]bern, you will endeavor to seize the railroa[d] as far west as Goldsborough—should circum[-]stances favor such a movement. The tempe[r] of the people, the rebel force at hand, &c., wi[ll] go far towards determining the question as t[o] how far west the railroad can be occupied an[d] held. Should circumstances render it advis[a]ble to seize and hold Raleigh—the main nort[h] and south line of railroad passing throug[h] Goldsborough, should be so effectually de[-]troyed for considerable distances north an[d] south of that point, as to render it impossibl[e] for the rebels to use it to your disadvan[-]tage. A great point would be gained in an[y] event, by the effectual destruction of the Wi[l]mington and Weldon Railroad.

I would advise great caution in moving s[o] far into the interior as upon Raleigh. Hav[-]ing accomplished the objects mentioned—th[e] next point of interest would probably be Wi[l]mington, the reduction of which may requir[e] that additional means shall be afforded you[.] I would urge great caution in regard to pro[-]clamations. In no case would I go beyond [a] moderate joint proclamation with the naval commander, which should say as little as pos[-]sible about politics or the negro, merely stat[e] that the true issue for which we are fighting is the preservation of the Union, and uphold[-]ing the laws of the general government, and stating that all who conduct themselves pro[-]perly, will as far as possible be protected in their persons and property.

You will please report your operations as often as an opportunity offers itself

With my best wishes for your success.

Maj. Gen. Com'g. in Chief.

OPERATIONS IN THE WEST AND SOUTH.

The following letters of instructions were ent to Generals Halleck, Buell, Sherman and Butler; and I also communicated verbally to hese officers my views in full, regarding the ield of operations assigned to each, and gave hem their instructions as much in detail as vas necessary at that time.

Head-Quarters of the Army.
Washington, D. C., November 11, 1861.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. Halleck, U. S. A.
Comd'g. Dept. of Missouri.

GEEERAL:—In assigning you to the command of the Department of Missouri, it is probably necessary for me to state that I have entrusted to you a duty which requires the utmost tact and decision.

You have not merely the ordinary duties of a military commander to perform; but the far more difficult task of reducing chaos to order, of changing probably the majority of the personnel of the staff of the department, and of reducing to a point of economy consistent with the interests and necessities of the state, a system of reckless expenditure and fraud perhaps unheard of before in the history of the world.

You will find in your department many general and staff-officers holding illegal commissions and appointments not recognized or approved by the President or Secretary of War, you will please at once inform these gentlemen of the nulity of their appointment, and see that no pay or allowances are issued to them until such time as commissions may be authorized by the President, or Secretary of War.

If any of them give the slightest trouble you will at once arrest him and send him under guard, out of the limits of your department, informing them that if they return they will be placed in close confinement. You will please examine into the legality of the organization of the troops serving in the department. When you find any illegal, unusual, or improper organizations you will give to the officers and men an opportunity to enter the legal military establishment under general laws and orders from the War Department; reporting in full to these head-quarters any officer or organization that may decline.

You will please cause competent and reliable staff officers to examine all existing contracts immediately, and suspend all payments upon them until you receive the report in each case. Where there is the slightest doubt as to the propriety of the contract, you will be good enough to refer the matter with full explanation to these head-quarters, stating in each case what would be a fair compensation for the services or materials rendered under the contract. Discontinue at once the reception of material or services under any doubtful contract. Arrest and bring to prompt trial all officers who have in any way violated their duty to the government. In regard to the political conduct of affairs, you will please labor to impress upon the inhabitants of Missouri and the adjacent States, that we are fighting solely for the integrity of the Union, to uphold the power of our national government and to restore to the nation the blessings of peace and good order.

With respect to military operations, it is probable, from the best information in my possession, that the interests of the government will be best served by fortifying and holding in considerable strength, Rolla, Sedalia and other interior points, keeping strong patrols constantly moving from the terminal stations, and concentrating the mass of the troops on or near the Mississippi, prepared for such ulterior operations as the public interests may demand.

I would be glad to have you make, as soon as possible, a personal inspection of all the important points in your department and report the result to me. I cannot too strongly impress upon you the absolute necessity of keeping me constantly advised of the strength, condition, and location of your troops, together with all facts that will enable me to maintain that general direction of the armies of the United States which it is my purpose to exercise. I trust to you to maintain thorough organization, discipline and economy throughout your department. Please inform me, as soon as possible, of everything relating to the gunboats now in process of construction, as well as those completed.

The militia force authorized to be raised by the State of Missouri for its defence, will be under your orders. I am, General, &., &c.,

GEO. B. MCCLELLAN, M. G. Com. U. S.

BRIG.-GEN. D. C. BUELL: Nov. 7, 1861.

General,—In giving you instructions for your guidance, in command of the department of the Ohio, I do not design to fetter you. I merely wish to express plainly the general ideas which occur to me in relation to the conduct of operations there. That portion of Kentucky west of the Cumberland River is, by its position, so closely related to the States of Illinois and Missouri that it has seemed best to attach it to the Department of Missouri. Your operations, then, in Kentucky will be confined to that portion of the State east of the Cumberland River. I trust I need not repeat to you that I regard the importance of the territory committed to your care as second only to that occupied by the army under my immediate command. And it is absolutely necessary that we shall hold all the State of Kentucky; not only that, but that the majority of its inhabitants shall be warmly in favor of our cause, it being that which best subserves their interests. It is possible that the conduct of our political affairs in Kentucky is more important than that of our military operations. I certainly cannot over estimate the importance of the former. You will please constantly bear in mind the precise issue for which we are fighting—that issue is the preservation of the Union, and the restoration of the authority of the general government over all portions of our territory. We shall most readily suppress this rebellion and restore the authority of the government by religiously respecting the constitutional rights of all. I know that I express the feelings and opinions of the President when I say that we are fighting only to preserve the integrity of the Union and the constitutional authority of the general government.

The inhabitants of Kentucky may rely upon it, that their domestic institutions will in no manner be interfered with, and that they will receive at our hands every constitutional protection. I have only to repeat that you will in all respects, carefully regard the local institutions of the region in which you command, allowing nothing but the dictates of military necessity to cause you to depart from the spirit of these instructions.

So much in regard to political considerations. The military problem would be a simple one, could it be entirely separated from political influences; such is not the case. Were the population among which you are to operate, wholly or generally hostile, it is probable that Nashville should be your first and objective point. It so happens that a large majority of the inhabitants of Eastern Tennessee, are in favor of the Union; it therefore seems proper that you should remain on the defensive on the line from Louisville, while you throw the mass of your forces, by rapid marches, by Cumberland Gap, or Walker's Gap, on Knoxville, in order to occupy the railroad at that point, and thus enable the loyal citizens of Eastern Tennessee to use, while you at the same time cut off, the railway communication between eastern Virginia and the Mississippi.

It will be prudent to fortify the pass, before leaving it in your rear. I am, &c.,

GEO. B. McCLELLAN, M. G. Com., U. S. A.

Headq's of the Arm y, Washington, Nov. 12, '61.

Brig.-Gen. D. C. BUELL, Com. Dep. of the Ohio:

General,—Upon assuming command of the department, I will be glad to have you make, as soon as possible, a careful report of the condition of your command. The main point to which I desire to call your attention, is the necessity of entering eastern Tennessee as soon as it can be done with reasonable chances of success, and I hope that you will, with the least possible delay, organize a column for that purpose, sufficiently guarding, at the same time, the main avenues by which the rebels might invade Kentucky. Our conversations on the subject of military operations have been so full, and my confidence in your judgment is so great, that I will not dwell further on the subject, except to urge upon you the necessity of keeping me fully informed as to the state of affairs, both military and political, and your movements.

In regard to political matters, bear in mi that we are fighting only to preserve the tegrity of the Union, and to uphold the ge ral government; as far as military necessi will permit, religiously respect the consti tional rights of all. Preserve the stricte discipline among the troops, and while e ploying the utmost energy in military mov ments, be careful so to treat the unarmed habitants as to contract, not widen, the brea existing between us and the rebels. I me by this, that it is the desire of the governme to avoid unnecessary irritation by causele arrests and persecution of individuals. Whe there is good reason to believe that perso are actually giving aid, comfort, or inform tion to the enemy, it is, of course, necessa to arrest them; but I have always found it the tendency of subordinates to make vex tious arrests on mere suspicion. You w find it well to direct that no arrest shall l made except by your order, or that of yo generals, unless in extraordinary cases, alwa holding the party making the arrest respo sible for the propriety of his course. It shou be our constant aim to make it apparent to a that their property, their comfort, and the personal safety, will be best preserved by a hering to the cause of the Union.

If the military suggestions I have made this letter prove to have been founded erroneous data, you are, of course, perfect free to change the plan of operations. I a &c., &c., G. B. McCLELLAN, M. G. Com., U. S. Headq's of the Army, Washington, Feb. 14, '6 B.-Gen. P. W. SHERMAN, C'g. at Port Royal, &c

General,—Your dispatches, in regard to t occupation of Dafuskie Island, &c., were r ceived to-day. I saw also to-day, for the fir time, your requisition for a siege train for S vannah.

After giving the subject all the consider tion in my power, I am forced to the concl sion that, under present circumstances, t siege and capture of Savannah do not promi results comensurate with the sacrifices nece sary. When I learned that it was possible f the gun-boats to reach the Savannah Riv above Fort Pulaski, two operations suggeste themselves to my mind, as its immediate r sults.

First. The capture of Savannah by a 'cou de main,' the result of an instantaneous a vance and attack by the army and navy.

The time for this has passed, and your le ter indicates that you are not accountable fo the failure to seize the propitious momen but that, on the contrary, you perceived it advantages.

Second. To isolate Fort Pulaski, cut off it supplies, and at least facilitate its reductio by a bombardment.

Although we have a long delay to deplore, th second course still remains open to us; and strongly advise the close blockade of Pulask and its bombardment as soon as the 13-inc mortars and heavy guns reach you. I am confident you can thus reduce it. With Pulaski, you gain all that is really essential; you obtain complete control of the harbor, you relieve the blockading fleet, and render the main body of your force disposable for other operations.

I do not consider the possession of Savannah worth a siege, after Pulaski is in our hands. But the possession of Pulaski is of the first importance. The expedition to Fernandina is well, and I shall be glad to learn that it is ours.

But, after all, the greatest moral effect would be produced by the reduction of Charleston and its defences. There the rebellion had its birth; there the unnatural hatred of our government is most intense; there is the centre of the boasted power and courage of the rebels. To gain Fort Sumter, and hold Charleston, is a task well worthy of our greatest efforts, and considerable sacrifices. That is the problem I would be glad to have you study. Some time must elapse before we can be in all respects ready to accomplish that purpose. Fleets are en route, and armies in motion, which have certain preliminary objects to accomplish before we are ready to take Charleston in hand. But the time will before long arrive when I shall be prepared to make that movement. In the mean time, it is my advice and wish that no attempt be made upon Savannah, unless it can be carried with certainty by a coup de main.

Please concentrate your attention and forces upon Pulaski, and Fernandina. St. Augustine might as well be takeh by way of interlude, while awaiting the preparations for Charleston. Success attends us everywhere at present. Very truly yours, G. B. McC,, Maj. G. C. U. S. A.

Head-Qnarters of the Army, Washington, Feb. 23, 1862. Maj.-General B. F. Butler, U. S. Volunteers.—

GENERAL:—You are assigned to the command of the land forces destined to co-operate with the navy, in the attack upon New Orleans. You will use every means to keep your destination a profound secret, even from your staff officers, with the exception of your chief of staff, and Lieut. Weitzel, of the engineers. The force at your disposal, will consist of the first 13 regiments named in your memorandum handed to me in person, the 21st Indiana, 4th Wisconsin, and 6th Michigan, (old and good regiments from Baltimore.)

The 21st Indiana, 4th Wisconsin, and 6th Michigan, will await your orders at Fort Monroe.

Two companies of the 21st Indiana, are well drilled as heavy artillery. The cavalry force already en route for Ship Island, will be sufficient for your purposes.

After full consultation with officers well acquainted with the country in which it is proposed to operaie, I have arrived at the conclusion that (2) two light batteries fully equipped, and (1) one without horses, will be all that are necessary.

This will make your force about 14,400 infantry, 275 cavalry, 680 artillery; total 15 255 men.

The commanding general of the Department of Key West, is authorized to loan you, temporarily, 2 regiments; Fort Pickens can probably give you another, which will bring your force to nearly 18,000.

The object of your expedition is one of vital importance, the capture of New Orleans. The route selected is up the Mississippi River, and the first obstacle to be encountered, (perhaps the only one), is in the resistance offered by Forts St. Philip and Jackson. It is expected that the navy can reduce these works; in that case, you will, after their capture leave a sufficient garrison in them to render them perfectly secure; and it is recommended, that on the upward passage, a few heavy guns, and some troops, be left at the Pilot Station, (at the forks of the river), to cover a retreat in the event ot a disaster. These troops and guns, will, of course, be removed as soon as the forts are captured.

Should the navy fail to reduce the works, you will land your forces and siege train, and endeavor to breach the works, silence their fire, and carry them by assault.

The next resistance will be near the English Bend, where there are some earthen batteries; here it may be necessary for you to land your troops and co-operate with the naval attack, although it is more than probable, that the navy, unassisted, can accomplish the result. If these works are taken the city of New Orleans necessarily falls. In that event, it will probably be best to occupy Algiers with the mass of your troops, also, the eastern bank of the river above the city, it may be necessary to place some troops in the city to preserve order, but if there appears sufficient Union sentiment to control the city, it may be best for purposes of discipline, to keep your men out of the city.

After obtaining possession of New Orleans, it will be necessary to reduce all the works guarding its approaches from the east, and particularly to gain the Manchac Pass. Baton Rouge, Berwick Bay, and Fort Livingston will next claim yonr attention.

A feint on Galveston may facilitate the objects we have in view. I need not call your attention to the neceesity of gaining possession of all the rolling stock you can on the different railways, and of obtaining control of the roads themselves. The occupation of Baton Rouge by a combined naval and land force, should be accomplished as soon as possible after you have gained New Orleans. Then endeavor to open your communication with the northern column by the Mississippi, always bearing in mind the necessity of occupying Jackson, Mississippi, as soon as you can safely do so, either after, or before you have effected the junction. Allow nothing to divert you from obtaining full possession of all the approaches to New Orleans. When that object is accomplished to its fullest extent, it will be necessary to make a combined attack on Mobile, in order to gain possession of the harbor and works, as well as to control the railway terminus at the city.

In regard to this, I will send more detailed instructions as ths operations of the northern column develop themselves.

I may briefly state that the general objects of the expedition are: First, The reduction of New Orleans and all its approaches; then Mobile and its defenses; then Pensacola, Galveston, &c. It is probable that by the time New Orleans is reduced it will be in the power of the government to reinforce the land forces sufficiently to accomplish all these objects; in the meantime you will please give all the assistance in your power to the army and navy commanders in your vicinity, never losing sight of the fact, that the great object to be achieved is the capture and firm retention of New Orleans. I am, &c., G. B. McC. M. G. C. U. S. A.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

The plan indicated in the above letters comprehended in its scope the operations of all the armies in the Union—the army of the Potomac as well. It was my intention, for reasons easy to be seen, that its various parts should be carried out simultaneously, or nearly so, and in co-operatian along our whole line. If this plan was wise, and events have failed to prove that it was not, then it is unnecessary to defend any delay which would have enabled the army of the Potomac to perform its share in the execution of the whole work.

But about the middle of January, 1862, upon recovering from a severe illness, I found that excessive anxiety for an immediate movement of the army of the Potomac had taken possession of the minds of the administration.

A change had just been made in the War Department, and I was soon urged by the New Secretary, Mr. Stanton, to take immediate steps to secure the reopening of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and to free the banks of the lower Potomac from the rebel batteries which annoyed passing vessels.

Very soon after his entrance upon office, I laid before him, verbally, my designs as to the part of the plan of campaign to be executed by the army of the Potomac, which was to attack Richmond by the lower Chesapeake.

He instructed me to develop it to the President, which I did. The result was, that the President disapproved it, and by an order of January 31, 1862 substituted one of his own.

On the 27th of January, 1862, the following order was issued without consultation with me.

Executive Mansion, Washingtoc, Jan. 27, 1862. President's General War Order, No. 1.

Ordered: That the 22d day of February, 1862, be the day for a general movement the land and naval forces of the United Sta against the insurgent forces. That, especia the army at and about Fortress Monroe, army of the Potomac, the army of West Virginia, the army near Mumfordsville, K tucky, the army and flotilla at Cairo, and naval force in the Gulf of Mexico, be ready move on that day.

That all other forces, both land and nav with their respective commanders, obey exi ing orders for the time, and be ready to ob additional orders when duly given.

That the heads of departments, and espe ally the Secretaries of War and of the Nav with all their subordinates, and the General-i Chief, with all other commanders and subo dinates of land and naval forces, will several be held to their strict and full responsibilitie for prompt execution of this order.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The order of January 31, 1862, is as follows

PRESIDENT'S SPECIAL WAR ORDERS, No. 1.

Ordered: That all the disposable force of th army of the Potomac, after providing safely fo the defense of Washington, be formed into a expedition for the immediate object of seizin and occupying a point upon the railroad south westward of what is known as Manassas Junc tion, all details to be in the discretion of th Commander-in-Chief, and the expedition to mov before or on the 22d day of February next.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

I asked his excellency whether this order wa to be regarded as final, or whether I could b permitted to submit, in writing, my objection to his plan, and my reasons for preferring my own. Permission was accorded, and I therefore prepared the letter to the Secretary of Wa which is given below. Before this had been submitted to the President, he addressed the following note:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, FEB. 3, 1862.

MAJ.-GEN. MCCLELLAN—My Dear Sir: You and I have distinct and different plans for a movement of the army of the Potomac. Yours to be done by the Chesapeake, up the Rappahannock to Urbana, and across and to the terminus of the railroad on the York River: mine to move directly to a point on the railraad southwest of Manassas.

If you will give me satisfactory answers to the following questions, I shall gladly yield my plan to yours.

1st. Does not your plan involve a greatly larger expenditure of time and money than mine? 2d. Wherein is a victory more certain by your plan than mine? 3d. Wherein is a victory more valuable by your plan than mine? 4th. In fact, would it not be less valuable in this; that it would break no great line of the enemy's communications, while mine would? 5th. In case of disaster, would not a retreat be more difficult by your plan than mine? Yours truly, A. LINCOLN.

These questions were substantially answered by the following letter of the same date to the Secretary of War.

Headquarters of the Army, Washington, Feb. 3, 1862. Hon. E. M. STANTON, Sec'y of War: Sir,—I ask your indulgence for the following paper rendered necessary by circumstances.

I assumed command of the troops in the vicinity of Washington on Saturday, July 27, 1861, six days after the Battle of Bull Run. I found no army to command; a mere collection of regiments, cowering on the banks of the Potomac, some perfectly raw, others dispirited by the recent defeat. Nothing of any consequence had been done to secure the southern approaches to the capital by means of defensive works—nothing whatever had been undertaken to defend the avenues to the city on the northern side of the Potomac. The troops were not only undisciplined, undrilled, and dispirited; they were not even placed in military positions—the city was almost in a condition to have been taken by a dash of a regiment of cavalry.

Without one day's delay I undertook the difficult task assigned to me; that task the Hon. Secretary knows was given to me without my solicitation or foreknowledge. How far I have accomplished it will best be shown by the past and the present. The capital is secure against attack; the extensive fortifications erected by the labor of our troops enable a small garrison to hold it against a numerous army; the enemy have been held in check; the State of Maryland is securely in our possession; the detached counties of Virginia are again within the pale of our laws—and all apprehension of trouble in Delaware is at an end: the enemy are confined to the positions they occupied before the disaster of the 21st July; more than all this, I have now under my command a well drilled and reliable army, to which the destinies of the country may be confidently committed: this army is young and untried in battle—but it is animated by the highest spirit, and is capable of great deeds. That so much has been accomplished and such an army created, in so short a time, from nothing, will hereafter be regarded as one of the highest glories of the administration and the nation. Many weeks, I may say many months ago, this army of the Potomac was fully in condition to repel any attack; but there is a vast difference between that and the efficiency required to enable troops to attack successfully an army elated by victory and intrenched in a position long since selected, studied and fortified. In the earliest papers I submitted to the President, I asked for an effective and movable force far exceeding the aggregate now on the banks of the Potomac. I have not the force I asked for. Even when in a subordinate position, I always looked beyond the operations of the army of the Potomac: I was never satisfied in my own mind with a barren victory—but looked to combined and decisive operations. When I was placed in command of the armies of the United States, I immediately turned my attention to the whole field of operations, regarding the army of the Potomac as only one, while the most important, of the masses under my command. I confess that I did not then appreciate the total absence of a general plan, which had before existed—nor did I know that utter disorganization and want of preparation pervaded the Western armies. I took it for granted that they were nearly, if not quite, in condition to move toward the fulfillment of my plans; I acknowledge that I made a great mistake. I sent at once, with the approval of the Executive, officers I considered competent to command in Kentucky and Missouri — their instructions looked to prompt movements—I soon found that the labor of creation and organization had to be performed there; transportation, arms, clothing, artillery discipline, all were wanting: these things required time to procure them. The generals in command have done their work most creditably—but we are still delayed. I had hoped that a general advance could be made during the good weather of December; I was mistaken. My wish was to gain possession of the Eastern Tennessee Railroad as a preliminary movement—then to follow it up immediately by an attack on Nashville and Richmond, as nearly at the same time as possible. I have ever regarded our true policy as being that of fully preparing ourselves, and then seeking for the most decisive results. I do not wish to waste life in useless battles—but I prefer to strike at the heart. Two bases of operations seem to present themselves for the advance of the army of the Potomac. 1st. That of Washington, its present position, involving a direct attack upon the intrenched positions of the enemy at Centreville, Manassas, &c., or else a movement to turn one or both flanks of those positions: or a combination of the two plans. The relative force of the two armies will not justify an attack on both flanks; an attack on his left flank alone involves a long line of wagon communication, and cannot prevent him from collecting for the decisive battle all the detachments now on his extreme right and left. Should we attack his right flank by the line of the Occoquan, and a crossing of the Potomac below that river and near his batteries, we could, perhaps, prevent the junction of the enemy's right with his centre (we might destroy the former), we would remove the obstructions to the navigation of the Potomac, reduce the length of wagon transportation by establishing new depots at the nearest points of the Potomac, and strike more directly his main railway communication.

The fords of Occoquan, below the mouth of Bull Run, are watched by the rebels; batteries are said to be placed on the heights in rear, (concealed by the woods,) and the arrangement of his troops is such that he can oppose some considerable resistance to a passage of that stream. Information has just been received, to the effect that the enemy are intrenching a line of heights, extending from the vicinity of Sangsters, (Union Mills), towards Evansport. Early in January Sprigg's Ford was occupied by Gen. Rhodes, with 3,600 men and eight guns. There are strong reasons for believing that Davis's Ford is occupied. These circumstances indicate, or prove that the enemy anticipates the movement in question, and is prepared to resist it. Assuming, for the present, that this operation is determined upon, it may be well to examine briefly its probable progress. In the present state of affairs, our columns (for the movement of so large a force must be made in several columns, at least five or six,) can reach the Accotink without danger; during the march thence to the Occoquan, our right flank becomes exposed to an attack from Fairfax Station, Sangsters, and Union Mills: this danger must be met by occupying, in some force, either the two first-named places, or, better, the point of junction of the roads leading to the village of Occoquan. This occupation must be sustained so long as we continue to draw supplies by the roads from this city, or until a battle is won.

The crossing of the Occoquan should be made at all the fords from Wolf's Run to the mouth, the points of crossing not being necessarily confined to the fords themselves. Should the enemy occupy this line in force we must, with what assistance the flottilla can afford, endeavor to force the passage near the mouth, thus forcing the enemy to abandon the whole line, or be taken in flank himself.

Having gained the line of the Occoquan, it would be necessary to throw a column, by the the shortest route, to Dumfries, partly to force the enemy to abandon his batteries on the Potomac, partly to cover our left flank against an attack from the direction of Acquia; and, lastly, to establish our communication with the river by the best roads, and thus give us new depots. The enemy would by this time have occupied the line of the Occoquan above Bull Run, holding Brentsville in the force, and perhaps extending his lines somewhat further to the south-west.

Our next step would be to prevent the enemy from crossing the Occoquan between Bull Run and the Broad Run, to fall upon our right flank, while moving on Brentsville. This might be effected by occupying Bacon Race Church and the cross-roads near the mouth of Bull Run, or still more effectually, by moving to the fords themselves, and preventing him from debouching on our side.

These operations would possibly be resisted, and it would require some time to effect them. As nearly, at the same time, as possible, we should gain the fords necessary to our purposes above Broad Run. Having secured our right flank, it would become necessary to carry Brentsville at any cost, for we could not leave it between our right flank and the main body. The final movement on the railroad must be determined by circumstance existing at the time.

This brief sketch brings out in bold relief the great advantage possessed by the enemy in the strong central position he occupies with roads diverging in every direction, and a strong line of defence, enabling him to remain on the defensive, with a small force on one flank, while he concentrates everything on the other for a decisive action.

Should we place a portion of our force in front of Centreville, while the rest crosses the Occoquan, we commit the error of dividing our army by a very difficult obstacle, and by a distance too great to enable the two parts to support each other, should either be attacked by the masses of the enemy, while the other is held in check.

I should, perhaps, have dwelt more decidedly on the fact that the force left near Sangsters must be allowed to remain somewhere on that side of the Occoquan, until the decisive battle is over, so as to cover our retreat, in the event of disaster; unless it should be decided to select and intrench a new base somewhere near Dumfries, a proceeding involving much time.

After the passage of the Occoquan by the main army, this covering force could be drawn in to a more central and less exposed position, say Brimstone Hill, or nearer the Occoquan.

In this latitude the weather will, for a considerable period, be very uncertain, and a movement commenced in force on roads in tolerably firm condition, will be liable, almost certain, to be much delayed by rains and snow. It will, therefore, be next to impossible to surprise the enemy, or take him at a disadvantage by rapid manœuvres. Our slow progress will enable him to divine our purposes, and take his measures accordingly. The probability is, from the best information we possess, that the enemy has improved the roads leading to his line of defence, while we will have to work as we advance.

Bearing in mind what has been said, and the present unprecedented and impassable condition of the roads, it will be evident that no precise period can be fixed upon for the movement on this line. Nor can its duration be closely calculated; it seems certain that many weeks may elapse, before it is possible to commence the march. Assuming the success of this operation, and the defeat of the enemy as certain, the question at once arises, as to the importance of the results gained. I think these results would be confined to the possession of the field of battle, the evacuation of the line of the upper Potomac by the enemy, and the moral effect of the victory; important results, it is true, but not decisive of the war, nor securing the destruction of the enemy's main army, for he could fall back upon other positions and fight us again and again, should the condition of the troops permit. If he is in no condition to fight us again out of range of the intrenchments at Richmond, we would find it a very difficult and tedious matter to follow him up there, for he would destroy his railroad bridges, and otherwise impede our progress through a region where the roads are as bad as they well can be, and we would probably find ourselves forced, at last, to change the whole theatre of war, or to seek a shorter land route to Richmond, with a smaller available force, and at an expenditure of much more time than were we to adopt the short line at once. We would also have forced the enemy to concentrate his forces, and perfect his measures at the very point where it is desirable to strike him when least prepared.

II. The second base of operations available for the army of the Potomac, is that of the lower Chesapeake Bay, which affords the shortest possible land route to Richmond, and strikes directly at the heart of the enemy's power in the east.

The roads in that region are passable at all seasons of the year.

The country now alluded to is much more favorable for offensive operations than that in front of Washington, (which is very unfavorable,) much more level, more cleared land, the woods less dense, the soil more sandy, the spring some two or three weeks earlier. A movement in force on that line obliges the enemy to abandon his intrenched position at Manassas, in order to hasten to cover Richmond and Norfolk. He must do this; for should he permit us to occupy Richmond, his destruction can be averted only by entirely defeating us in a battle, in which he must be the asssilant. This movement, if successful, gives us the capital, the communications, the supplies of the rebels; Norfolk would fall; all the waters of the Chesapeake would be ours, all Virginia would be in our power; and the enemy forced to abandon Tennessee and North Carolina. The alternative presented to the enemy would be to beat us in a position selected by ourselves; disperse or pass beneath the Caudine Forks.

Should we be beaten in a battle, we have a perfectly secure retreat down the Peninsula upon Fort Monroe, with our flanks perfectly covered by the fleet. During the whole movement our flank is covered by the water, our right is secure, for the reason that the enemy is too distant to reach us in time; he can only oppose us in front; we bring our fleet in full play.

After a successful battle, our position would be, Burnside forming our left, Norfolk held securely, our centre connecting Burnside with Buell, both by Raleigh and Lynchburg, Buell in Eastern Tennessee and Northern Alabama, Halleck at Nashville and Memphis.

The next movement would be to connect with Sherman on the left, by reducing Wilmington and Charleston; to advance our centre into South Carolina and Georgia, to push Buell either towards Montgomery, or to unite with the main army in Georgia, to throw Halleck southward to meet the naval expedition from New Orleans.

We should then be in a condition to reduce at our leisure, all the southern seaports; to occupy all the avenues of communication, to use the great outlet of the Mississippi; to re-establish our government and arms in Arkansas, Louisiana and Texas; to force the slaves to labor for our subsistence, instead of that of the rebels; to bid defiance to all foreign interference. Such is the object I ever had in view; this is the general plan which I hope to accomplish.

For many long months, I have labored to prepare the army of the Potomac to play its part in the programme; from the day when I was placed in command of all our armies, I have exerted myself to place all the other armies in such a condition, that they too could perform their allotted duties.

Should it be determined to operate from the lower Chesapeake, the point of landing which promises the most brilliant results, is Urbana, on the lower Rappahannock. This point is easily reached by vessels of heavy draught, it is neither occupied nor observed by the enemy, it is but one march from West Point, the key of that region, and thence but two marches to Richmond. A rapid movement from Urbana, would probably cut off Magruder in the Peninsula, and enable us to occupy Richmond before it could be strongly reinforced. Should we fail in that, we could, with the co-operation of the navy, cross the James and show ourselves in rear of Richmond, thus forcing the enemy to come out and attack us, for his position would be untenable, with us on the southern bank of the river.

To reach whatever point may be selected as a base, a large amount of cheap water transportation must be collected, consisting mainly of canal-boats, barges, wood-boats, schooners, &c., towed by small steamers, all of a very different character from those required for all previous expeditions. This can certainly be accomplished within thirty days from the time the order is given. I propose as the best possible plan that can, in my judgment, be adopted, to select Urbana as a landing-place for the first detatchments. To transport by water four divisions of infantry with their batteries, the regular infantry, a few wagons, one bridge train, and a few squadrons of cavalry, making the vicinity of Hooker's position the place of embarkation for as many as possible. To move the regular cavalry and reserve artillery

the remaining bridge trains and wagons to a point somewhere near Cape Lookout, then ferry them over the river by means of North River ferry-boats, march them over to the Rappahannock (covering the movement by an infantry force near Heathsville) and to cross the Rappahannock in a similar way. The expense and difficulty of the movement will thus be very much diminished (a saving of transportation of about 10,000 horses) and the result none the less certain.

The concentration of the cavalry, &c., in the lower counties of Maryland, can be effected without exci ing suspicion, and the movement made without delay from that cause.

This movement, if adopted, will not at all expose the city of Washington to danger.

The total force to be thrown upon the new line would be, according to circumstances, from 110 to 140,000. I hope to use the latter number by bringing fresh troops into Washington, and still leaving it quite safe. I fully realize that in all projects offered, time will probably be the most valuable consideration. It is my decided opinion, that in that point of view, the second plan should be adopted. It is possible, nay highly probable, that the weather and state of the roads, may be such as to delay the direct movement from Washington, with its unsatisfactory results and great risks—far beyond the time required to complete the second plan. In the first case we can fix no definite time for an advance. The roads have gone from bad to worse—nothing like their present condition has ever been known here before; they are impassible at present, we are entirely at the mercy of the weather. It is by no means certain that we can beat them at Manassas. On the other line, I regard success as certain by all the chances of war. We demoralize the enemy by forcing him to abandon his prepared position for one which we have chosen, in which all is in our favor, and where success must produce immense results.

My judgment as a general, is clearly in favor of this project. Nothing is certain in war, but all the chances are in favor of this movement. So much am I in favor of the southern line of operations, that I would prefer the move from Fort Monroe as a basè—as a certain though less brilliant movement, than that from Urbana—to an attack upon Manassas.

I knew that his Excellency the President, you and I, all agree in our wishes, and that these wishes are to bring the war to a close, as promptly as the means in our possession will permit. I believe that the mass of the people have entire confidence in us. I am sure of it. Let us then look only to the great result to be accomplished, and disregard everything else. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, G. B. McC., M. G. C.

This letter must have produced some effect upon the mind of the President, since the execution of his order was not required, although it was not revoked as formally as it had been issued. Many verbal conferences ensued, in which among other things, it was determined to collect as many canal-boats as possible, with a view to employ them largely in the transportation of the army to the lower Chesapeake. The idea was at one time entertained by the President to use them in forming a bridge across the Potomac, near Liverpool Point, in order to throw the army over at that point, but this was subsequently abandoned. It was also found by experience, that it would require much time to prepare the canal-boats for use in transportation to the extent that had been anticipated.

Finally, on the 27th of February, 1862, the Secretary of War, by the authority of the President, instructed Mr. John Tucker, Assistant Secretary of War, to procure at once the necessary steamers and sailing craft to transport the army of the Potomac to its new field of operations.

The following extracts from the report of Mr. Tucker, dated April 5th, will show the nature and progress of this well-executed service:

"I was called to Washington by telegraph on 17th January last, by Assistant-Secretary of War Thomas A Scott. I was informed that Maj.-Gen. McClellan wished to see me. From him I learned that he desired to know if transportation on smooth water could be obtained, to move at one time, for a short distance, about 50,000 troops, 10,000 horses, 1,000 wagons, 13 batteries, and the usual equipment of such an army. He frankly stated to me, that he had always supposed such a movement entirely feasible until two experienced quarter-masters had recently reported it impracticable, in their judgment. A few days afterwards, I reported to Gen. McClellan that I was entirely confident the transports could be commanded, and stated the mode by which his object could be accomplished. A week or more afterwards, I had the honor af an interview with the President and Gen. McClellan, when the subject was further discussed, and especially as to the time required.

I expressed the opinion, that as the movement of the horses and wagons would have to be made chiefly by schooners and barges, that as each schooner would require to be properly fitted for the protection of the horses, and furnished with a supply ot water and forage, and each transport for the troops provided with water, I did not deem it prudent to assume that such an expedition could start within thirty days from the time the order was given.

The President and Gen. McClellan both urgently stated the vast importance of an earlier movement. I replied that if favorable winds prevailed, and there was great dispatch in loading, the time might be materially diminished.

On the 14th of February, [Secretary of War] advertised for transports of various descriptions, inviting bids. On the 27th February I was informed that the proposed movement by water was decided upon. That evening the quarter-master-general was informed of the decision. Directions were given to secure the transportation, and my assistance was tendered.

"He promptly detailed to this duty two most efficient assistants in his department: Col. Rufus Ingalls was stationed at Annapolis, where it was then proposed to embark the troops, and Capt. Henry C. Hodges was directed to meet me in Philadelphia, to attend to chartering the vessels. With these arrangements, I left Washington on the 28th February.

"I beg to hand herewith a statement, prepared by Capt. Hodges, of the vessels chartered, which exhibits the prices paid, and the parties from whom they were taken, viz.:

"113 Steamers, at an average price per day $215 10
188 Schooners " " . . 24 45
88 Barges " " . . 14 27

"In thirty-seven days from the time I received the order in Washington, (and most of it was accomplished in thirty days,) these vessels transported from Perryville, Alexandria, and Washington, to Fort Monroe—(the place of departure having been changed, which caused delay)—121,500 men; 14,592 animals; 1,150 wagons; 44 batteries; 74 ambulances; besides pontoon bridges, telegraph materials, and the enormous quantity of equipage, &c., required for an army of such magnitude. The only loss of which I have heard, is eight mules and nine barges, which latter went ashore in a gale within a few miles of Fort Monroe, the cargoes being saved. With this trifling exception, not the slightest accident has occurred, to my knowledge.

"I respectfully, but confidently, submit that, for economy and celerity of movement, this expedition is without a parallel on record.

"John Tucker, Ass't-Sec. of War."

THE ENEMY'S BATTERIES ON THE POTOMAC.

In the meantime the destruction of the batteries on the lower Potomac, by crossing our troops opposite them, was considered, and preparations were even made for throwing Hooker's division accross the river to carry them by assault. Finally, however, after an adverse report from Brig.-Gen. J. G. Barnard, chief engineer, given below, who made a reconnoissance of the positions; and in view of the fact that it was still out of the power of the navy department to furnish suitable vessels to co-operate with the land troops, this plan was abandoned as impracticable. A close examination of the enemy's works and their approaches, made after they were evacuated, showed that the decision was a wise one. The only means, therefore, of accomplishing the capture of these works, so much desired by the President, was by a movement by land, from the left of our lines, on the right, bank of the Potomac, a movement obviously unwise.

The attention of the Navy Department, as early as Aug. 12, 1861, had been called to the necessity of maintaining a strong force of efficient war vessels on the Potomac.

Headq's, Div'n. Potomac, Wash., Aug. 12, 1861.
Hon. Gid. Welles, Sec. U. S. Navy:

Sir,—I have, to-day, received additional information which convinces me that it is more than probable that the enemy will, within a very short time, attempt to throw a respectable force from the mouth of Acquia Creek into Maryland. This attempt will probably be preceded by the erection of batteries at Mathias and White House Points. Such a movement on the part of the enemy, in connection with others probably designed, would place Washington in great jeopardy. I most earnestly urge that the strongest possible naval force be at once concentrated near the mouth of Acquia Creek, and that the most vigilant watch be maintained day and night, so as to render such passage of the river, absolutely impossible.

I recommend that the Minnesota, and any other vessels available from Hampton Roads, be at once ordered up there, and that a great quantity of coal be sent to that vicinity, sufficient for several weeks' supply. At least one strong war vessel should be kept at Alexandria; and I again urge the concentration of a strong naval force in the Potomac without delay.

If the naval department will render it absolutely impossible for the enemy to cross the river below Washington, the security of the capital will be greatly increased.

I cannot too earnestly urge an immediate compliance with these requests.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your ob't serv't,
G. B. McClellan, M.-G. Com'g.

It was on the 27th Sept'r., 1861, that Gen. Barnard, chief engineer, in company with Capt. Wyman, of the Potomac Flotilla, had been instructed to make a reconnoissance of the enemy's batteries as far as Mathias Point. In his report of his observations, he says:—"Batteries at High Point and Cockpit Point, and thence down to Chopawampsic, cannot be prevented. We may, indeed, prevent their construction on certain points, but along here, somewhere, the enemy can establish, in spite of us, as many batteries as he chooses. What is the remedy? Favorable circumstances, not to be anticipated nor made the basis of any calculations, might justify and render successful the attack of a peculiar battery. To suppose that we can capture all, and by mere attacks of this kind prevent the navigation being molested, is very much the same as to suppose that the hostile army in our own front can prevent us building and maintaining field-works to protect Arlington and Alexandria, by capturing them one and all as fast as they are built."

In another communication upon the subject of crossing troops for the purpose of destroying the batteries on the Virginia side of the Potomac, Gen. Barnard says:

"The operation involves the forcing of a very strong line of defence of the enemy, and all that we would have to do, if we were really opening a campaign against them there. "It is true we hope to force this line by turning it, by landing on Freestone Point.

"With reason to believe that this may be successful, it cannot be denied that it involves a risk of failure.

"Should we then, considering all the consequences which may be involved, enter into the operation merely to capture the Potomac batteries? I think not.

"Will not the Erricson, assisted by one other gun-boat, capable of keeping along side these batteries, so far control their fire as to keep the navigation sufficiently free as long as we require it? Capt. Wyman says yes."

It was the opinion of competent naval officers, and I concur with them, that had an adequate force of strong and well armed vessels been acting upon the Potomac from the beginning of August, it would have been next to impossible for the rebels to have constructed or maintained batteries upon the banks of the river. The enemy never occupied Mathias Point, nor any other point on the river, which was out of supporting distance from their main army.

When the enemy commenced the construction of these batteries, the army of the Potomac was not in condition to prevent it; their destruction by our army would have afforded but a temporary relief, unless we had been strong enough to hold the entire line of the Potomac. This could be done either by driving the enemy from Manassas and Aquia Creek by main force, or by manœuvring to compel them to evacuate their positions. The latter course was finally pursued, and with success.

THE BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

About the 20th of Feb., 1862, additional measures were taken to secure the re-opening of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The preliminary operations of Gen. Lander for this object are elsewhere described.

I had often observed to the President, and to members of the Cabinet, that the reconstruction of this railway could not be undertaken, until we were in a condition to fight a battle to secure it. I regarded the possession of Winchester and Strasburg as necessary to cover the railway in rear, and it was not until the month of February, that I felt prepared to accomplish this very desirable, but not vital purpose.

The whole of Bank's division, and two brigades of Sedgwick's division, were thrown across the river at Harper's Ferry, leaving one brigade of Sedgwick's division to observe and guard the Potomac from Great Falls to the mouth of the Monocacy. A sufficient number of troops of all arms, were held in readiness in the vicinity of Washington, either to march via Leesburg, or to move by rail to Harper's Ferry, should this become necessary in carrying out the objects in view. The subjoined notes from a communication subsequently addressed to the War Department, will sufficiently explain the conduct of these operations.

NOTES:—"When I started for Harper's Ferry, I plainly stated to the President and Secretary of War, that the chief object of the operation would be to open the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, by crossing the river in force at Harper's Ferry; that I had collected the material for making a permanent bridge by means of canal-boats; that from the nature of the river, it was doubtful whether such a bridge could be constructed; that if it could not, I would at least occupy the ground in front of Harper's Ferry, in order to cover the rebuilding of the railroad bridge, and finally, when the communications were perfectly secure, move on Winchester.

When I arrived at the place, I found the batteau bridge nearly completed; the holding ground proved better than had been anticipated, the weather was favorable, there being no wind. I at once crossed over the two brigades which had arrived, and took steps to hurry up the other two, belonging respectively to Bank's and Sedgwick's divisions. The difficulty of crossing supplies had not then become apparent. That night I telegraphed for a regiment of regular cavalry and four batteries of heavy artillery, to come up the next day (Thursday) besides directing Keyes's division of infantry to be moved up on Friday.

Next morning the attempt was made to pass the canal-boats through the lift lock, in order to commence at once the construction of a permanent bridge; it was then found for the first time that the lock was too small to permit the passage of the boats, it having been built for a class of boats running on the Shenandoah Canal, and too narrow by some four or six inches for the canal-boats. The lift locks above and below are all large enough for the ordinary boats. I had seen them at Edward's Ferry thus used: it had always been represented to the engineers by the military railroad employees and others, that the lock was large enough, and the difference being too small to be detected by the eye, no one had thought of measuring it, or suspected any difficulty. I thus suddenly found myself unable to build the permament bridge. A violent gale had arisen, which threatened the safety of our only means of communication; the narrow approach to the bridge was so crowded and clogged with wagons, that it was very clear that under existing circumstances nothing more could be done than to cross over the baggage and supplies of the two brigades: of these, instead of being able to cross both during the morning, the last arrived only in time to go over just before dark. It was evident that the troops under orders, would only be in the way, should they arrive, and that it would not be possible to subsist them for a rapid march for Winchester. It was therefore deemed necessary to countermand the order, content ourselves with covering the reopening of the railroad for the present, and in the mean time use every exertion to establish, as promptly as possible, depots of forage and subsistence on the Virginia side, to supply the troops and enable them to move on Winchester, independently of the bridge. The next day (Friday) I sent a strong reconnoissance to Charleston, and under its protection went there myself. I then determined to hold that place, and to move the troops composing Lander's and Williams' commands at once on Martinsburg and Bunker Hill, thus effectually covering the reconstruction of the railroad.

"Having done this, and taken all the steps in my power to ensure the rapid transmission of supplies over the river, I returned to this city, well satisfied with what had been accomplished. While up the river I learned that the President was dissatisfied with the state of affairs—but on my return here, understood from the Sec. of War, that, upon learning the whole state of the case, the President was fully satisfied. I contented myself, therefore, with giving to the Secretary a brief statement about as I have written it here."

The design aimed at was entirely compassed, and before the first of April, the date of my departure for the Peninsula, the railroad was in running order. As a demonstration upon the left flank of the enemy, this movement no doubt assisted in determining the evacuation of his lines on the eighth and ninth of March.

PREPARATIONS TO MOVE FROM WASHINGTON.

Upon my return from Harper's Ferry, on the 28th of Feb., the preparations necessary to carry out the wishes of the President and Sec. of War. in regard to destroying the batteries on the lower Potomac, were at once undertaken. Mature reflection convinced me that this operation would require the movement of the entire army, for I felt sure that the enemy would resist it with his whole strength. I undertook it with great reluctance, both on account of the extremely unfavorable condition of the roads, and my firm conviction that the proposed movement to the lower Chesapeake would necessarily, as it subsequently did, force the enemy to abandon all his positions in front of Washington. Besides, it did not forward my plan of campaign to precipitate this evacuation by any direct attack, nor to subject the army to needless loss of life and material, by a battle near Washington, which could produce no decisive results. The preparations for a movement towards the Occoquan, to carry the batteries, were, however, advanced as rapidly as the season permitted, and I had invited the commanders of divisions to meet at headquarters on the 8th of March, for the purpose of giving them their instructions, and receiving their advice and opinions in regard to their commands, when an interview with the President indicated to me the possibility of a change in my orders.

His Excellency sent for me at a very early hour on the morning of the 8th, and renewed his expressions of dissatisfaction with the affairs at Harper's Ferry, and with my plans for the new movement down the Chesapeake. Another recital of the same facts which had before given satisfaction to his Excellency, again produced, as I supposed, the same result. The views which I expressed to the President were reinforced by the results of a meeting of my general officers at headquarters. At that meeting, my plans were laid before the division commanders, and were approved by a majority of those present. Nevertheless, on the same day, two important orders were issued by the President, without consultation with me. The first of these was the General War Order No. 2, directing the formation of army corps, and assigning their commanders.

I had always been in favor of the principle of an organization into army corps, but preferred deferring its practical execution, until some little experience in campaign, and on the field of battle, should show what general officers were most competent to exercise these high commands; for it must be remembered, that we then had no officers whose experience in war, on a large scale, was sufficient to prove that they possessed the necessary qualifications. An incompetent commander of an army corps, might cause irreparable damage, while it was not probable that an incompetent division commander could cause any very serious mischief. These views had frequently been expressed by me to the President and members of the Cabinet; it was, therefore, with as much regret as surprise, that I learned the existence of this order.

The first order has been given above, the second order was as follows:

Executive Mansion, Washington, March 8, '62.
President's General War Order, No. 3.

Ordered: That no change of the base of operations of the army of the Potomac, shall be made without leaving in and about Washington such a force as, in the opinion of the General-in-Chief, and the commanders of army corps, shall leave said city entirely secure.

That no more than two army corps (about fifty thousand troops) of said army of the Potomac, shall be moved en route for a new base of operations, until the navigation of the Potomac, from Washington to the Chesapeake Bay, shall be freed from enemy's batteries, and other obstructions, or until the President shall hereafter give express permission.

That any movement, as aforesaid, en route for a new base of operations, which may be ordered by the General-in-Chief, and which may be intended to move upon the Chesapeake Bay, shall begin to move upon the bay as early as the 18th of March inst., and the Gen.-in-Chief shall be responsible that it so moves as early as that day.

Ordered: That the army and navy co-operate in an immediate effort to capture the enemy's batteries upon the Potomac, between Washington and the Chesapeake Bay.

L. Thomas, Adj't. Gen. AB. LINCOLN.

After what has been said already in regard to the effect of a movement to the lower Chesapeake, it is unnecessary for me to comment upon this document, further than to say, that the time of beginning the movement, depended upon the state of readiness of the transports, the entire control of which had been placed, by the Secretary of War, in the hands of one of the assistant secretaries, and not under the Quartermaster General; so that, even if the movement were not impeded by the condition imposed in regard to the batteries on the Potomac, it could not have been in my power to begin it before the 18th of March, unless the Ass't. Sec'y. of War had completed his arrangements by that time.

Meanwhile important events were occurring, which materially modified the designs for the subsequent campaign. The appearance of the Merrimac off Old Point Comfort, and the encounter with the U. S. Squadron on the 8th of March, threatened serious darangement of the plan for the Penisular movement. But the engagement between the Monitor and the Merrimac, on the 9th of March, demonstrated so satisfactorily the power of the former, and the other naval preparations were so extensive and formidable, that the security of Fort Monroe, as a base of operations, was placed beyond a doubt; and, although the James River was closed to us, the York River, with its tributaries, was still open as a line of water communication with the Fortress. The general plan, therefore, remained undisturbed, although less promising in its details than when the James River was in our control.

On Sunday, the 9th of March, information from various sources made it apparent that the enemy was evacuating his positions at Centreville and Manassas, as well as on the upper and lower Potomac. The President and Secretary of War were present when the most positive information reached me, and I expressed to them my intention to cross the river immediately, and there gain the most authentic information, prior to determining what course to pursue.

The retirement of the enemy towards Richmond had been expected, as the natural consequence of the movement to the Peninsula; but their adoption of this course immediately on ascertaining that such a movement was intended, while it relieved me from the result of the undue anxiety of my superiors, and attested the character of the design, was unfortunate in that the then almost impassable roads between our positions and theirs, deprived us of the opportunity for inflicting damage, usually afforded by the withdrawal of a large army in the face of a powerful adversary.

The retirement of the enemy, and the occupation of the abandoned positions, which necessarily followed, presented an opportunity for the troops to gain some experience on the march and bivouac, preparatory to the campaign, and to get rid of the superfluous baggage and other "impediments," which accumulate so easily around an army encamped for a long time in one locality.

A march to Manassas and back could produce no delay in embarking for the lower Chesapeake, as the transports could not be ready for some time, and it afforded a good intermediate step between the quiet and comparative comfort of the camps around Washington, and the rigors of active operations, besides accomplishing the important object of determining the positions and perhaps the future designs of the enemy, with the possibility of being able to harrass their rear.

I therefore issued orders during the night of the 9th of March for a general movement of the army the next morning towards Centreville and Manassas, sending in advance two regiments of cavalry under Col. Averil, with orders to reach Manassas if possible, ascertain the exact condition of affairs, and do whatever he could to retard and annoy the enemy, if really in retreat. At the same time, I telegraphed to the Secretary of War, that it would be necessary to defer the organization of army corps until the completion of the projected advance upon Manassas, as the divisions could not be brought together in time. The Secretary replied, requiring immediate compliance with the President's order; but on my again representing that this would compel the abandonment or postponement of the movement to Manassas, he finally consented to its postponement. At noon, on the 10th of March, the cavalry advance, reached the enemy's lines at Centreville, passing through his recently occupied camps and works, and finding still burning heaps of military stores and much valuable property.

SECRET SERVICE.

Immediately after being assigned to the command of the troops around Washington, I organized a secret service force under Mr. Allen Pinkerton, whose assumed name was E. J. Allen, a very experienced and efficient person. This force, up to the time I was relieved from command, was continually occupied in procuring, from all possible sources, information regarding the strength, positions and movements of the enemy. All spies, "contrabands," deserters, refugees, and many prisoners of war, coming into our lines from the front, were carefully examined—first, by the outpost and division commanders, and then by my chief-of-staff and the provost-marshal-general. Their statements, taken in writing, and in many cases under oath, from day to day, for a long period previous to the evacuation of Manassas, comprised a mass of evidence which, by careful digests and collations, enabled me to estimate with considerable accuracy the strength of the enemy before us. Summaries, showing the character and results of the labors of the secret service force, accompany this report, and I refer to them for the facts they contain, and as a measure of the ignorance which led some journals at that time, and persons in high office, unwittingly to trifle with the reputation of an army, and to delude the country with Quaker-gun stories of the defenses, and gross understatements of the numbers, of the enemy.

The following orders were issued for the examination of persons coming from the direction of the enemy:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Washington, Dec. 16, 1861.—Circular: The Major-General commanding directs, That all deserters, prisoners, spies, "contrabands," and all other persons whatever, coming or brought within our lines from Virginia, shall be taken immediately to the quarters of the commander of the division within whose lines they may come or be brought, without previous examination by any one, except so far as may be necessary for the officer commanding the advanced guard, to elicit information regarding his particular post; That the division commander examine all such persons himself, or delegate such duty to a proper officer of his staff, and allow no other persons to hold any communication with them: That he then immediately send them, with a sufficient guard, to the provost marshal in this city for further examination and safe keeping; and that stringent orders be given to all guards having such persons in charge not to hold any communication with them whatever; and further, that the information elicited from such persons shall be immediately communicated to the major-general commanding, or to the chief-of-staff, and to no other person whatever.

The major-general commanding further directs that a sufficient guard be placed around every telegraph station pertaining to this army, and that such guards be instructed not to allow any person, except the regular telegraph corps, general officers, and such staff officers as may be authorized by their chief, to enter or loiter around said stations within hearing of the sound of the telegraphic instruments.

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Washington, Feb. 26, 1862.

General Orders, No. 27.

* * * * *

All deserters from the enemy, prisoners, and other persons coming within our lines will be taken at once to the provost marshal of the nearest division, who will examine them in presence of the division commander, or an officer of his staff designated for the purpose. This examination will only refer to such information as may affect the division and those near it; especially those remote from general headquarters. As soon as this examination is completed, and it must be made as rapidly as possible, the person will be sent under proper guard to the provost-marshal-general, with a statement of his replies to the questions asked. Upon receiving him the provost-marshal-general will at once send him with this statement to the chief-of-staff of the Army of the Potomac, who will cause the necessary examination to be made. The provost-marshal-general will have the custody of all such persons. Division commanders will at once communicate to other division commanders all information thus obtained which affects them. . . . .

By command of Maj.-Gen. McClellan,
S. Williams, Asst.-Adj.-Gen.

In addition to the foregoing orders, the division commanders were instructed whenever they desired to send out scouts towards the enemy, to make known the object at headquarters, in order that I might determine whether we had the information it was proposed to obtain, and that I might give the necessary orders to other commanders so that the scouts should not be molested by the guards.

It will be seen from the report of the chief of the secret service corps, dated March 8th, that the forces of the rebel army of the Potomac at that date were as follows:

At Manassas, Centreville, Bull Run, Upper Occoquan, and vicinity, 80,000 men; at Brooks's Station, Dumfries, Lower Occoquan, and vicinity, 18,000 men; at Leesburg and vicinity, 4,500 men; in the Shenandoah Valley, 13,000 men; Total number, 115,500.

About three hundred field-guns, and from twenty-six to thirty siege-guns were with the rebel army in front of Washington.

The report made on the 17th of March, after the evacuation of Manassas and Centreville corroborates the statements contained in the repoort of the 8th, and is fortified by the affidavits of several railroad engineers, conductors, baggage-masters, &c., whose opportunities for forming correct estimates were unusually good. These affidavits will be found in the accompanying reports of the chief of the secret-service corps.

ENEMY'S WORKS AT AND NEAR MANASSAS.—A reconnoissance of the works at Centreville made by Lieut. McAlester, U. S. Engineers, on March 14th, 1862, and a survey of those at Manassas made by a party of the U. S. Coast Survey in April, 1862, confirmed also my conclusions as to the strength of the enemy's defenses.

Those at Centreville consisted of two lines, one facing east, and the other north. The former consisted of seven works, viz.: one bastion-fort, two redoubts, two lunettes, and two batteries: all containing embrasures for forty guns, and connected by infantry parapets and double caponnieres. It extended along the crest of the ridge about one mile and three-quarters from its junction with the northern front, to ground thickly wooded, and impassable to an attacking column. The northern front extended about one mile and a quarter to Great Rocky Run, and thence three-quarters of a mile further, to thickly wooded impassable ground in the valley of Cub Run. It consisted of six lunettes and batteries, with embrasures for thirty-one guns, connected by an infantry parapet in the form of a cremalliere line with redans.

At the town of Centreville, on a high hill commanding the rear of all the works within range, was a large hexagonal redoubt with ten embrasures.

Manassas Station was defended in all directions by a system of detached works, with platforms for heavy guns arranged for marine carriages, and connected by infantry parapets. This system was rendered complete by a very large work with sixteen embrasures, which commanded the highest of the other works by about fifty feet.

Sketches of the reconnoissances above referred to will be found among the maps appended to this report.

From this it will be seen that the positions selected by the enemy at Centreville and Manassas were naturally very strong, with impassable streams and broken ground, affording ample protection to their flanks, and that strong lines of intrenchments swept all the available approaches.

Although the history of every former war has conclusively shown the great advantages which are possessed by an enemy acting on the defensive and occupying strong positions defended by heavy earthworks, yet, at the commencement of this war but few civilians in our country, and, indeed, not all military men of rank, had a just appreciation of the fact.

New levies that have never been in battle, cannot be expected to advance without cover under the murderous fire from such defenses, and carry them by assault. This is work in which veteran troops frequently falter, and are repulsed with loss. That an assault of the enemy's positions, in front of Washington, with the new troops composing the army of the Potomac, during the winter of 1861–2, would have resulted in defeat and demoralization, was too probable. The same army, though enured to war in many battles hardly fought and bravely won, has thrice, under other generals, suffered such disasters as it was no excess of prudence then to avoid.

My letter to the Secretary of War, dated February 3d, 1862, and given above, expressed the opinion that the movement to the Peninsula, would compel the enemy to retire from his position at Manassas, and free Washington from danger.

When the enemy first learned of that plan they did thus evacuate Manassas. During the Peninsula campaign, as at no former period northern Virginia was completely in our possession, and the vicinity of Washington free from the presence of the enemy. The ground so gained was not lost, nor Washington again put in danger, until the enemy learned of the orders for an evacuation of the Peninsula, sent to me at Harrison's Bar, and were again left free to advance northward, and menace the national capital. Perhaps no one now doubts that the best defense of Washington, is a Peninsula attack on Richmond.

THE PRESIDENT'S ORDER RELIEVING GEN'L McCLELLAN OF THE COMMAND-IN-CHIEF.—My order for the organization of the army corps, was issued on the 13th of March. It has been given above.

While at Fairfax Court House, on March 12th, I was informed through the telegraph, by a member of my staff, that the following document had appeared in the "National Intelligencer," of that morning.

Exec. Mansion, Washington, March 11, 1862. President's War Order, No. 3.

Maj.-Gen. McClellan, having personally taken the field at the head of the army of the Potomac, until otherwise ordered, he is relieved from the command of the other military departments, he retaining command of the department of the Potomac.

Ordered further, That the departments now under the respective commands of Generals Halleck and Hunter, together with so much of that under Gen. Buell as lies west of a north and south line indefinitely drawn through Koxville, Tennessee, be consolidated and designated the Department of the Mississippi, and that, until otherwise ordered, Major.-Gen. Halleck have command of said department.

Ordered also, That the country west of the Department of the Potomac, and east of the Department of the Mississippi, be a military department, to be called the Mountain Department, and that the same be commanded by Maj.-Gen. Fremont.

That all the commanders of departments, after the receipt of this order by them, respectively report, severally and directly, to the Secretary of War, and that prompt, full, and frequent reports, will be expected of all and each of them. AB. LINCOLN.

Though unaware of the President's intention to remove me from the position of general-in-chief, I cheerfully acceded to the disposition he saw fit to make of my services, and so informed him in a note, on the 12th of March, in which occur these words:

"I believe I said to you some weeks since, in connection with some Western matters, that no feeling of self-interest or ambition, should ever prevent me from devoting myself to the service. I am glad to have the opportunity t prove it, and you will find that, under pres t circumstances, I shall work just as cheer-f y as before, and that no consideration of f will, in any manner, interfere with the c charge of my public duties. Again thank-f you for official and personal kindness you l e so often evinced towards me, I am, &c."

A RECONNOISSANCE.

On the 14th of March, a reconnoissance of arge body of cavalry, with some infantry, ler command of Gen. Stoneman, was sent ng the Orange and Alexandria railroad, to ermine the position of the enemy, and, if ssible, force his rear across the Rappahan-k; but the roads were in such condition,
t, finding it impossible to subsist his men,
n. Stoneman was forced to return, after aching Cedar Run. The following dispatch
m him recites the result of this expedition:

Headq's., Union Mills, March 16, 1862.

Col. Colburn:—We arrived here last even-g about dark; we got corn for horses; no ovisions for men; Bull Run too high to oss; had we stayed an hour longer, we uld not have got here to-day, owing to the gh water in the streams; felt the enemy ntiously, and found him in force at Warren-n Junction; saw two regiments of cavalry,
d three bodies of infantry, on the other side Cedar Run; had we crossed, should not ve been able to get back for high water;
d three men of 5th Cavalry hit driving in emy's pickets; one slightly wounded in the ad.

Enemy acted confidently, and followed us me way back on the road, but did not most us in any way. Enemy's force consisted Stewart's and Ewell's cavalry, a battery of tillery, and some infantry; railroad bridges burnt down up to Warrenton Junction; ill entire beyond, but all in readiness to burn a moment's warning, having dry wood piled on them; heard cars running during the ght before last, probably bringing up troops om Rappahannock; heard of two regiments infantry at Warrenton, engaged in impress-g the militia and securing forage; heard of large force of infantry this side of Rappaannock River, having come up to Warrenton unction from Acquia Creek day before yesrday; bridges all destroyed this side of road Run. The aids who take this will give ou further particulars. Very respectfully, &c.

Geo. Stoneman, Brig.-Gen. Com'g.

DEFENSE OF WASHINGTON.

The main body of the army was, on the 11th
f March, moved back to the vicinity of Alex-ndria to be embarked, leaving a part of Gen.
umner's corps at Manassas, until other troops ould be sent to relieve it.

Before it was withdrawn, a strong reconoissance under Gen. Howard was sent tovards the Rappahannock, the result of which ppears in the following dispatch:

Warrenton Junction, March 29, 1862.

Gen. S. Williams:—Express just received from Gen. Howard. He drove the enemy across the Rappahannock bridge, and is now in camp on this bank of and near the Rappahannock River. The enemy blew up the bridge in his retreat. There was skirmishing during the march, and a few shots exchanged by the artillery, without any loss on our part. Their loss, if any, is not known. Gen. Howard will return to this camp to-morrow morning.

E. V. Sumner, Brig.-Gen.

The line of the Rappahannock and the Manassas Gap railroad was thus reasonably secure from menace by any considerable body of the enemy.

On the 13th of March, a council of war was assembled at the Fairfax Court House, to discuss the military status. The President's Order No. 3, of March 8th, was considered. The following is a memorandum of the proceedings of the council:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Fairfax Court House, March 13, 1862.

A council of the Generals commanding army corps at the headquarters of the army of the Potomac, were of the opinion:

I. That the enemy having retreated from Manassas to Gordonsville, behind the Rappahannock and Rapidan, it is the opinion of generals commanding army corps that the operations to be carried on will be best undertaken from Old Point Comfort, between the York and James Rivers.

Provided—

1st. That the enemy's vessel, Merrimac, can be neutralized.

2d. That the means of transportation sufficient for an immediate transfer of the force to its new base can be ready at Washington and Alexandria, to move down the Potomac, and,

3d. That a naval auxiliary force can be had to silence or aid in silencing the enemy's batteries on the York River.

4th. The force to be left to cover Washington shall be such as to give an entire feeling of security for its safety from menace.—(Unanimous.)

II. If the foregoing cannot be, the army should then be moved against the enemy, behind the Rappahannock, at the earliest possible moment, and the means of reconstruting bridges, repairing railroads, and stocking them with material sufficient for supplying the army, should at once be collected for both the Orange and Alexandria and Acquia and Richmond railroads.—(Unanimous.)

N. B. That, with the forts on the right bank of the Potomac fully garrisoned, and those on the left bank occupied, a covering force in front of the Virginia line of 25,000 men would suffice.—(Keyes, Heintzelman and McDowell.)

A total of 40,000 men for the defense of the city would suffice.—(Sumner.)

This was assented to by myself, and immediately communicated to the War Department. The following reply was received the same day:

War Department, March 13, 1862.

To Maj.-Gen. Geo. B. McClellan,—

The President, having considered the plan of operations agreed upon by yourself and the army corps, makes no objection to the same, but gives the following directions as to its execution:

1st. Leave such force at Manassas Junction as shall make it entirely certain that the enemy shall not repossess himself of that position and line of communication.

2d. Leave Washington entirely secure.

3d. Move the remainder of the force down the Potomac—choosing a new base at Fortress Monroe, or anywhere between here and there; or, at all events, move such remainder of the army at once in pursuit of the enemy by some route.

EDWIN M. STANTON, Sec. of War.

My preparations were at once begun in accordance with these directions, and on the 16th of March the following instructions were sent to Generals Banks and Wadsworth.

Headq's, Army of the Potomac, March 16, '62.

Sir,—You will post your command in the vicinity of Manassas; intrench yourself strongly, and throw cavalry pickets well out to the front.

Your first care will be the rebuilding of the railway from Washington to Manassas, and to Strasburg, in order to open your communications with the Valley of the Shenandoah. As soon as Manassas Gap Railway is in running order, intrench a brigade of infantry, say four regiments, with two batteries, at or near the point where the railway crosses the Shenandoah. Something like two regiments of cavalry should be left in that vicinity to occupy Winchester, and thoroughly scour the country south of the railway and up the Shenandoah Valley, as well as through Chester Gap, which might, perhaps, be advantageously occupied by a detachment of infantry well intrenched. Block houses should be built at all the railway bridges. Occupy by grand guards Warrenton Junction, or Warrenton itself, and also some little more advanced point on the Orange and Alexandria Railway, as soon as the railway bridge is repaired.

Great activity should be observed by the cavalry. Besides the two regiments at Manassas, another regiment of cavalry will be at your disposal, to scout towards the Occoquan, and probably a fourth towards Leesburg.

To recapitulate: The most important points which should engage your attention are as follows:

1st. A strong force, well intrenched, in the vicinity of Manassas, perhaps even Centerville, and another force, (a brigade), also well intrenched, near Strasburg.

2d. Block houses at the Railway bridges.

3d. Constant employment of the cavalry well to the front.

4th. Grand Guards at Warrenton Junction, and in advance as far as the Rappahannock, if possible.

5th. Great care to be exercised to ob full and early information as to the enemy.

6th. The general object is to cover the of the Potomac and Washington.

The foregoing is communicated by comm of Maj.-Gen. McClellan.

S. WILLIAMS, Assistant-Adjt.-Ge

To Maj.-Gen. N. P. Banks,

Comd'g. 5th Corps Army of the Potomac.

Headq's Army of the Potomac, March 16,

Sir,—The command to which you have b assigned by instructions of the President Military Governor of the District of Colum embraces the geographical limits of the trict, and will also include the city of Alex dria, the defensive works south of the tomac, from the Occoquan to Difficult Cre and the post of Fort Washington.

I enclose a list of the troops, and of defenses embraced in these limits.

General Banks will command at Manas Junction, with the divisions of Williams Shields, composing the 5th Corps, but should, nevertheless, exercise vigilance your front—carefully guard the approache that quarter, and maintain the duties of vanced guards. You will use the same cautions on either flank.

All troops not actually needed for the pol of Washington and Georgetown, for the ga sons north of the Potomac, and for other in cated special duties, should be moved to south side of the river.

In the centre of your front you should p the main body of your troops, and pro proportions at suitable distances towards y right and left flanks. Careful patrols will made, in order thoroughly to scour the co try in front from right to left.

It is specially enjoined upon you to ma tain the forts and their armaments in the b possible order, to look carefully to the instr tion and discipline of their garrisons, as w as all other troops under your command, a by frequent and rigid inspections to insu the attainment of these ends.

The care of the railways, canals, depo bridges and ferries, within the above-nam limits, will devolve upon you, and you are insure their security and provide for th protection by every means in your pow You will also protect the depots of the pu lic stores, and transmit the stores to troops active service.

By means of patrols you will thorough scour the neighboring country, south of t eastern branch, and also on your right, a you will use every possible precaution to i tercept mails, goods, and persons passing u authorized to the enemy's lines. The necessi of maintaining good order within your limit and especially in the capital of the natio cannot be too strongly enforced.

You will forward and facilitate the mov ment of all troops destined for the active pa of the army of the Potomac, and especially t sit of detachments to their proper regiits and corps.

he charge of the new troops arriving in shington, and all troops temporarily there, devolve upon you. You will form them provisional brigades, promote their inction and discipline, and facilitate their ipment.

eport all arrivals of troops—their strength, position and equipment—by every opportity.

esides the regular reports and returns, ch you will be required to render to the tant-general of the army, you will make hese headquarters a consolidated report your command every Sunday morning, and thly returns on the first day of each month.

he foregoing instructions are communid by command of Maj.-Gen. McClellan.

S. Williams, Assistant Adgt.-Gen.

Brig.-Gen. J. S. Wadsworth, Military Gov. of the District of Columbia.

HE PLAN OF CAMPAIGN ON THE PENINSULA.

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
Theological Seminary, Va., March 19, 1862.

n. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

ir,—I have the honor to submit the follownotes on the proposed operations of the ve portion of the army of the Potomac.

he proposed plan of campaign is to assume t Monroe as the first base of operations, ng the line by Yorktown and West Point n Richmond as the line of operations, mond being the objective point. It is med that the fall of Richmond involves of Norfolk and the whole of Virginia; that we shall fight a decisive battle been West Point and Richmond, to give ch battle the rebels will concentrate all r available forces, understanding, as they , that it involves the fate of their cause.

herefore follows:

st. That we should collect all our available es and operate upon adjacent lines, maining perfect communication between our s.

d. That no time should be lost in reaching field of battle.

he advantages of the Peninsula between York and James Rivers are too obvious eed explanation. It is also clear that West nt should as soon as possible be reached be our main depot, that we may have the rtest line of land transportation for our plies and the use of the York River.

st. By moving directly from Fort Monroe base, and trusting to the roads for our plies, at the same time landing a strong ps as near Yorktown as possible, in order turn the rebel lines of defense south of rktown, then to reduce Yorktown and loucester, by a siege in all probability, involving a delay of weeks perhaps.

2d. To make a combined naval and land attack upon Yorktown, the first object of the campaign. This leads to the most rapid and decisive results. To accomplish this the navy should at once concentrate upon the York River all their available and most powerful batteries. Its reduction should not, in that case, require many hours. A strong corps would be pushed up the York, under cover of the navy, directly upon West Point, immediately upon the fall of Yorktown, and we could at once establish our new base of operations at a distance of some twenty-five miles from Richmond, with every facility for developing and bringing into play the whole of our available force on either or both banks of the James.

It is impossible to urge too strongly the absolute necessity of the co-operation of the navy, as a part of this programme; without it the operations may be prolonged for many weeks, and we may be forced to carry in front several strong positions, which, by their aid, could be turned without serious loss of either time or men.

It is also of first importance to bear in mind the fact already alluded to, that the capture of Richmond necessarily involves the prompt fall of Norfolk; while an operation against Norfolk, if successful, as the beginning of the campaign, facilitates the reduction of Richmond merely by the demoralization of the rebel troops involved, and that after the fall of Norfolk we should be obliged to undertake the capture of Richmond by the same means which would have accomplished it in the beginning, having meanwhile afforded the rebels ample time to perfect their defensive arrangements, for they could well know from the moment the army of the Potomac changed its base to Fort Monroe that Richmond must be its ultimate object.

It may be summed up in few words, that, for the prompt success of this campaign, it is absolutely necessary that the navy should at once throw its whole available force, its most powerful vessels, against Yorktown. There is the most important point—there the knot to be cut. An immediate decison upon the subject matter of this communication is highly desirable, and seems called for by the exigencies of the occasion.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your ob't serv't.

Geo. B. McClellan, Major General.

A REDUCTION OF FORCE.

In the meantime the troops destined to form the active army were collected in camps convenient to the points of embarkation, and every preparation made to embark them as rapidly as possibie, when the transports were ready.

A few days before sailing for Fort Monroe, while still encamped near Alexandria, I met the President by appointment, on a steamer. He then informed me that he had been strongly pressed to take General Blenker's division from my command and give it to General Fremont. His Excellency was good enough to suggest several reasons for not taking Blenker's division from me. I assented to the force of his suggestions, and was extremely gratified by his decision to allow the division to remain with the army of the Potomac. It was, therefore, with surprise that I received on the 31st the following note;

Exec. Mansion, Washington, March 31, '62.
Maj.-Gen. McClellan,

My Dear Sir:—This morning I felt constrained to order Blenker's division to Fremont; and I will write this to assure you that I did so with great pain, understanding that you would wish it otherwise. If you could know the full pressure of the case, I am confident you would justify it, even beyond a mere acknowledgement, that the commander-in-chief may order what he pleases.

Yours very truly, A. Lincoln

To this, I replied in substance, that I regretted the order, and could ill-afford to lose 10,000 troops, which had been counted upon in forming my plan of campaign, but as there was no remedy I would yield and do the best I could without them. In a conversation with the President a few hours afterwards, I repeated verbally the same thing, and expressed my regret that Blenker's division had been given to Fremont, from any "pressure" other than the requirements of the national exigency. I was partially relieved, however, by the President's positive and emphatic assurance that I might leave, confident that no more troops beyond these 10,000 should, in any event, be taken from me, or in any way detached from my command.

OPERATIONS IN THE SHENANDOAH VALLEY.

At the time of the evacuation of Manassas by the enemy, Jackson was at Winchester, our forces occupying Charlestown, and Shield's reaching Bunker Hill on the 11th. On the morning of the 12th, a brigade of Gen. Bank's troops, under Gen. Hamilton, entered Winchester, the enemy having left at 5 o'clock the evening before, his rear guard of cavalry leaving an hour before our advance entered the place. The enemy having made his preparations for evacuation some days before, it was not possible to intercept his retreat. On the 13th, the mass of Banks' corps was concentrated in the immediate vicinity of Winchester, the enemy being in the rear of Strasburg. On the 19th Gen. Shields occupied Strasburg, driving the enemy twenty miles south, to Mount Jackson.

On the 20th the first division of Banks' corps, commenced its movement towards Manassas, in compliance with my letter of instructions of the 16th.

Jackson probably received information of this movement, and supposed that no force of any consequence was left in the vicinity of Winchester, and upon the falling back of Shields to that place on the 20th, for the pose of enticing Jackson in pursuit, the la promptly followed, whereupon ensued a s mish on the 22d, in which Gen. Shields wounded, and an affair at Winchester on 23d, resulting in the defeat of Jackson, was pursued as rapidly as the exhaustion our troops, and the difficulty of obtaining s plies, permitted. It is presumed that the reports of the battle of Winchester, were warded direct to the War Department Gen. Banks.

It being now clear that the enemy had intention of returning by the Manassas ro the following letter of April 1st, was wri to Gen. Banks.

Head-Quarters, Army of the Potomac, Board the Commodore, April 1, 1862.
Maj.-Gen. N. P. Banks, Com'ng Fifth Corp

General:—The change in affairs in valley of the Shenandoah, has rendered ne sary a corresponding departure, tempora at least, from the plan we some days si agreed upon.

In my arrangements, I assume you have you a force amply sufficient to drive Jack before you, provided he is not reinfor largely. I also assume, that you may fin impossible to detach anything towards Ma sas for some days, probably not until the rations of the main army have drawn all rebel force toward Richmond.

You are aware that General Sumner has some days been at Manassas Junction, two divisions of infantry, six batteries, two regiments of cavalry, and that a re noissance to the Rappahannock, forced enemy to desiroy the railroad bridge at F pahannock Station, on the Orange and Ale dria Railroad. Since that time our cav have found nothing on this side of the Ra hannock in that direction, and it seems that we have no reason to fear any retur the rebels in that quarter. Their movem near Fredericksburg, also indicate a final a donment of that neighborhood. I doubt wh er Johnson will now reinforce Jackson, wi view of offensive operations. The time is bably passed when he could have gained thing by doing so. I have ordered in on Sumner's divisions (that of Richardson, Sumner's) to Alexandria for embarkation, B ker's has been detached from the Army of Potomac, and ordered to report to General mont.

Two regiments of cavalry have been orde out, and are now on their way to relieve two regiments of Sumner.

Four thousand infantry, and one batt leave Washington at once for Manassas. S 3,000 more will move in one or two days, soon after some 3,000 additional.

I will order Blenker to march on Strasb and to report to you for temporary duty

t, should you find a large force in your nt, you can avail yourself of his aid. As n as possible, please direct him on Win-ster, thence to report to the adjutant-gen-l of the army for orders, but keep him until u are sure what you have in front.

n regard to your own movements, the most portant thing at present is to throw Jackson ll back, and then to assume such a position to enable you to prevent his return. As n as the railway communications are re-es-lished, it will be, probably, important and isable to move on Staunton, but this would uire secure communications, and a force of m 25,000 to 30,000 for active operations. should also be nearly coincident with my n move on Richmond; at all events, not so g before it as to enable the rebels to con-trate on you, and then return on me. I that you cannot be ready in time, although ay come in very well with a force less than t I have mentioned, after the main battle r Richmond. When General Sumner leaves rrenton Junction, General Abercrombie will placed in immediate command of Manassas Warrenton Junction, under your general ers. Please inform me frequently, by tele-ph, and otherwise, as to the state of things our front. I am very truly yours,

GEO. B. McCLELLAN, Maj.-Gen. Com'g.

P. S.—From what I have just learned it uld seem that the two regiments of cavalry nded for Warrenton Junction have gone Harper's Ferry. Of the four additional reg-nts placed under your orders, two should, promptly as possible, move by the shortest te on Warrenton Junction. I am, sir, very pectfully, Your obedient servant,

GEO. B. McCLELLAN, Maj.-Gen. Com'g.

This letter needs no further explanation than ay that it was my intention, had the opera-ns in that quarter remained under my charge, ier to have resumed the defensive positions ked out in the letter of March 16, or to re advanced General Banks upon Staunton, night in the progress of events seem advis-e. It is to be remembered that when I te the preceding and following letters of ril 1, I had no expectation of being relieved m the charge of the operations in the She-ndoah Valley and in front of Washington, President's War Order No. 3 giving no in-ation of such an intention; and that, so far reference was made to final operations after ving Jackson back and taking such a posi-n as to prevent his return, no positive ders were given in the letter—the matter ng left for future consideration, when the per time arrived for a decision.

TROOPS LEFT IN AND NEAR WASHINGTON.

From the following letter to the adjutant-neral, dated April 1, 1862, it will be seen t I left for the defense of the national capi-l and its approaches, when I sailed for the Peninsula, 73,456 men, with 109 pieces of light artillery, including the 32 pieces in Washington alluded to, but not enumerated in my letter to the adjutant-general. It will also be seen that I recommended other available troops in New York (more than 4,000) to be at once ordered forward to reinforce them.

Steamer Commodore, April 1, 1862.

Brig.-Gen. L. Thomas, Adjutant-General U. S. A.

GENERAL:—I have to request that you will lay the following communication before the Hon. Secretary of War.

The approximate numbers and positions of the troops left near and in rear of the Potomac is as follows:—

Gen. Dix has, after guarding the railroads under his charge, sufficient to give him 5,000 for the defense of Baltimore, and 1,988 available for the eastern shore, Annapolis, &c. Fort Delaware is very well garrisoned by about 400 men.

The garrisons of the forts around Washington amount to 10,600 men, other disposable troops now with Gen. Wadsworth being about 11,400 men.

The troops employed in guarding the various railways in Maryland amount to some 3,359 men. These it is designed to relieve, being old regiments, by dismounted cavalry, and to send forward to Manassas.

Gen. Abercrombie occupies Warrenton with a force which including Col. Geary at White Plains and the cavalry to be at his disposal, will amount to some 7,780 men, with 12 pieces of artillery.

I have the honor to request that all the troops organized for service in Pennsylvania and New York, and in any of the Eastern States, may be ordered to Washington. I learn from Gov. Curtin that there are some 3,500 men now ready in Pennsylvania. This force I should be glad to have sent to Manassas. Four thousand men from Gen. Wadsworth I desire to be ordered to Manassas. These troops, with the railroad guards above alluded to, will make up a force under the command of Gen. Abercrombie of something like 18,639 men.

It is my design to push Gen. Blenker's division from Warrenton upon Strasburg. He should remain at Strasburg long enough to allow matters to assume a definite form in that region, before proceeding to his ultimate destination.

The troops in the valley of the Shenandoah will thus be, including Blenker s division, 10,028 strong, with 24 pieces of artillery, Banks' 5th Corps, which embraces the command of Gen. Shields, 19,687 strong, with 41 guns—to some 3,652 disposable cavalry and the railroad guards, about 2,100 men—amount to about 35,467 men.

It is designed to relieve Gen. Hooker by one regiment, say 850 men, being, with some 500 cavalry, 1,350 men on the lower Potomac. To recapitulate:—

At Warrenton there is to be,	7,780	men.
At Manassas, say,	10,859	"
In the valley of the Shenandoah,	35,467	"
On the lower Potomac,	1,350	"
In all,	55,456	"

There would thus be left for the garrisons and the front of Washington under Gen. Wadsworth some 18,000 men, inclusive of the batteries under instruction.

The troops organizing or ready for service in New York, I learn will probably number more than four thousand. These should be assembled at Washington, subject to disposition where their services may be most required. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, GEO. B. MCCLELLAN, Maj.-Gen. Com'g.

The following letter from Gen. Barry shows that thirty-two (32) field-guns with men, horses and equipments, were also left in Washington City when the army sailed. These were the batteries under instruction referred to above.

Headquarters, Inspector of Artillery,
Washington, Dec. 16, 1862.

Maj.-Gen. McClellan, U. S. A.

General:—It having been stated in various public prints, and in a speech of Senator Chandler, of Michigan, in his place in the U. S. Senate, quoting what he stated to be a portion of the testimony of Brig.-Gen. Wadsworth, military governor of Washington, before the Joint Senate and House Committee, on the subject of the war, that Maj.-Gen. McClellan had left an insufficient force for the defence of Washington, and "not a gun on wheels."

I have to contradict this charge as follows:

From official reports made at the time to me (the chief of artillery of the army of the Potomac) and now in my possession, by the commanding officer of the light artillery troops left in camp in the city of Washington by your order, it appears that the following named field-officers were left;

Battery "C" 1st N.Y. Artillery, Capt. Barnes, 2 guns; battery "K" 1st N.Y. Artillery, Capt. Crounse, 6 guns; battery "L" 2d N. Y. Artillery, Capt. Robinson, 6 guns; 9th N. Y. independant battery, Capt. Morozowi, 6 guns; 16th N. Y. independent battery, Capt. Locke; battery "A" 2d battery N. Y. Artillery, Capt. Hogan, 6 guns; battery "B" 2d battery, N. Y. Artillery, Capt. McMahon, 6 guns; total of batteries, 32 guns.

With the exception of a few horses, which could have been obtained from the quartermaster's department in a few hours, the batteries were all fit for immediate service, excepting the 16th N. Y. battery, which, having been previously ordered on Gen. Wadsworth's application, to report to him for special service, was unequipped with either guns or horses.

I am, gen., very respectfully, your ob't sev't, WM. F. BARRY, B.-G. Inspec. of Art., U.S. Army.

It is true that Blenker's division, which is included in the forces enumerated by me, under orders to reinforce Gen. Fremont, the following dispatch from the Secretar War, dated March 31, 1862, will show th was authorized to detain him at Strast until matters assumed a definite form in region before proceeding to his ultimate tination; in other words, until Jackson disposed of, and had he been detained th instead of moving on to Harper's Ferry Franklin, with other orders, it is prob that Gen. Banks would have defeated Jack instead of being himself obliged subsequ to retreat to Williamsport.

War Dept., Washington, D. C., March 31, Maj.-Gen. McClellan:

The order in respect to Blenker is not signed to hinder or delay the movement Richardson or any other force. He can main wherever you desire him so long required, for your movements, and in any sition you desire. The order is simply place him in position for reinforcing Frem as soon as your dispositions will permit, he may go to Harper's Ferry, by such ro and at such time, as you shall direct—st your own wishes as to the movement—wh and how it shall be made.

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War

Without including Gen. Blenker's divisi there were left 67,428 men, and 85 pieces light artillery, which, under existing circ stances, I deemed more than adequate to sure the perfect security of Washington agai any force the enemy could bring against for the following reasons:

The light troops I had thrown forward der Gen. Stoneman, in pursuit of the rel army, after the evacuation of Manassas a Centreville, had driven their rear guard acr Cedar Run, and subsequent expeditions fr Sumner's corps had forced them beyond t Rappahannock; they had destroyed all t railway bridges behind them, thereby in cating that they did not intend to return ov that route. Indeed, if they had attempt such a movement, their progress must ha been slow and difficult, as it would have i volved the reconstruction of the bridges, a if my orders for keeping numerous caval patrols well out to the front, to give time notice of any approach of the enemy, had be strictly enforced, (and I left seven regimen of cavalry for this express purpose,) th could not, by any possibility, have reache Washington before there would have bee ample time to concentrate the entire forc left for its defense, as well as those at Balt more, at any necessary point.

It was clear to my mind, as I reiterated t the authorities, that the movement of the arm to the Peninsula, would have the effect to dra off the rebel army from Manassas to the d fense of their capital, and thus free Washing ton from menace. This opinion was confirme the moment the movement commenced ther as soon as the enemy became aware of our tentions; for, with the exception of Jackson's rce of some 15,000, which his instructions show have been intended to operate in such away as prevent McDowell's corps from being sent to inforce me, no rebel force of any magnitude ade its appearance in front of Washington du- ng the progress of our operations on the Pe- nsula; nor until the order was given for my turn from Harrison's Landing was Washington gain threatened.

Surrounded as Washington was with numerous d strong fortifications well garrisoned, it was anifest that the enemy could not afford to de- ch from his main army a force sufficient to as- il them.

It is proper to remark, that just previous to y departure for Fort Monroe, I sent my chief- -staff to Gen. Hitchcock, who at that time held aff relations with his excellency the President d the Secretary of War, to submit to him a st of the troops I proposed to leave for the de- nse of Washington, and the positions in which designed posting them. Gen. Hitchcock, after ancing his eye over the list, observed that he as not the judge of what was required for de- nding the capital, that Gen. McClellan's position as such as to enable him to understand the bject much better than he did, and he pre- med that if the force designated was in his dgment sufficient, nothing more would be quired. He was then told by the chief-of- aff that I would be glad to have his opinion, s an old and experienced officer. To this he re- lied, that as I had the entire control of the de- nses for a long time, I was the best judge of hat was needed, and he declined to give any ther expression of opinion at that time.

On the 2d of April, the day following my de- arture for Fort Monroe, Generals Hitchcock and homas were directed by the Secretary of War o examine and report whether the President's nstructions to me of March 8th and 13th had een complied with. On the same day their re- ort was submitted and their decision was,

"That the requirements of the President, that his city (Washington) shall be left entirely se- u e, has not been fully complied with."

The President, in his letter to me on tho 6th f April, says:

"And now allow me to ask, do you really think should permit the line from Richmond, via. Ma- assas Junction, to this city to be entirely open, xcept what resistance could be presented by ess than 20,000 unorganized troops?"

In the report of Generals Hitchcock and Thomas, alluded to, it is acknowledged that there was do danger of an attack from the direction of Manassas in these words:

"In regard to occupying Manassas Junction, as the enemy have destroyed the railroads leading to it, it may be fair to assume that they have no intention of returning for the re-occupation of their late position, and therefore no large force would be necessary to hold that position."

That as remarked before, was precisely the view I took of it, and this was enforced by the subsequent movements of the enemy.

In another paragraph of the report, it is stated that 55,000 men was the number considered adequate for the defense of the capital. That Gen. McClellan, in his enumeration of the forces left, had included Banks' army corps, operating in the Shenandoah Valley, but whether this corps should be regarded as available for the protection of Washington, they decline to express an opinion.

At the time this report was made, the only enemy on any approach to Washington, was Jackson's force, in front of Banks in the Shenandoah Valley, with the Manassas Gap Railroad leading from this valley to Washington, and it will be admitted, I presume, that Banks occupying the Shenandoah Valley, was in the best position to defend, not only that approach to Washington, but the roads to Harper's Ferry and above. The numbers of troops left by me for the defenses of Washington, as given in my letter to the adjutant-general, were taken from the latest official returns of that date, and these, of course, constitute the most trustworthy and authentic source, from which such information could be obtained.

Another statement made by General Hitchcock, before the "Committee on the Conduct of the War," in reference to this same order, should be noticed. He was asked the following question:

"Do you understand now that the movement made by Gen. McClellan to Fort Monroe, and up the York River, was in compliance with the recommendation of the council of generals commanding corps, and held at Fairfax Court House, on the 13th of March last, or in violation of it?"

To which he replied as follows:

"I have considered, and do now consider that, it was in violation of the recommendation of that council, in two important particulars; one particular, being that portion of this report which represents the council as agreeing to the expedition by way of the Peninsula, provided, the rebel steamer Merrimac could first be neutralized. That important provision Gen. McClellan disregarded."

* * * * *

The second particular alluded to by General Hitchcock, was in reference to the troops left for the defense of Washington, which has been disposed of above.

In regard to the steamer Merrimac, I have also stated, that so far as our operations on York River were concerned, the power of this vessel was neutralized. I now proceed to give some of the evidence which influenced me in coming to that conclusion.

Previous to our departure for the Peninsula, Mr. Watson, Assistant-Secretary of War, was sent by the President to Fort Monroe, to consult with Flag Officer Goldsborough upon this subject. The result of that consultation is contained in the following extract from the evidence of Admiral Goldsborough before the "Committee on the Conduct of the War" viz.: "I told Mr.

Watson, Assistant-Secretary of War, that the President might make his mind perfectly easy about the Merrimac going up York River, that she could never get there, for I had ample means to prevent that."

Captain G. V. Fox, Assistant-Secretary of the Navy, testifies before the Committee as follows:

"Gen. McClellan expected the Navy to neutralize the Merrimac, and I promised that it should be done."

Gen. Keyes, commanding 4th Army Corps, testifies as follows before the Committee:

"During the time that the subject of the change of base was discussed, I had refused to consent to the Peninsula line of operations, until I had sent word to the Navy Department and asked two questions. 1*st*. Whether the Merrimac was certainly neutralized or not? 2*d*. Whether the navy was in a condition to co-operate efficiently with the army, to break through between Yorktown and Gloucester Point? To both of these questions answers were returned in the affirmative, that is, the Merrimac was neutralized, and the navy was in a condition to co-operate efficiently to break through between Yorktown and Gloucester Point."

ORDERS FOR THE FORTIFICATION OF MANASSAS JUNCTION.

Before starting for the Peninsula, I instructed Lieut.-Col. B. S. Alexander, of the U. S. corps of engineers to visit Manassas Junction and its vicinity, for the purpose of determining upon the defensive works necessary to enable us to hold that place with a small force. The accompanying letters from Col. Alexander will show what steps were taken by him to carry into effect this important order.

I regret to say that those who succeeded me in command of the region in front of Washington, whatever were the fears for its safety, did not deem it necessary to carry out my plans and instructions to him.

Had Manassas been placed in condition for a strong defense, and its communications secured as recommended by Col Alexander, the result of Gen. Pope's campaign would probably have been different.

Washington, D. C., April, 2, 1862.

Sir,—You will proceed to Manassas at as early a moment as practicable, and mark on the ground the works for the defense of that place, on the positions which I indicated to you yesterday. You will find two carpenters experienced in this kind of work, ready to accompany you, by calling on Mr. Dougherty, the master carpenter of the Treasury Extension.

The general idea of the defense of this position, is to occupy the fringe of elevations, which lies about half-way between Manassas depot and the junction of the railroad, with a series of works, open to the rear, so that they may be commanded by the work hereafter to be described.

There will be at least four of these works, three of them being on the left of the railroad leading from Alexandria, at the positions occupied by the enemy's works. The other on the right of this road, on the position we examined yesterday. The works of the enemy to the no of this latter position, numbered Nos. 1 and 2 Lieut. Comstock's sketch, may also form part the front line of our defenses; but the sides these works, looking towards Manassas stat should be leveled, so that the interior of the wo may be seen from the latter position.

Embrasures should be arranged in all th works for field artillery. The approaches sho be such, that a battery can drive into the wor The number of embrasures in each battery w depend upon its size and the ground to be co manded. It is supposed that there will be fr four to eight embrasures in each battery.

The other works of the enemy looking towar the east and south, may be strengthened so as afford sufficient defense in these directions. T work, No. 3, on Lieut. Comstock's sketch may also strengthened and arranged for field artille when time will permit. This work is in a go position to cover a retreat, which would be ma down the valley in which the railroad runs wards Bull Run.

At Manassas station there should be a fo constructed. The railroad will pass throu this fort, and the depot, if one should be bui should be placed in its rear. This latter wo should be regarded as the key of the positio It should be as large as the nature of the grou will permit.

By going down the slopes, which are n steep, it may be made large enough to accomm date 2,000 or 3,000 men. The top of the positi need not be cut away, it will be better to thro up the earth into a large traverse which m also be a bomb proof. Its profile should l strong, and its ditches should be flanked. should receive a heavy armament of 24 or pounders, with some rifled (Parrot) 20 or pounders. Its guns should command all th exterior works, so that these works could be no use to the enemy, should he take them. accommodating the fort to the ground, this co sideration should not be lost sight of.

After tracing these works on the ground, yo will make a sketch embracing the whole of them showing their relative positions and size. Th sketch should embrace the junction of the rai roads and the ground for some distance aroun the mainwork. It need not be made with ex treme accuracy. The distances may be paced o measured with a tape-line. The bearings ma be taken by compass.

Having located the works and prepared you sketch, you will report to Capt. Frederick E Prime of the corps of engineers, who will furnish you the means of construction.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. S. Alexander, Lt.-Col. A. D. C

To Capt. Fred. E. Munther. Present.

Washington, D. C., April 6, 1862.

Brig-Gen. J. G. Barnard,

Chief Engineer army of the Potomac.

Sir,—I enclose you herewith a copy of th ructions which I gave to Capt. Munther, in erence to the defenses of Manassas.

s there has been a new department created t of the Rappahannock) it is possible that and I, as well as Gen. McClellan, are relieved n the further consideration of this subject at present time.

will, however, state for your information, uld the subject ever come before you again, t in my opinion the communication with nassas by land should be secured.

o effect this in the best manner, so far as my ervations extended, I think the bridge over l Run, near Union Mills and just above the road bridge, should be rebuilt or thoroughly aired, and that a small work, or perhaps two hree open batteries, should be erected on the acent heights, to protect it as well as the rail- d bridge.

he communication by land would then be ough or near Centreville, over the road used the enemy.

write this for fear something should detain here, but I hope to leave here to join you norrow. My health is much improved.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

may be permitted also to mention that the us also (unexecuted by my successor) indi- ed by my letter of instructions to General ks dated March 16, 1862, for intrenching ster Gap and the point where the Manassas o Railroad crosses the Shenandoah, were for purpose of preventing even the attempt at h a raid as that of Jackson in the month of y following.

MILITARY INCIDENTS OF THE FIRST PERIOD.

Before taking up the history of the embar- ion and the Peninsular campaign, I should ark that during the fall and winter of 1861-2, ile the army of the Potomac was in position front of Washington, reconnoissances were de from time to time, and skirmishes fre- ently occurred, which were of great impor- ce in the education of the troops, accustom- them te the presence of the enemy, and giv- them confidence under fire. There were ny instances of individual gallantry displayed these affairs: the reports of most of them l be found among the documents which accom- y this report.

One of the most brilliant of these affairs was t which took place at Drainsville on Dec. 20, 1, when the 3d brigade of McCall's Division, der Brig.-Gen. E. O. C. Ord, with Easton's ttery, routed and pursued four regiments of fantry, and a battery of six pieces.

The operations of Brig.-Gen. F. W. Lander on e Upper Potomac during the months of Janua- and February, 1862, frustrated the attempts of neral Jackson against the Ohio Railroad, Cum- rland, &c., and obliged him to fall back to inchester. His constitution was impaired by e hardships he had experienced, and on the 2d March the fearless General Lander expired, a tim to the excessive fatigues of the campaign.

SECOND PERIOD

PART I.

THE MOVEMENT TO THE PENINSULA.

The council, composed of four corps command- ers, organized by the President of the United States, at its meeting on the 13th of March, adopt- ed Fort Monroe as the base of operations for the movement of the army of the Potomac upon Rich- mond.

For the prompt and successful execution of the projected operation, it was regarded by all as necessary that the whole of the four corps should be employed, with at least the addition of ten thousand men drawn from the forces in the vicinity of Fortress Monroe: that position and its dependencies being regarded as amply pro- tected by the naval force in its neighborhood, and the advance of the main army up the Penin- sula, so that it could be safely left with a small garrison.

In addition to the land forces, the co-operation of the navy was desired in the projected attack upon the batteries at Yorktown and Gloucester, as well as in controlling the York and James Riv- ers for the protection of our flanks, and the use of transports, bringing supplies to the army. With these expectations, and for reasons stated elsewhere in this report, my original plan of mov- ing by Urbana and West Point was abandoned, and the line with Fortress Monroe as a base adopted. In the arrangements for the transpor- tation of the army to the Peninsula by water, the vessels were originally ordered to rendezvous mainly at Annapolis, but upon the evacuation of Manassas and the batteries of the lower Potomac by the enemy, it became more convenient to em- bark the troops and material at Alexandria, and orders to that effect were at once given.

In making the preliminary arrangements for the movement, it was determined that the First Corps (Gen. McDowell's) should move as a unit, first, and effect a landing either at the Sand-Box, some four miles south of Yorktown, in order to turn all the enemy's defenses at Ship Point, How- ard's Bridge, Big Bethel, etc., or else, should ex- isting circumstances render it preferable, land on the Gloucester side of York River, and move on West Point.

The transports, however, arrived slowly and few at a time. In order, therefore, to expedite matters, I decided to embark the army by divi- sions as transports arrived, keeping army corps together as much as possible, and to collect the troops at Fortress Monroe. In determining the order of embarkation, convenience and expedition were especially consulted, except that the First Corps was to be embarked last, as I intended to move it in mass to its point of disembarkation, and to land it on either bank of the York, as might then be determined.

On the 17th of March, Hamilton's division of the 3d corps embarked at Alexandria, and pro- ceeded to Eort Monroe, with the following or- ders:

Washington, D. C., March 17, 1862.

Gen. C. S. Hamilton, Comd'g Division:

You will, on your arrival at Fort Monroe, report to Gen. Wool, and request him to assign you ground for encamping your division. You will remain at Fort Monroe until further orders from Gen. McClellan. Should Gen. Wool require the services of your division in repelling an attack, you will please obey his orders, and use every effort to carry out his views.

R. B. Marcy, Chief-of-Staff.

On the 22d of March, as soon as transportation was ready, Gen. Fitz John Porter's division of the same corps embarked. Gen. Heintzelman was ordered to accompany it, under the following instructions:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
Seminary, March 22, 1862.

Brig.-Gen. S. P. Heintzelman, Com'g 3d Corps:

General:—Upon the disembarkation of Porter's division at Fort Monroe, I have to request that you will move your two divisions (Porter's and Hamilton's) some three or four miles out from the fort, to find good camping places where wood and water can be readily obtained, and where your position will be good in a defensive point of view. You may find it advisable to place one division on or near the road leading to Yorktown from Newport News, the other upon that leading to Yorktown direct from Fort Monroe.

If you find that the nature of the country will permit easy communication and mutual support between the two divisions, it will be best to place one on each road. It will be best to remain pretty near the fort for the present, in order to give the impression that our object is to attack Norfolk rather than Yorktown. You will do well, however, to push strong reconnoissances well to the front, to ascertain the position of the enemy and his pickets. I will, as soon as possible, reinforce you by the 3d division of your corps, and it is poobable that a part or the whole of the 4th corps will also move from Fort Monroe: this will probably be determined before your disembarkation is completed, and you will be informed accordingly.

My desire would be to make no important move in advance until you are fully prepared to follow it up, and give the enemy no time to recover.

The quartermasters of your corps will receive detailed instructions, in regard to land transportation, from Gen. Van Vliet.

It will be advisable to mobilize your corps with the least possible delay, and have it prepared for an advance. I have directed extra clothing, ammunition, etc., to be sent to Fort Monroe, so that all deficiencies may be supplied without delay.

Please report to me frequently and fully the condition of things on the new field of operations, and whatever intelligence you gain as to the enemy.

Engage guides in sufficient numbers at once, and endeavor to send out spies. I am very truly yours, Geo. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen. Com'g.

The remaining divisions embarked as rapidly as transports could be supplied.

On the 1st of April I embarked, with the headquarters on the steamer Commodore, and reac Fort Monroe on the afternoon of the 2d.

In consequence of the delay in the arriv the horse transports at Alexandria, but a s portion of the cavalry had arrived, and the a lery reserve had not yet completed its disemb ation.

I found there the 3d Pennsylvania Cavalry, the 5th Regular Cavalry; the 2d Regular Cav and a portion of the 1st had arrived, but not embarked: so few wagons had arrived tha was not possible to move Casey's division a for several days, while the other divisions w obliged to move with scant supplies.

As to the force and position of the enemy, information then in our possession was va and untrustworthy. Much of it was obtai from the staff officers of General Wool, and simply to the effect that Yorktown was surro ed by a continuous line of earthworks, w strong water batteries on the York River, garrisoned by not less than 15,000 troops, un the command of Gen. J. B. Magruder. M which had been prepared by the Topograph Engineers under Gen. Wool's command were nished me, in which, the Warwick River represented as flowing parallel to, but not cr ing the road from Newport News to Willia burg, making the so-called Mulberry Island a island; and we had no information as to the course of the Warwick across the Penins nor of the formidable line of works which it c ered.

Information which I had collected during winter placed Gen. Magruder's command at fr 15,000 to 20,000 men, independently of Gen Huger's force at Norfolk estimated at about 000. It was also known that there were str defensive works at or near Williamsburg.

Knowing that Gen. Huger could easily sp some troops to reinforce Yorktown, that he indeed done so, and that Johnston's army Manassas could be brought rapidly by the Jam and York rivers to the same point, I proceed to invest that town without delay.

The accompanying map of Colonel Cram, U ted States Topographical Engineers, attached Gen. Wool's staff, given to me as the result several months' labors, indicated the feasibil of the design. It was also an object of prim importance to reach the vicinity of Yorkto before the enemy was reinforced sufficiently enable him to hold in force his works at Bethel, Howard's Bridge, Ship Point, etc., on t road from Newport News. This was the m urgent as it was now evident that some da must elapse before the 1st corps could arrive.

Everything possible was done to hasten t disembarkation of the cavalry, artillery and w ons in the harbor, and on the 3d the orders march were given for the following day

There were at Fort Monroe and its vicinity the 3d, ready to move, two divisions of the corps two divisions of the 4th corps, one div ion of the 2d corps, and Syke's brigade of reg lar infantry, together with Hunt's artillery

rve, and the regiments of cavalry before nam-
, in all about 58,000 men and 100 guns. Rich-dson's and Hooker's divisions of the 2d and corps had not yet arrived, and Casey's divis-n of the 4th corps was unable to move for ant of wagons.

ANOTHER REDUCTION OF FORCE.

Before I left Washington an order had been ued by the War Department, placing Fort onroe and its dependencies under my control, d authorizing me to draw from the troops unr General Wool, a division of about 10,000 en, which was to be assigned to the 1st corps.
uring the night of the 3d I received a telegram om the adjutant-general of the army, stating at, by the President's order, I was deprived of control over Gen. Wool and the troops under s command, and forbidden to detach any of s troops without his sanction.

This order left me without any base of opera-ons under my own control, and to this day I n ignorant of the causes which led to it.

CO-OPERATION OF THE NAVY.

On my arrival at Fort Monroe the James River as declared, by the naval authorities, closed to e operations of their vessels, by the combined fluence of the enemy's batteries on its banks d the confederate steamers Merrimac, York-wn, Jamestown, and Teazer. Flag-officer oldsborough, then in command of the United ates squadron in Hampton Roads, regarded it nd, no doubt, justly) as his highest and most perative duty to watch and neutralize the errimac, and as he designed using his most owerful vessels in a contest with her, he did ot feel able to detach, for the assistance of the my, a suitable force to attack the water batters at Yorktown and Gloucester. All this was ntrary to what had been previously stated to e, and materially affected my plans. At no me during the operations against Yorktown was e navy prepared to lend us any material assisnce in its reduction, until after our land batters had partially silenced the works.

ADVANCE FROM FORT MONROE.

I had hoped, let me say, by rapid movements, drive before me or capture the enemy on the eninsula, open the James River, and press on Richmond before he should be materially re-nforced from other portions of his territory.
s the narrative proceeds, the causes will be eveloped which frustrated these apparently well-rounded expectations.

I determined, then, to move the two divisions
f the 4th corps by the Newport News and Villiamsburg road, to take up a position between 'orktown and Williamsburgh, while the two ivisions of the 3d corps moved direct from 'ort Monroe upon Yorktown, the reserves movng so as to support either corps, as might prove ecessary. I designed, should the works at 'orktown and Williamsburg offer a serious re-istance, to land the 1st corps, reinforced, if ne-essary, on the left bank of the York, or on the levern, to move it on Gloucester and West Point, n order to take in reverse whatever force the enemy might have on the Peninsula, and compel him to abandon his positions.

In the commencement of the movement from Fort Monroe, serious difficulties were encountered from the want of precise topographical information as to the country in advance.

Correct local maps were not to be found, and the country, though known in its general features, we found to be inaccurately described, in essential particulars, in the only maps and geographical memoirs or papers to which access could be had; erroneous courses to streams and roads were frequently given, and no dependence could be placed on the information thus derived. This difficulty has been found to exist with respect to most portions of the State of Virginia, through which my military operations have extended. Reconnoissances, frequently under fire, proved the only trustworthy sources of information. Negroes, however truthful their reports, possessed or were able to communicate, very little accurate and no comprehensive topographical information.

On the 3d the following orders were given for the movement of the 4th:

"Porter's and Hamilton's divisions, and Averill's cavalry of the 3d corps, and Sedgwick's division of the 2d corps, under Brig.-Gen. Heintzelman, commanding 3d corps, will move to-morrow in the following order: Porter's division, with Averill's cavalry at 6 A.M., over the New Market and New Bridges to Big Bethel and Howard's Bridge. The division will send forward to the batteries where the Ship Point road intersects the main Yorktown road, a sufficient force to hold that point, and cut off the garrison of the Ship Point batteries; the whole division may be used for this purpose, if necessary, and if possible the batteries should be occupied by our troops to-morrow. The portion of the division not necessary for this purpose will encamp at Howard's Bridge.

"Hamilton's division will march at 7 A.M., by the New Market Bridge, taking the direct road to Big Bethel, and will encamp on Howard's Creek.

"Sedgwick's division will march at 8 A.M., by the New Market Bridge, taking the direct road to Big Bethel, and will also encamp at Howard's Bridge.

"Brig.-Gen. Keyes, commanding 4th Corps, will move with Smith's and Couch's divisions at 5 A.M., (Smith's division in advance), by the James River road; the 5th Regular Cavalry, temporarily assigned to this corps, will move with Smith's division, which will encamp at Young's Mills, throwing forward at least one brigade to the road from Big Bethel to Warwick; Couch's division will encamp at Fisher's Creek.

"The reserve cavalry, artillery, and infantry will move at 8.30 A.M, by the New Market Bridge to Big Bethel, where it will encamp; on the march it will keep in the rear of Sedgwick's division."

The following is an extract from the orders issued on the 4th for the march of the 5th:

"The following movements of the army will be carried out to-morrow (5th):

"Gen. Keyes will move forward Smith's division at 6 A.M., via. Warwick Court House, and the road leading near the Old Ship Yard, to the Half Way House on the Yorktown and Williamsburg road.

"Gen. Couch's division will march at 6 A.M., to close up on Gen. Smith's division at the Half Way House.

"Gen. Keyes' command will occupy and hold the narrow dividing ridge near the Half Way House so as to prevent the escape of the garrison at Yorktown by land, and prevent reinforcements being thrown in.

"Gen. Heintzelman will move forward Gen. Porter's two brigades at 6 A.M., upon the advanced guard, when the entire division will advance to a point about two and three quarters miles from Yorktown, where the road turns abruptly to the north, and where a road comes in from Warwick Court House. Gen. Hamilton's division will move at 6 A.M., and follow Gen. Porter's division, camping as near it as possible. Gen. Sedgwick's division will march at 5 A.M., as far as the Warwick road, which enters the main Yorktown road near Dr. Power's house, and will await further orders.

The reserves will march at 6 A.M., upon the main Yorktown road, halting for further orders at Dr. Power's house; the infantry leading, the artillery following next, and the cavalry in rear.

"Gen. Sedgwick's division will, for the present, act with the reserve, and he will receive orders from head-quarters."

In giving these orders of march for the 4th and 5th, it was expected that there would be no serious opposition at Big Bethel, and that the advance of the 3d Corps beyond that point would force the enemy to evacuate the works at Young's Mills, while our possession of the latter would make it necessary for him to abandon those at Howard's Bridge, and the advance thence on Yorktown would place Ship Point in our possession, together with its garrison, unless they abandoned it promptly. The result answered the expectation.

During the afternoon of the 4th, Gen. Keyes obtained information of the presence of some 5,000 to 8,000 of the enemy, in a strong position at Lee's Mills: the nature of that position in relation to the Warwick not being at that time understood, I instructed Gen. Keyes to attack and carry this position on coming in front of it.

Early in the afternoon of the 5th, the advance of each column was brought to a halt: that of Heintzelman (Porter's division) in front of Yorktown, after overcoming some resistance at Big Bethel and Howard's Bridge: that of Keyes (Smith's division) unexpectedly before the enemy's works at Lee's Mills, where the road from Newport News to Williamsburg crosses Warwick River. The progress of each column had been retarded by heavy rains on that day, which had made the roads almost impassable to the infantry of Keye's column and impracticable to all but a small portion of the artillery, while ammunition, provision, and forage could not brought up at all.

When Gen. Keyes's approached Lee's Mills left flank was exposed to a sharp artillery from the further bank of the Warwick, upon reaching the vicinity of the mill, he fou it altogether stronger than was expected, un proachable by reason of the Warwick River, a incapable of being carried by assault.

The troops composing the advance of ea column were, during the afternoon under a wa artillery fire—the sharpshooters even of t right column being engaged, when covering connoissances.

THE FIRST CORPS WITHDRAWN BY ORDI OF THE PRESIDENT.

It was at this stage and moment of the ca paign that the following telegram was sent me:

Adjutant General's Office, April 4th, 1862.

GEN. MCCLELLAN,—

By direction of the President Gen. McDowel army corps has been detached from the force u der your immediate command; and the gener is to report to the Secretary of War; letter l mail.

The President having promised in our int view following his order of March 31st, wit drawing Blenker's division of 10,00 men fro my command, that nothing of the sort should l repeated, that I might rest assured that the cai paign should proceed with no further deductio from the force upon which its operations ha been planned, I may confess to having bee shocked at this order, which, with that of th 31st ult., removed nearly 60,000 men from m command, and reduced my force by more tha one-third after its task had been assigned, its op erations planned, its fighting begun. To me th blow was most discouraging. It frustrated a my plans for impending operations. It fell whe I was too deeply committed to withdraw. It lef me incapable of continuing operations whic had been begun. It compelled the adoption o another, a different, and a less effective plan o campaign. It made rapid and brilliant opera tions impossible. It was a fatal error.

It was now, of course, out of my power to turn Yorktown by West Point; I had, therefore, n choice left, but to attack it directly in front, as best could with the force at my command. Re connoissances made under fire on that and the following day, determined that the sources o the Warwick River were near Yorktown, com manded by its guns, while that stream for some distance from its mouth on the James River was controlled by the confederate gun-boats; that the fords had been destroyed by dams, the ap proaches to which were generally through dense forests and deep swamps, and defended by ex tensive and formidable works; that timber felled for defensive purposes, and the flooding of the roads caused by the dams had made these works apparently inaccessible and impossible to n; that Yorktown was strongly fortified, ied and garrisoned, and connected with the enses of the Warwick by forts and intrench- nts, the ground in front of which was swept the guns of Yorktown. It was also ascer- ied that the garrisons had been and were ly being reinforced by troops from Norfolk, l the army under Gen. J. E. Johnston.

Heavy rains made the roads to Fort Monroe passable and delayed the arrival of troops, munition and supplies, while storms prevented, several days, the sailing of transports from mpton Roads, and the establishment of de- fs on the creeks of York River near the army, The ground bordering the Warwick River is vered by very dense and extensive forests, clearings being small and few. This, with comparative flatness of the country, and the rtness of the enemy, everywhere in force, dered thorough reconnoissances slow, danger- s and difficult; yet, it was impossible other- se to determine whether any assault was any- here practicable, or whether the more tedious, t sure operations of a siege must be resorted

I made on the 6th and 7th, close personal re- nnoissances of the right and left of the ene- y's positions; which, with information acquired eady, convinced me that it was best to pre- re for an assault by a preliminary employment heavy guns, and some siege operations. In- ant assault would have been simple folly.

On the 7th, I telegraphed to the President as llows:

ead-quarters Army of Potomac, April 7th, 1862.

To the President, Washington, D. C.,—

Your telegram of yesterday received. In re- y I have the honor to state that my entire force r duty, amounts to only about (85,000) eighty- ve thousand men. Gen. Wool's command, as ou will observe from the accompanying order, as been taken out of my control, although he as most cheerfully co-operated with me. The nly use that can be made of his command, is to rotect my communications in rear of this point. t this time only fifty-three thousand men have oined me, but they are coming up as rapidly as y means of transportation will permit.

Please refer to my dispatch to the Secretary of War of to-night, for the details of our present ituation.

Geo. B. McClellan, Maj.-General.

On the same day I sent the following:

Head-Quarters, Army of the Potomac, in front of Yorktown, April 7, 1862, 7 P.M.

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Sec. of War,—

Your telegram of yesterday, arrived here while I was absent examining the enemy's right, which I did pretty closely.

The whole line of the Warwick, which really heads within a mile of Yorktown, is strongly defended by detached redoubts, and other fortifications, armed with heavy and light guns. The approaches, except at Yorktown, are covered by the Warwick, over which there is but one, or at most, two passages, both of which are covered by strong batteries. It will be necessary to resort to the use of heavy guns, and some siege operations, before we can assault. All the prisoners state that Gen. J. E. Johnston arrived at Yorktown yesterday with strong reinforcements. It seems clear that I shall have the whole force of the enemy on my hands, probably not less than (100,000) one hundred thousand men, and possibly more. In consequence of the loss of Blenker's division, and the 1st corps, my force is possibly less than that of the enemy, while they have all the advantage of positions.

I am under great obligations to you for the offer that the whole force and material of the government, will be as fully and speedily under my command as heretofore, or as if the new departments had not been created.

Since my arrangements were made for this campaign, at least (50,000) fifty thousand men have been taken from my command.

Since my dispatch of the 5th instant, five divisions have been in close observation of the enemy, and frequently exchanging shots. When my present command all joins, I shall have about (85,000) eighty-five thousand men for duty, from which a large force must be taken for guards, escorts, etc. With this army I could assault the enemy's works, and perhaps carry them; but were I in possession of their intrenchments, and assailed by double my numbers, I should have no fears as to the result.

Under the circumstances that have been developed since my arrival here, I feel fully impressed with the conviction, that here is to be fought the great battle that is to decide the existing contest. I shall, of course, commence the attack as soon as I can get up my siege train, and shall do all in my power to carry the enemy's works; but to do this with a reasonable degree of certainty, requires, in my judgment, that I should, if possible, have at least, the whole of the 1st Corps to land upon the Severn River, and attack Gloucester in the rear. My present strength will not admit of a detachment sufficient for this purpose, without materially impairing the efficiency of this column. Flag-officer Goldsborough, thinks the works too strong for his available vessels, unless I can turn Gloucester. I send, by mail, copies of his letter, and one of the commander of the gunboats here

Geo. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen.

THE SIEGE OF YORKTOWN.

I had provided a small siege train, and moderate supplies of intrenching tools, for such a contingency as the present. Immediate steps were taken to secure the necessary additions.

While the engineer officers were engaged in ascertaining the character and strength of all the defenses, and the configuration of the ground in front of Yorktown, in order to determine the point of attack, and to develop the approaches, the troops were occupied in opening roads to the depots established at the nearest available points on branches of York River. Troops were brought to the front as rapidly as possible, and on the 10th of April the army was posted as follows: Heintzelman's corps, composed of Porter's, Hooker's and Hamilton's division, in front of Yorktown, extending in the order named from the mouth of Wormley's Creek to the Warwick road opposite Winn's Mills; Sumner's corps, Sedgwick's division only having arrived, on the left of Hamilton, extending down the Warwick and opposite the Winn's Mills works; Keyes's corps, (Smith's, Couch's, and Casey's divisions,) on the left of Sedgwick, facing the works at the one-gun battery, Lee's Mills, etc., on the west bank of the Warwick. Sumner, after the 6th of April, commanded the left wing, composed of his own and Keyes's corps.

Throughout the preparations for, and during the siege of Yorktown, I kept the corps under Gen. Keyes, and afterwards the left wing under Gen. Sumner, engaged in ascertaining the character of the obstacles presented by the Warwick, and the enemy intrenched on the right bank, with the intention, if possible, of overcoming them and breaking that line of defense, so as to gain possession of the road to Williamsburg, and cut off Yorktown from its supports and supplies. The forces under Gen. Heintzelman were engaged in similar efforts upon the works between Winn's Mills and Yorktown. Gen. Keyes's report of the 16th of April, enclosing reports of brigade commanders engaged in reconnoissances up to that day, said, "that no part of his (the enemy's line opposite his) line, as far as discovered, can be taken by assault without an enormous waste of life." Reconnoissances on the right flank demonstrated the fact that the Warwick was not passable in that direction except over a narrow dam, the approaches to which were swept by several batteries and intrenchments, which could be filled quickly with supports sheltered by the timber immediately in rear.

Gen. Barnard, chief engineer of the Army of the Potomac, whose position entitled his opinions to the highest consideration, expressed the judgment that those formidable works could not, with any reasonable degree of certainty, be carried by assault. Gen. Keyes, commanding the 4th army corps, after the examination of the enemy's defenses on the left, before alluded to, addressed the following letter to the Hon. Ira Harris, U. S. Senate, and gave me a copy. Although not strictly official, it describes the situation at that time in some respects so well that I have taken the liberty of introducing it here.

Headquarters 4th Corps,
Warwick Court House, Va., April 7, 1862.

My Dear Senator:—The plan of campaign on this line was made with the distinct understanding that four army corps should be employed, and that the navy should co-operate in the taking of Yorktown, and also (as I understood it) support us on our left by moving gunboats up James River.

To-day I have learned that the 1st corps, which, by the President's order, was to embrace four divisions, and one division (Blenker's) of the 2d corps, have been withdrawn altogether from this line of operations, and from the Army of the Potomac. At the same time, as I am informed, the navy has not the means to attack Yorktown, is afraid to send gunboats up James River fear of the Merrimac.

The above plan of campaign was ado unanimously by Gen. McDowell and Brig.-G Sumner, Heintzelman and Keyes, and was curred in by Maj.-Gen. McClellan, who first posed Urbana as our base.

This army being reduced by forty-five thous troops, some of them the best in the service, without the support of the navy, the plan which we are reduced bears scarcely any res blance to the one I voted for.

I command the James River column, and I my camp, near Newport News, the morning the 4th instant. I only succeeded in getting artillery ashore the afternoon of the day bef and one of my divisions had not all arrive camp the day I left, and, for the want of tra portation, has not yet joined me. So you observe that not a day was lost in the advan and in fact we marched so quickly and so rapi that many of our animals were twenty-four forty-eight hours without a ration of forage. notwithstanding the rapidity of our advance, are stopped by a line of defense nine or ten mi long, strongly fortified by breastworks, erec nearly the whole distance, behind a stream succession of ponds no where fordable, one minus being Yorktown and the other ending the James River, which is commanded by enemy's gunboats. Yorktown is fortified around with bastioned works, and on the wa side, it and Gloucester are so strong that navy are afraid to attack either.

The approaches on our side are genera through low, swampy, or thickly-wooded grou over roads which we are obliged to repair or make, before we can get forward our carriag The enemy is in great force, and is constant receiving reinforcements from the two rive The line in front of us is therefore one of t strongest ever opposed to an invading force any country.

You will then ask, why I advocated such a li for our operations? My reasons are few, but, think, good.

With proper assistance from the navy, w could take Yorktown, and then, with gunboa on both rivers, we could beat any force oppose to us on Warwick River, because the shot an shells from the gunboats would nearly overla across the Peninsula, so that, if the enemy shoul retreat, and retreat he must, he would have long way to go without rail or steam transport tion, and every soul of his army must fall int our hands or be destroyed.

Another reason for my supporting the new base and plan was, that this line, it was expect ed, would furnish water transportation nearly t Richmond.

Now, supposing we succeed in breaking through the line in front of us, what can we d next? The roads are very bad, and if the enemy retains command of James River, and we do no first reduce Yorktown, it would be impossible us to subsist this army three marches beyond ere it is now. As the roads are at present, it with the utmost difficulty that we can subsist the position it now occupies.

You will see, therefore, by what I have said, t the force originally intended for the capture Richmond should be all sent forward. If I ught the four army corps necessary when I posed the navy would co-operate, and when dged of the obstacles to be encountered by at I learned from maps and the opinions of cers stationed at Fort Monroe, and from all er sources, how much more should I think full complement of troops requisite, now that navy cannot co-operate, and now that the my's lines and the number of his guns and n prove to be immeasurably greater than I been supposed to expect!

The line in front of us, in the opinion of all military men here who are at all competent judge, is one of the strongest in the world, and force of the enemy capable of being increased ond the numbers we now have to oppose to . Independently of the strength of the lines ront of us, and of the force of the enemy be- d them, we cannot advance until we get com- nd of York River or James River. The effi- nt co-operation of the navy is, therefore, olutely essential, and so I considered it when oted to change our base from the Potomac to t Monroe.

An iron-clad boat must attack Yorktown, and several strong gunboats could be sent up nes River also, our success will be certain and nplete, and the rebellion will soon be put wn.

On the other hand, we must butt against the my's works with heavy artillery and a great ste of time, life and material.

f we break through and advance, both our nks will be assailed from two great water- rses in the hands of the enemy; our supplies uld give out, and the enemy, equal, if not perior, in numbers, would, with other advan- es, beat and destroy this army.

The greatest master of the art of war has said t "if you would invade a country successfully, u must have one line of operations and one ny, under one general." But what is our con- ion? The State of Virginia is made to con- tute the command, in part or wholly, of some generals, viz.: Fremont, Banks, McDowell, ol, Burnside, and McClellan, besides the scrap, r the Chesapeake, in the care of Dix.

The great battle of the war is to come off. If win it, the rebellion will be crushed. If we e it, the consequences will be more horrible n I care to foretell. The plan of campaign I ted for, if carried out with the means pro- sed, will certainly succeed. If any part of the ans proposed are withheld or diverted, I deem ue to myself to say that our success will be certain.

It is no doubt agreeable to the commander of 1st corps to have a separate department; and, this letter advocates his return to Gen. McClellan's command, it is proper to state that I am not at all influenced by personal remark or dislike to any of my seniors in rank. If I were to credit all the opinions which have been poured into my ears, I must believe that, in regard to my present fine command, I owe much to Gen. McDowell and nothing to Gen. McClellan. But I have disregarded all such officiousness, and I have from last July to the present day, supported Gen. McClellan and obeyed all his orders with as hearty a good will as though he had been my brother or the friend to whom I owed most. I shall continue to do so to the last, and so long as he is my commander; and I am not desirous to displace him, and would not if I could. He left Washington with the understanding that he was to execute a definite plan of campaign with certain prescribed means. The plan was good and the means sufficient, and, without modification, the enterprise was certain of success. But, with the reduction of force and means, the plan is entirely changed, and is now a bad plan, with means insufficient for certain success.

Do not look upon this communication as the offspring of despondency. I never despond; and when you see me working the hardest, you may be sure that fortune is frowning upon me. I am working now, to my utmost.

Please show this letter to the President, and I should like also that Mr. Stanton should know its contents. Do me the honor to write to me as soon as you can, and believe me, with perfect respect,

Your obedient servant,

E. D. Keyes, Brig.-Gen. Comd'g 4th Army Corps.

Hon. Ira Harris, U. S. Senate.

On the 7th of April, and before the arrival of the divisions of Generals Hooker, Richardson and Casey, I received the following dispatches from the President and Secretary of War:

Washington, April 6, 1862. 8 p.m.

Gen. G. B. McClellan.—Yours of 11 a.m. to-day received. Secretary of War informs me that the forwarding of transportation, ammunition, and Woodbury's Brigade, under your orders, is not and will not be interfered with. You have over one hundred thousand troops with you, independent of Gen. Wool's command. I think you had better break the enemy's line from Yorktown to Warwick River at once. This will probably use time as advantageously as you can.

A. Lincoln, President.

Washington, April 6, 1862. 2 p.m.

Gen. G. B. McClellan.—The President directs me to say that your dispatch to him has been received. General Sumner's corps is on the road to join you, and will go forward as fast as possible. Franklin's division is now on the advance towards Manassas. There is no means of transportation here to send it forward in time to be of service to you in your present operations. Telegraph frequently, and all in the power of the government shall be done to sustain you as occasion requires.

Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

By the 9th of April I had acquired a pretty good knowledge of the enemy's works and the obstacles to be overcome.

On that day I received the following letter from the President.

Washington, April 9th, 1862.

Major-General McClellan:—

My Dear Sir,—Your dispatches, complaining that you are not properly sustained, while they do not offend me, do pain me very much.

Blenker's division was withdrawn from you before you left here, and you know the pressure under which I did it, and, as I thought, acquiesced in it, certainly without reluctance.

After you left I ascertained that less than twenty thousand unorganized men, without a single battery, were all you designed to be left for the defense of Washington and Manassas Junction; and part of this even was to go to Gen. Hooker's old position. Gen. Banks' old corps, once designed for Manassas Junction, was diverted and tied up on the line of Winchester and Strasburg, and could not leave it without again exposing the upper Potomac, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. This presented (or would present, when McDowell and Sumner should be gone) a great temptation to the enemy to turn back from the Rappahannock and sack Washington. My explicit order that Washington should, by the judgment of all the commanders of army corps, be left entirely secure, had been neglected. It was precisely this that drove me to detain McDowell.

I do not forget that I was satisfied with your arrangement to leave Banks at Manassas Junction; but when that arrangement was broken up and nothing was substituted for it, of course I was constrained to substitute something for it myself. And allow me to ask, "Do you really think I should permit the line from Richmond via. Manassas Junction to this city to be entirely open, except what resistance could be presented by twenty thousand unorganized troops?" This is a question which the country will not allow me to evade.

There is a curious mystery about the numbers of the troops now with you. When I telegraphed you on the 6th, saying you had over a hundred thousand with you, I had just obtained from the Secretary of War a statement, taken, as he said, from your own returns, making 108,000 then with you and en route to you. You now say you will have but 85,000 when all en route to you shall have reached you. How can the discrepancy of 23,000 be accounted for?

As to General Wool's command, I understand it is doing for you precisely what a like number of your own would have to do, if that command was away.

I suppose the whole force which has gone forward for you is with you by this time, and if so, I think it is the precise time to strike a blow. By delay the enemy will relatively gain upon you—that is, he will gain faster, by fortifications and reinforcements, than you can by reinforcements alone.

And once more, let me tell you, it is indispensable to you that you strike a blow. I am powerless to help this. You will do me justice to remember. I always insisted that go down the bay in search of a field, instead fighting at or near Manassas, was only shif and not surmounting a difficulty; that we wo find the same enemy, and the same or equal trenchments, at either place. The country not fail to note—is now noting—that the sent hesitation to move upon an intrenched my, is but the story of Manassas repeated.

I beg to assure you that I have never writ you, or spoken to you, in greater kindness feeling than now, nor with a fuller purpose sustain you, so far as in my most anxious ju ment I consistently can. But you must act.

Yours, very truly, A. Lincoln

With great deference to the opinions wishes of His Excellency the President, I m respectfully beg leave to refer to the facts wh I have presented, and those contained in the companying letter of General Keyes, with reports of General Barnard and other officers furnishing a reply to the above letter. His cellency could not judge of the formidable cl acter of the works before us as well as if he l been upon the ground, and whatever might h been his desire for prompt action (certainly greater than mine), I feel confident, if he co have made a personal inspection of the enem defenses, he would have forbidden me from ri ing the safety of the army and the possible s cesses of the campaign on a sanguinary assa of an advantageous and formidable positi which, even if successful, could not have b followed up to any other or better result t would have been reached by the regular ope tions of a siege. Still less could I forego conclusions of my most instructed judgment the mere sake of avoiding the personal co quences intimated in the President's dispatch.

The following extracts from the report of t chief engineer—Brig.-Gen. J. G. Barnard,—c body the result of our reconnoissances, and gi with some degree of detail, the character a strength of the defenses of Yorktown and t Warwick, and some of the obstacles which army contended against and overcome.

EXTRACTS FROM GEN. BARNARD'S R PORT.

"The accompanying drawing—Map No. 2 gives with accuracy the outline and armament the fortifications of Yorktown proper, with t detached works immediately connected with i

"The three bastioned fronts looking towar our approaches appear to have been earli built, and have about 15 feet thickness of pa pet, and 8 feet to 10 feet depth of ditch; t width varying much, but never leaving less, top of the scrap, than 15 feet: I think, general much more.

"The works extending around the town, fr the western salient of fronts just mention appear to have been finished during the la winter and spring. They have formidable p files, 18 feet thickness of parapet, and general 10 feet depth of ditch.

The water-batteries had, generally, 18 feet rapet, the guns in barbette.
They were—as well as the works mentioned refully constructed with well made sod-re-ents.
There were numerous traverses between the
, and ample magazines; how sufficient in b-proof qualities, I am unable to say.
The two first guns of the works on the hts, bear upon the water as well as the land, were of heavy calibre.
The list herewith, gives all the guns in posior for which there were emplacements. vacant emplacements were all occupied be-the evacuation by siege-guns, rifled 4½ inch, ounders and 18-pounders.
In Fort Magruder—the first exterior work—
e were found 1 8-inch Columbiad, 1 42-nder, and 1 8-inch siege-howitzer, the two ber 'en barbettee.' The sketch will show emplacements for guns on field and siege-riages, making, I think, with the foregoing, 22.
of these were placed behind traverses with rasures covered by bridges.
The two external redoubts, with the connect-parapets, formed a re-entrant with the fronts ttack, and all the guns bore on our apaches.
It will be seen, therefore, that our approaches e swept by the fire of at least 49 guns, nearly f which were heavy, and many of them the st formidable guns known; besides that, twods of the guns of the water-batteries, and all guns of Gloucester, bore on our right bates, though under disadvantageous circumnces.
The ravine, behind which the left of the rktown fronts of attack was placed, was not y difficult, as the heads formed depressions front of their left imperfectly seen by their
, and from which access could be had to the ches, but we could not be sure of this fact ore the evacuation. The enemy held, by ans of a slight breastwork, and rifle trenches, osition in advance of the heads of their ra-es, as far forward as the Brunt House.
The ravines, which head between the York-wn fortifications and the exterior works, are ep and intricate. They were tolerably well en, however, by the works which run west-rdly from the Yorktown works, and which re too numerous and complicated to be traced paper.
"Fort Magruder, the first lunette on our left,
pears to have been built at an early period.
"The external connection between this work, is first a rifle trench, probably afterwards en-ged into a parapet, with external ditch, and an nplacement for four guns in or near the small dan in the centre.
"Behind this they had constructed numerous aulments with connecting boyans not fully ranged for infantry fires, and mainly intended, obably, to protect their camps and reserves gainst the destructive effects of our artillery.
"From the 'red redoubt,' these trenches and aulments, ran to the woods and rivulet which rms a head of the Warwick, and continue almost without break to connect with the works at Winn's Mills This stream just mentioned, (whatever be its name, the term 'Warwick,' according to some, applying only to the tidal channel from the James River, up as high as Lees's Mill), was inundated by a number of dams, from near where its head is crossed by the epaulments mentioned, down to Lee's Mill.

"Below Lee's Mill, the Warwick follows a tortuous course through salt marshes of 200 or 300 yards in width, from which the land rises up boldly to a height of 40 or 50 feet.

"The first group of works is at Winn's Mill, where there is a dam and bridge. The next is, to guard another dam between Winn's and Lee's Mills, (this is the point attacked by General Smith, on the 16th ultimo, and where Lieut. Merrill was wounded; the object of the attack was -merely to prevent the further construction of works, and feel the strength of the position.) A work, of what extent is not now known, was at the sharp angle of the stream, just above Lee's Mill, and a formidable group of works was at Lee's Mill, where there was also a dam and bridge.

"From Lee's Mill a line of works extends across Mulberry Island (or it is supposed to do so).

"At Southall's Landing is another formidable group of works, and from here, too, they extend apparently across the James.

"These groups of field works were connected by rifle trenches or parapets, for nearly the whole distance.

"They are far more extensive than may be supposed, from the mention of them I make; and every kind of obstruction which the country affords, such as abattis, marsh, inundation, &c., was skillfully used. The line is certainly one of the most extensive known to modern times.

"The country on both sides the Warwick, from near Yorktown down, is a dense forest, with few clearings. It was swampy, and the roads impassable during the heavy rains we have constantly had, except where our own labors have corduroyed them.

"If we could have broken the enemy's line across the isthmus, we could have invested Yorktown, and it must, with its garrison, have soon fallen into our hands.

"It was not deemed practicable, considering the strength of that line, and the difficulty of handling our forces (owing to the impracticable character of the country), to do so.

"If we could take Yorktown, or drive the enemy out of that place, the enemy's line was no longer tenable. This we could do by siege operations. It was deemed too hazardous to attempt the reduction of the place by assault."

The plan of the approaches and their defenses, as determined upon and finally executed, is exhibited in the accompanying map. It was, in words, to open the first parallel as near as possible to the works of the enemy, and under its protection to establish, almost simultaneously, batteries along the whole front, extending from York River, on the right, to the Warwick, on the left —a chord of about one mile in length. The principal approaches were directed against the east end of the main work (which was most heavily armed, and bore both on the water and land), and lay between Wormley's Creek and York River. There, also, were placed the most of the batteries designed to act against the land front, to enfilade the water batteries, and to act upon Gloucester. I designed at the earliest moment to open simultaneously with several batteries, and as soon as the enemy's guns, which swept the neck of land between Wormley's Creek and the Warwick, were crippled, and their fire kept down, to push the trenches as far forward as necessary, and to assault Yorktown and the adjacent works.

The approaches to the batteries, the necessary bridges, and the roads to the depots, had been vigorously pushed to completion, by the troops under Gens. Heintzelman and Sumner, and were available for infantry, and in some instances for artillery, on the 17th of April, when the batteries and their connections were commenced, and labor upon them kept up, night and day, until finished.

Some of the batteries, on easy ground and concealed from the view of the enemy, were early completed and armed, and held ready for any emergency, but not permitted to open, as the return fire of the enemy would interfere too much with the labor on other and more important works. The completion of the more exposed and heaviest batteries was delayed by storms, preventing the landing of guns and ammunition. It having been discovered that the enemy were receiving artillery stores at the wharf in Yorktown, on May 1st, Battery No. 1 was opened with effect upon the wharf and town.

On the 22d of April, Gen. Franklin, with his division from Gen. McDowell's corps, had arrived and reported to me. The garrison of Gloucester Point had been reinforced and the works strengthened; but as this division was too small to detach to the Severn, and no more troops could be spared, I determined to act on Gloucester by disembarking it on the north bank of the York River, under the protection of the gunboats. The troops were mainly kept on board ship while the necessary preparations were made for landing them, and supporting them in case of necessity. For a full account of this labor, I refer to the report of Lieut.-Col. B. S. Alexander, of the Engineer Corps, detailed for this expedition.

While the siege works were being rapidly completed, the roads on the left wing necessary for communication and advance were opened and corduroyed over the marshes, batteries were erected to silence the enemy's guns and drive him from his works at Winn's and Lee's Mills, preparatory to the general attack, active reconnoissances were continually going on, and attempts in force made to drive the enemy from the banks.

The result of various reconnoissances made under the immediate direction of Gen. W. F. Smith, commanding 2d division, 4th corps, led to the belief that the weakest poin. of that part of the enemy's lines, was opposite a field, where it was ascertained that there was a dam covered by a battery known to contain at least one gun. It was determined to push a strong reconnoissance on this point, to silence the enemy's fire, and ascertain the actual strength of the position, b prepared to sustain the reconnoitering party real attack, if found expedient.

Gen. W. F. Smith was directed to under the operation on the 16th of April. He silen the enemy's guns, discovered the existence other works, previously concealed and unkno and sent a strong party across the stream, wh was finally forced to retire with some loss; Gen. Smith intrenched himself in a position mediately overlooking the dam and the enem works, so as to keep them under control, prevent the enemy using the dam as a means crossing the Warwick to annoy us.

Many times towards the end of the month, enemy attempted to drive in our pickets and t our rifle-pits near Yorktown, but always with success. As the siege progressd it was w great difficulty that the rifle-pits on the ri could be excavated and held, so little cover could be made against the hot fire of the enem artillery and infantry. Their guns continued to a late hour of the night of the 3d of May.

Our batteries would have been ready to op on the morning of the 6th of May at latest, on the morning of the 4th it was discovered t the enemy had already been compelled to eva ate his position during the night, leaving beh him all his heavy guns uninjured, and a la amount of ammunition and supplies.

For the details of the labors of this siege, I fer to the accompanying reports and journals Brig-Gen. J. G. Barnard, chief engineer, charg with the selection and laying out, and con tion of the approaches and batteries; of Br Gen. W. F. Barry, chief of artillery, charged w arming and supplying with ammunition all siege and field batteries; and of Brig.-Gen. F John Porter, director of the siege, to whom w assigned the guaading of the trenches, the asse bling and distribution of the working parties, & &c.

THE PURSUIT TO WILLIAMSBURG

Early in the morning of the 4th, upon the en my's abandoning his lines at Yorktown, I order all the available cavalry force, with four batteri of horse artillery, under Brig.-Gen. Stoneman, chi of cavalry, in immediate pursuit, by the Yorktow and Williamsburg road, with orders to hara the enemy's rear, and try to cut off such of h forces as had taken the Lee's Mill and William burg road.

Gen. Heintzelman was directed to send Hoo er's division forward on the Yorktown and W liamsburg road to support Gen. Stoneman; an Gen Smith was ordered to proceed with his div sion on the Lee's Mill and Williamsburg road f the same purpose; afterwards the divisions Gens. Kearney, Couch and Casey were put route, the first on the Yorktown road, and th others on the Lee's Mill road. These roads uni about a quarter of a mile south of Fort Magrude, and are connected by cross-roads at sever points between Yorktown and Williamsbur After these directions had been given, Gen. Sum ner, (the officer second in rank in the Army the Potomac) was ordered to proceed to the fro

d take immediate charge of operations until r arrival.

en. Stoneman moved forward promptly with command (consisting of four batteries of horsellery under Lieut.-Col. Hays, the 1st and 6th
S. cavalry, the 3d Pennsylvania, and 8th Illis and Barker's squadron.) meeting with but e opposition until he arrived in front of the my's works, about two miles east of Williams-
g. At a point about eight miles from York-n, in accordance with my instructions he deed Gen. Emory with Benson's battery, the 3d nsylvania cavalry (Col. Averell) and Barker's adron, to gain the Lee's Mill road, and endea-
, with the assistance of Gen. Smith, to cut off portion of the enemy's rear-guard, which had en that route. Gen. Emory had some sharp rmishes with a regiment of cavalry, and a bat-r under Gen. Stuart, and drove them in the dition of Lee's Mill. Gen. Smith having met h obstructions in his front, had transferred his umn by a cross-road to the Yorktown and Wil-msburg road, so that Gen. Emory finding no ce to co-operate with him was unable to cut the rear-guard, and they succeeded in escap-by a circuitous route, along the bank of the nes River.

The position in which Gen. Stoneman encouned the enemy is about four miles in extent, the t resting on College Creek, and the left on een's Creek, nearly three-fourths of its front ng covered by tributaries of those two creeks, on which there are ponds. The ground been the heads of the tributary streams is a tivated plain, across which a line of detached rks had been constructed, consisting of Fort gruder, a large work in the centre with a bas-n front, and twelve other redoubts and epaulnts for field-guns.

The parapet of Fort Magruder is about six t high and nine feet thick, the ditch nine feet de and nine feet deep, filled with water. The gth of the interior crest is about 600 yards.
e redoubts have strong profiles, but are of all dimensions, having faces of about forty rds. The woods in front of the position were ed, and the open ground in front of the works
s dotted with numerous rifle pits.

The roads leading from the lower part of the ninsula towards Williamsburg, one along the rk River—the Yorktown road—and the other ng the James,—the Lee's Mill road—unite be-een the heads of the tributary streams a short stance in front of Fort Magruder, by which ey are commanded, and debouch from the oods just before uniting. A branch from the nes River road leaves it about one and three arter miles below Fort Magruder, and unites ith the road from Allen's Landing to Williamsrg, which crosses the tributary of College reek over a dam at the outlet of a pond, and sses just in rear of the line of works, being mmanded by the three redoubts on the right of e line.

At about the same distance from Fort Magruer a branch leaves the York River road, and rosses the tributary of Queen's Creek on a dam, d passing over the position and through the woods in its rear, finally enters Williamsburg. This road is commanded by redoubts on the left of the line of works.

Gen. Stoneman debouched from the woods with his advance guard—consisting of a part of the 1st U. S. Cavalry and one section of Gibson's battery, under the command of Gen. Cook—and the enemy immediately opened on him with several field-pieces from Fort Magruder, having the correct range and doing some execution. Gibson's battery was brought into position as rapidly as the deep mud would permit, and returned the fire, while the 6th U. S. Cavalry was sent to feel the enemy's left. This regiment passed one redoubt, which it found unoccupied, and appeared in the rear of a second, when a strong cavalry force, with infantry and artillery, came down upon it; whereupon the regiment was withdrawn. The rear squadron, under command of Captain Saunders, repelled a charge of the enemy's cavalry in the most gallant manner. In the meantime the enemy was being reinforced by infantry, and the artillery fire becoming very hot, Gen. Stoneman, having no infantry to carry the works, ordered the withdrawal of the battery. This was accomplished, with the exception of one piece which could not be extricated from the mud. The enemy attempted to prevent the movement, but their charges were met by the 1st U. S. Cavalry, under command of Lieut.-Colonel Grier, and they were driven back, losing several officers and one stand of colors. Gen. Stoneman then took up a defensive position a short distance in the rear of the first, to await the arrival of the infantry. The advance of General Smith's column reached Skiff's Creek about 11½ o'clock, and found the bridge over the stream in flames, and the road impassable. A practicable route to the Yorktown road having been discovered, the division, by order of General Sumner, moved on by that road, and reached Gen. Stoneman's position about 5½ o'clock. General Sumner arriving with it, assumed command.

Generals Heintzelman and Keyes also arrived during the afternoon near the Half-Way House. The head of General Hooker's column encountered Smith's division, filing into the road, and was obliged to halt between three and four hours, until it had passed Gen. Hooker then followed on, and at Checcecahe Church turned off, by Gen. Heintzelman's direction, taking a cross-road, and moved out on the Lee's Mill road, thus changing places with Gen. Smith. Marching part of the night, he came in sight of Fort Magruder early in the morning of the 5th.

General Smith's division, having been deployed General Sumner ordered an attack on the works, in his front, but the lines having been thrown into confusion while moving through the dense forest, and darkness coming on, the attempt, for that night, was abandoned. The troops bivouacked in the woods, and a heavy rain began, which continued until the morning of the 6th, making the roads, already in a very bad condition, almost impassable.

THE BATTLE OF WILLIAMSBURG.

During the morning of the 5th, General Sumner reconnoitered the position in his front, and at 11 o'clock, ordered Hancock's brigade, of Smith's division, to take possession of a work on the enemy's left, which had been found to be unoccupied. The remainder of Smith's division occupied the woods in front, without being actually engaged. The divisions of Couch and Casey, had received orders during the night to march at daylight, but on account of the terrible condition of the roads, and other impediments, were not able to reach the field until after 1 o'clock, p.m., at which time the first brigade of Couch's division arrived, and was posted in the centre, on Hooker's right. The other two brigades came up during the afternoon, followed by Casey's division. In the meantime, General Hooker having reconnoitered the enemy's position, began the attack at 7½ o clock, a.m., and for a while silenced the guns of Fort Magruder, and cleared the ground in his front. But the enemy being continually reinforced, until their strength greatly exceeded his, made attack after attack, endeavoring to turn his left. For several hours his division struggled gallantly against the superior numbers of the enemy. Five guns of Webber's battery were lost, and between 3 and 4 o'clock, his ammunition began to give out. The loss had been heavy and the exhaustion of the troops was very great. At this time the division of General Kearney came up, who, at 9 a.m., had received orders to reinforce Hooker, and who had succeeded, by the greatest exertion, in passing Casey's troops, and pushing on the front through the deep mud. General Kearney at once gallantly attacked, and thereby prevented the loss of another battery, and drove the enemy back at every point, enabling Gen. Hooker to extricate himself from his position, and withdraw his wearied troops.

Peck's brigade, of Couch's division, as has been mentioned before, was immediately on its arrival, ordered by Gen. Sumner to deploy on Hooker's right. This was promptly done, and the attacks of the enemy at that point were repulsed. Gen. Peck, held his position until late in the afternoon, when he was relieved by the other two brigade's of Couch's division, and they were in quiet possession of the ground when night closed the contest.

The vigorous action of these troops relieved Gen. Hooker considerably. Gen. Emory, had been left with his command, on the night of the 4th, to guard the branch of the Lee's Mill road, which leads to Allen's Farm, and on the morning of the 5th, it was ascertained that by this route the enemy's right could be turned. A request for infantry for this purpose, was made to Gen. Heintzelman, who, late in the afternoon, sent four regiments and two batteries of Kearney's division, the first disposable troops he had, and directed Gen. Emory to make the attack. With these reinforcements, his force amounted to about 3,000 men, and 3 batteries. Gen. Emory, on account of want of knowledge of the ground, and the lateness of the hour, did not succeed in this movement. It involved some risks, but if successful, might have produced important results. At 11 a.m., as before mentioned, Gen. Smith received orders from General Sumner, to send one brigade across a dam on our right, to occupy redoubt on the left of the enemy's line; Ha cock's brigade was selected for this purpo He crossed the dam, took possession of the fi redoubt, and afterwards finding the second o vacated, he occupied that also, and sent for rei forcements to enable him to advance further, a take the next redoubt, which commanded t plain between his position and Fort Magrud and would have enabled him to take in rever and cut the communication of the troops e gaged with Generals Hooker and Kearney. T enemy soon began to show himself in streng before him, and, as his rear and right flank we somewhat exposed, he repeated his request f reinforcements. Gen. Smith was twice order to join him with the rest of his division, b each time the order was countermanded at t moment of execution; Gen. Sumner not bei willing to weaken the centre. At length, reply to Gen. Hancock's repeated messages f more troops, Gen. Sumner sent him an order fall back to his first position; the execution which, Gen. Hancock deferred as long as pos ble, being unwilling to give up the advanta already gained, and fearing to expose his co mand by such a movement.

During the progress of these events I had r mained at Yorktown, to complete the prepar tions for the departure of Gen. Franklin's a other troops to West Point by water, and make the necessary arrangements with the nav commander, for his co-operation.

By pushing Gen. Franklin, well supported, l water to the right bank of the Pamunkey opp site West Point, it was hoped to force the enem to abandon whatever works he might have c the Peninsula below that point, or be cut off. was of paramount importance that the arrang ments to this end should be promptly made.

At an early hour of the morning, I had se two of my aids (Lieut.-Col. Sweitzer and Ma Hammerstein) to observe the operations in fron with instructions to report to me everything importance that might occur. I received no i formation from them leading me to suppose th there was anything occurring of more impor ance than a simple affair of a rear guard, unt about 1 o'clock, p.m., when a dispatch arrive from one of them that everything was not pr gressing favorably; this was confirmed a fe minutes later by the reports of Governor Spragu and Major Hammerstein, who came directly fro the scene of action.

Completing the necessary arrangements, I r turned to my camp without delay, rode rapidly t the front, a distance of some fourteen mile through roads much obstructed by troops an wagons, and reached the field between 4 and 5 p.m., in time to take a rapid survey of th ground. I soon learned that there was no direc communication between our centre and the le under Gen. Heintzelman. The centre was chiefl in the nearer edge of the woods situated betwee us and the enemy. As heavy firing was heard i the direction of Gen. Hancock's command, I im mediately ordered Gen. Smith to proceed wit his two remaining brigades to support that par

the line. Gen. Naglee, with his brigade re-ved similar orders. I then directed our cen- to advance to the further edge of the woods, ntioned above, which was done; and attempt- to open direct communication with Gen. intzelman, but was prevented by the marshy te of the ground in the direction in which the empt was made. Before Generals Smith and glee could reach the field of Gen. Hancock's erations, although they moved with great ra-lity, he had been confronted by a superior ce. Feigning to retreat slowly, he awaited ir onset, and then turned upon them: after ne terrific volleys of musketry he charged m with the bayonet, routing and dispersing ir whole force; killing, wounding and cap-ing from 500 to 600 men, he, himself losing y thirty-one men.

This was one of the most brilliant engagements the war, and Gen. Hancock merits the highest aise for the soldierly qualities displayed, and perfect appreciation of the vital importance his position.

Night put an end to all the operations here, d all the troops who had been engaged in this ntest slept on the muddy field without shelter, d many without food.

Notwithstanding the report I received from n. Heintzelman during the night, that Gen. ooker's division had suffered so much that it uld not be relied upon next day, and that arney's could not do more than hold its own, thout reinforcements—being satisfied that the sult of Hancock's engagement was to give us ssession of the decisive point of the battle-ld—during the night I countermanded the der for the advance of the divisions of Sedg-ck and Richardson, and directed them to turn to Yorktown, to proceed to West Point water.

Our loss during the day, the greater part of hich was sustained by Hooker's division, was follows: killed, 456; wounded, 1,400; missing, 2 Total, 2,228.

On the next morning we found the enemy s osition abandoned, and occupied fort Magruder d the town of Williamsburg, which was filled ith the enemy's wounded, to whose assistance ghteen of their surgeons were sent by Gen. J. Johnston, the officer in command. Several ms and caissons which the enemy could not rry off on account of the mud were secured.

Col. Averill was sent forward at once with a rong cavalry force, to endeavor to overtake the nemy's rear guard. He found several guns bandoned and picked up a large number of tragglers, but the conditions of the road and the tate of his supplies forced him to return after dvancing a few miles.

It is my opinion that the enemy opposed us ere with only a portion of his army. When s cavalry first appeared, there was nothing but he enemy's rear guard in Williamsburg: al-hough troops were brought back during the ight and the next day, to hold the works as ong as possible, in order to gain time for the rains, etc., already well on their way to Rich-ond, to make their escape.

Our troops were greatly exhausted by the laborious march through the mud from their positions in front of Yorktown, and by the protracted battle through which they had just passed; many of them were out of rations and ammunition, and one division, in its anxiety to make a prompt movement, had marched with empty haversacks. The supply trains had been forced out of the roads on the 4th and 5th, to allow the troops and artillery to pass to the front, and the roads were now in such a state, that it was almost impossible to pass even empty wagons over them. Gen. Hooker's division had suffered so bad that it was in no condition to follow the enemy even if the roads had been good; under these circumstances, an immediate pursuit was impossible.

Steps were at once taken to care for and remove the wounded, and to bring up provisions, ammunition and forage. The condition of the roads, as has been said, rendered it next to impossible to accomplish this by land from Yorktown; a temporary depot was therefore promptly established on Queen's Creek, and supplies drawn, and the wounded shipped from that point.

ADVANCE TO THE CHICKAHOMINY.

The Divisions of Franklin, Sedgwick, Porter, and Richardson were sent from Yorktown by water to the right bank of the Pamunkey, in the vicinity of West Point. The remaining divisions, the train, and the reserve artillery moved subsequently by land.

Early on the morning of the 7th, Gen. Franklin had completed the disembarkation of his division, and had placed it in a good position to cover the landing place, both his flanks and a large portion of the front being protected by water.

Dana's brigade of Sedgwick's division arrived during the morning.

At about 9, a.m., a large force of the enemy appeared, consisting of Whiting's division and other troops, and between 10 and 11, they attacked the part of the line held by Newton's brigade.

The action continued until 3 p.m., when the enemy retired, all his attacks having been repulsed. This affair, the most important in which the division had been engaged, was highly creditable to Gen. Franklin and his command. For the details I refer to this report, which is herewith submitted. Our loss was 40 killed, 104 wounded, and 41 missing. Total 194, which includes a large proportion of officers.

Cavalry reconnoissances were sent out from Williamsburg on the 6th and 7th, and on the 8th Gen. Stoneman moved, with an advance guard of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, to open communication with Gen. Franklin.

As soon as our supplies had been received, and the condition of the roads had become a little better, though still very bad, the advance of the remaining troops was begun, Smith's division moving on the 8th.

On the 10th, headquarters were at Roper's Church, 19 miles from Williamsburg. All the divisions which had moved by land (except Hooker's) being in the vicinity of that place. We were no in direct communication with the portion of the army which had gone by water, and we began to draw supplies from Eltham. On account of the small number and narrowness of the roads in this neighborhood, movements were difficult and slow.

On the 13th, headquarters, and the divisions of Franklin, Porter, Sykes and Smith, reached Cumberland, which was made a temporary depot. Couch and Casey were then near New Kent Court House, Hooker and Kearney near Roper's Church, and Richardson and Sedgwick near Eltham.

On the 14th and 15th much rain fell.

On the 15th and 16th the divisions of Franklin, Smith and Porter were with great difficulty moved to White House, five miles in advance. So bad was the road that the train of one of these divisions required thirty-six hours to pass over this short distance.

Gen. Stoneman had occupied this place some days before, after several successful skirmishes, in which our cavalry proved superior to that of the enemy. The reports of these affairs are appended.

About this time, with the consent of the President, two additional corps were organized, viz.: the 5th Provisional Corps, consisting of the divisions of Porter and Sykes, and the Reserve Artillery, under the command of F. J. Porter; and the 6th Provisional Corps, consisting of the divisions of Franklin and Smith, under the command of Gen. W. B. Franklin.

Headquarters reached White House on the 16th, and a permanent depot was at once organized there.

On the 19th, headquarters, and the corps of Porter and Franklin, moved to Tunstall's Station, five miles from White House.

On the 20th more rain fell.

On the 21st the position of the troops was as follows:—

Stoneman's Advance Guard, one mile from New Bridge.

Franklin's Corps, three miles from New Bridge, with .

Porter's Corps, at supporting distance in its rear.

Sumner's Corps, on the railroad, about three miles from the Chickahominy, connecting the right with the left.

Keyes's Corps, on New Kent Road, near Bottom's Bridge, with Heintzelman's Corps, at supporting distance in its rear.

The ford at Bottom's Bridge was in our possession, and the re-building of the bridge, which had been destroyed by the enemy, was commenced.

On the 22d headquarters moved to Coal Harbor.

On the 26th the railroad was in operation as far as the Chickahominy, and the railroad bridge across that stream nearly completed.

SECOND PERIOD.

PART II.

OPERATIONS BEFORE RICHMOND.

When, on the 20th of May, our advanced light troops reached the banks of the Chickahominy River, at Bottom's Bridge, they found that the as well as the railroad bridge, about a mile al had been destroyed by the enemy.

The Chickahominy in this vicinity is about ty feet wide, fringed with a dense growth heavy forest trees, and bordered by low, ma bottom-lands, varying from half a mile to a in width.

Our operations embraced that part of the r between Bottom's and Meadow Bridges, wh covered the principal approaches to Richm from the east.

Within these limits the firm ground, lying ab high-water mark, seldom approaches near river on either bank, and no locality was fo within this section, where the high ground ca near the stream on both sides. It was subject frequent, sudden and great variations in the ume of water, and a rise of a few feet overflow the bottom-lands on both sides.

At low wate it could be forded at almost a point, but during high water it rose above a fo ing stage, and could then be crossed only at few points where bridges had been construct These bridges had all been destroyed by the e my on our approach, and it was necessary only to reconstruct these, but to build seve others.

The west bank of the river, opposite the N and Mechanicsville bridges, was bordered by e vated bluffs, which afforded the enemy commar ing positions to fortify, establish his batteri enfilading the approaches upon the two princi roads to Richmond, in one night, and resist t reconstruction of the important bridges. Th obliged us to select other less exposed points f our crossings.

As the enemy was not in great force opposi Bottom's Bridge, on the arrival of our left at th point, and as it was important to secure a lod ment upon the right bank before he should hav time to concentrate his forces and contest th passage, I forthwith ordered Casey's division t ford the river and occupy the opposite height This was promptly done on the 20th, and reco noissances were at once pushed out in advance.

These troops were directed to throw up de fenses in an advantageous position to secure on left flank. Gen. Heintzelman's corps was throwi forward in support, and Bottom's Bridge immedi ately rebuilt.

In the meantime our centre and right were ad vanced to the river above, and on the 24th we carried the village of Mechanicsville, driving the enemy out with our artillery, and forcing them across the bridge which they destroyed. Gen. Naglee on the same day dislodged a force of the enemy from the vicinity of the "Seven Pines." on the Bottom's Bridge road, and our advance on the left secured a strong position near that place.

All the information obtained from deserters, negroes and spies, indicated that the enemy occupied in force all the approaches to Richmond from the east, and that he intended to dispute every step of our advance beyond the Chickahominy, and the passage of the stream opposite our right. That their army was superior to ours numbers did not admit of a doubt. Strong de-ses had been constructed around Richmond.

mpressed by these facts with the necessity of engthening the army for the struggle, I did fail to urge repeatedly upon my superiors the portance of reinforcing the Army of the Poto-c with every disposable man, in order to ine the success of an attack upon the rebel cap-l.

On the 10th of May I telegraphed as follows:—

Camp at Ewell's Farm, three miles beyond Williamsburg, May 10, 1862, 5 A. M.

n. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

From the information reaching me from every rce, I regard it as certain that the enemy will et us with all his force, on or near the Chickа-miny. They can concentrate many more men an I have, and are collecting troops from all arters, especially well-disciplined troops from e South. Casualties, sickness, garrisons and ards, have much reduced my numbers, and will ntinue to do so. I shall fight the rebel army th whatever force I may have; but duty re-ires me to urge that every effort be made to nforce me without delay with all the disposa-le troops in Eastern Virginia, and that we ncentrate all our forces, as far as possible, to ht the great battle now impending, and to make decisive.

It is possible that the enemy may abandon chmond without a serious struggle; but I do t believe he will—and it would be unwise to unt on anything but a stubborn and desperate fense, a life and death contest. I see no other pe for him than to fight this battle, and we ust win it. I shall fight them whatever their rce may be; but I ask for every man that the epartment can send me. No troops should now e left unemployed. Those who entertain the inion that the rebels will abandon Richmond ithout a struggle, are in my judgment badly adsed, and do not comprehend their situation, hich is one requiring desperate measures.

I beg that the President and Secretary will ma-rely weigh what I say, and leave nothing un-one to comply with my request. If I am not re-forced, it is probable that I will be obliged to ght nearly double my numbers, strongly intrench-d. I do not think it will be at all possible for e to bring more than (70,000) seventy thou-nd men upon the field of battle.

Geo. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen. Com'g.

On the 14th of May I sent the following tele-ram to the President:

Camp at Cumberland, May 14, 1862.

His Excellency, Abraham Lincoln, President of
he U. S.:

I have more than twice telegraphed to the ecretary of War, stating, that in my opinion he enemy were concentrating all their available orce to fight this army in front of Richmond, nd that such ought to be their policy. I have eceived no reply whatever to any of these telegraphs.

I beg leave to repeat their substance to your Excellency, and to ask that kind consideration which you have ever accorded to my representaions and views. All my information from every source accessible to me, establishes the fixed purpose of the rebels to defend Richmond against this army by offering us battle with all the troops they can collect from east, west, and south, and my own opinion is confirmed by that of all my commanders whom I have been able to consult.

Casualties, sickness, garrisons, and guards have much weakened my force, and will continue to do so. I cannot bring into actual battle against the enemy more than eighty thousand men at the utmost, and with them I must attack in position, probably intrenched, a much larger force—perhaps double my numbers. It is possible that Richmond may be abandoned without a serious struggle, but the enemy are actually in great strength between here and there, and it would be unwise, and even insane for me to calculate upon anything but a stubborn and desperate resistance.
If they should abandon Richmond, it may well be that it is done with the purpose of making the stand at some place in Virginia south or west of there, and and we should be in condition to press them without delay. The confederate leaders must employ their utmost efforts against this army in Virginia, and they will be supported by the whole body of their military officers, among whom there may be said to be no Union feeling, as there is also very little among the higher class of citizens in the seceding States.

I have found no fighting men in this Peninsula
—all are in the ranks of the opposing foe.

Even if more troops than I now have should prove unnecessary for purposes of military occupation, our greatest display of imposing force in the capital of the rebel government will have the best moral effect. I most respectfully and earnestly urge upon your Excellency that the opportunity has come for striking a fatal blow at the enemies of the Constitution, and I beg that you will cause this army to be reinforced without delay by all the disposable troops of the government. I ask for every man that the government can send me. Any commander of the reinforcements, whom your Excellency may designate, will be acceptable to me, whatever expression
I may have heretofore addressed to you on that subject.

I will fight the enemy, whatever their force may be, and whatever force I may have, and I firmly believe that we shall beat them, but our triumph should be made decisive and complete.
The soldiers of this army love their government, and will fight well in its support: you may rely upon them. They have confidence in me as their general, and in you as their President. Strong reinforcements will at least save the lives of many of them. The greater our force, the more perfect will be our combinations, and the less our loss.

For obvious reasons, I beg you to give immediate consideration to this communication, and to inform me fully at the earliest moment of your final determination.

Geo. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen. Com.

To which, on the 18th of May, I received this reply:

Hd.-Qu'rs, Dep'rt Potomac, May 18th, 1862.

To Maj.-Gen. Geo. B. McClellan,

Comd'g Army of Potomac before Richmond.

General,—Your dispatch to the President, asking reinforcements, has been received and carefully considered.

The President is not willing to uncover the capital entirely, and it is believed that even if this were prudent it would require more time to effect a junction between your army and that of the Rappahannock, by way of the Potomac and York River, than by a land march. In order therefore to increase the strength of the attack upon Richmond at the earliest moment, Gen. McDowell has been ordered to march upon that city by the shortest route. He is ordered, keeping himself always in position to save the capital from all possible attack, so to operate as to put his left wing in communication with your right wing, and you are instructed to co-operate so as to establish this communication as soon as possible by extending your right wing to the north of Richmond.

It is believed that this communication can be safely established either north or south of the Pamunkey River.

In any event you will be able to prevent the enemy's forces from leaving Richmond, and falling in overwhelming force upon Gen. McDowell. He will move with between thirty-five and forty thousand men.

A copy of the instructions to Gen. McDowell is with this. The specific task assigned to his command, has been to provide against any danger to the capital of the nation.

At your earnest call for reinforcements, he is sent forward to co-operate in the reduction of Richmond, but charged, in attempting this, not to uncover the city of Washington, and you will give no order, either before or after your junction, which can put him out of position to cover this city. You and he will communicate with each other by telegraph or otherwise, as frequently as may be necessary for sufficient co-operation. When Gen. McDowell is in position on your right, his supplies must be drawn from West Point, and you will instruct your staff-officers to be prepared to supply him by that route.

The President desires that Gen. McDowell retain the command of the Department of the Rappahannock, and of the forces with which he moves forward.

By order of the President,

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

From Washington, May 18, 2 P.M.

It will be observed, this order rendered it impossible for me to use the James River as a line of operations, and forced me to establish our depots on the Pamunkey, and to approach Richmond from the north.

I had advised, and preferred, that reinforcements should be sent by water, for the reasons that their arrival would be more safe and certain, and that I would be left free to rest the army on the James River, whenever the navigation of that stream should be opened. The land movement obliged me to expose my right in order to secure the junction, and as the order for Gen. McDowell's march was soon countermanded, I incurred great risk, of which the enemy finally took advantage, and frustrated the plan of campaign. Had Gen. McDowell joined me by water, I could have approached Richmond by the James, and thus avoided the delays and losses incurred in bridging the Chickahominy and would have had the army massed in a body instead of being necessarily divided by that stream.

War Dep't., Wash'n., D.C., May 17, 1862.

To Gen. McDowell,

Com'g. Dep't. of Rappahannock,—

General :—Upon being joined by General Shield's division, you will move upon Richmond by the general route of the Richmond and Fredericksburg Railroad, co-operating with the force under Gen. McClellan, now threatening Richmond from the line of the Pamunkey and York Rivers.

While seeking to establish, as soon as possible a communication between your left wing, and the right wing of Gen. McClellan, you will hold yourself always in such a position, as to cover the capital of the nation against a sudden dash of the rebel forces.

Gen. McClellan will be furnished with a copy of these instructions, and will be directed to hold himself in readiness, to establish communication with your left wing, and to prevent the main body of the enemy's army from leaving Richmond, and throwing itself upon your column before the junction of the two armies is effected.

A copy of his instructions in regard to the employment of your force is annexed.

By order of the President,

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Having some doubts from the wording of the foregoing orders, as to the extent of my authority over the troops of Gen. McDowell, and as to the time when I might anticipate his arrival, on the 21st of May I sent this despatch :

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Camp near Tunstall's Station, Va. May 21, 1862, 11 P.M.

His Excellency Abraham Lincoln,

President of the United States,—

Your dispatch of yesterday respecting our situation and the batteries at Fort Darling, was received while I was absent with advance, where I have been all this day. I have communicated personally with Capt. Goldsborough, and by letter with Capt. Smith. The vessels can do nothing without co-operation on land, which I will not be in a condition to afford, for several days. Circumstances must determine the propriety of and attack.

It rained again last night, and rain on this soil soon makes the roads incredibly bad for army transportation. I personally crossed the Chickahominy to-day, at Bottom's Bridge Ford, and went a mile beyond, the enemy being about half a mile in front. I have three regiments on the other bank, guarding the rebuilding of the bridge. Keyes's corps is on the New Kent Road near Bottom's Bridge. Heintzelman is on the same road, within supporting distance. Sumner is on the railroad, connecting right with left. Stoneman, with advanced guard, is within one resolutions of the Virginia legislature, the zens, and all other sources of information ac-ible to me, give positive assurance that our roach to Richmond involves a desperate le between the opposing armies.

regret the state of things as to Gen. McDowthat effort would do more to protect Wash-on than his whole force can possibly do any-am not sure that I fully comprehend your rs of the 17th inst., addressed to myself and McDowell. If a junction is effected before ccupy Richmond, it must necessarily be east e railroad to Fredericksburg, and within my artment. This fact, my superior rank, and express language of the 62d article of war, place his command under my orders, unless otherwise specially directed by your Excel-y, and I consider that he will be under my mand, except that I am not to detach any portion of his forces, or give any orders which can put him out of position to cover Washington. If I err in my construction I desire to be at once set right. Frankness compels me to say—anxious as I am for an increase of force—that the march of McDowell's force upon Richmond, by the shortest route, will, in my opinion, uncover Washington, as to any interposition by it, as completely as its movement by water. The enemy cannot advance by Fredericksburg on Washington.

Should they attempt a movement, which to me seems utterly improbable, their route would be by Gordonsville and Manassas. I desire that the extent of my authority over McDowell may be clearly defined, lest misunderstandings and conflicting views may produce some of those injurious results which a divided command has so often caused. I would respectfully suggest that this danger can only be surely guarded against by explicitly placing Gen. McDowell under my orders in the ordinary way, and holding me strictly responsible for the closest observance of your instructions. I hope, Mr. President, that it is not necessary for me to assure you that your instructions would be observed in the utmost good faith, and that I have no personal feelings which could influence me to disregard them in any particular.

I believe that there is a great struggle before this army, but I am neither dismayed nor discouraged. I wish to strengthen its force as much as I can, but in any event I shall fight it with all the skill, caution and determiuation that I possess, and I trust that the result may either obtain for me the permanent confidence of my government, or that it may close my career.

GEO. B. MCCLELLAN, Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

On the 24th I received the following reply:

May 24, 1862. From Washington. 24th.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McClellan,—I left Gen. McDowell's camp at dark last evening. Shields' command is there, but is so worn that he cannot move before Monday morning, the 26th. We have so thinned our line to get troops for other places, that it was broken yesterday at Front Royal, with a probable loss to us of one regiment infantry, two companies cavalry, putting General Banks in some peril.

The enemy's forces under Gen. Anderson, now opposing Gen. McDowell's advance, have as their line of supply and retreat the road to Richmond.

If, in conjunction with McDowell's movements against Anderson, you could send a force from your right to cut off the enemy's supplies from Richmond, preserve the railroad bridges across the two forks of the Pomunkey, and intercept the enemy's retreat, you will prevent the army now opposed to you from receiving an accession of numbers of nearly 15,000 men, and if you succeed in saving the bridges, you will secure a line of roalroad for supplies in addition to the one you now have. Can you not do this almost as well as not, while you are building the Chickahominy bridges? McDowell and Shields both say they can, and positively will, move Monday morning. I wish you to march cautiously and safely.

You will have command of McDowell after he joins you, precisely as your indicated in your long dispatch to us of the 21st.

A. LINCOLN, President.

This information that McDowell's corps would march for Fredericksburg on the following Monday (the 26th), and that he would be under my command, as indicated in my telegram of the 21st, was cheering news, and I now felt confident that he would, on his arrival, be sufficiently strong to overpower the large army confronting us.

At an hour later on the same day I received the following:

May 24, 1862. From Washington, 4 p.m., '62.
Maj.-Gen. G. B. McClellan,—

In consequence of Gen. Banks' critical position, I have been compelled to suspend Gen. McDowell's movements to join you. The enemy are making a desperate push upon Harper's Ferry, and we are trying to throw Gen. Fremont's force and part of Gen. McDowell's in their rear. A. LINCOLN, President.

From which it will be seen that I could not expect Gen. McDowell to join me in time to participate in immediate operations in front of Richmond, and on the same evening I replied to the President that I would make my calculations accordingly.

It then only remained for me to make the best use of the forces at my disposal, and to avail myself, of all artificial auxiliaries, to compensate as much as possible for the inadequacy of men. I concurred fully with the President in the injunction contained in his telegram of the 24th, that it was necessary with my limited force to move "cautiously and safely." In view of the peculiar character of the Chickahominy and the liability of the bottom-lands to sudden inundation, it became necessary to construct between Bottom's Bridge and Mechanicsville eleven new bridges, all long and difficult, with extensive log-way approaches.

The entire army could probably have been thrown across the Chickahominy immediately after our arrival, but this would have left no force on the left bank to guard our communications, or to protect our right and rear. If the communication with our supply depot had been cut by the enemy, with our army concentrated on the right bank of the Chickahominy, and the stage of water as it was for many days after our arrival, the bridges carried away, and our means of transportation not furnishing a single day's supplies in advance, the troops must have gone without rations, and the animals without forage; the army would have been paralyzed.

It is true, I might have abandoned my communications and pushed forward to Richmond, trusting to the speedy defeat of the enemy and the consequent fall of the city, for a renewal of supplies; but the approaches were fortified, and the town itself was surrounded with a strong line of intrenchments requiring a greater length of time to reduce than our troops could have dispensed with rations.

Under these circumstances, I decided to retain a portion of the army on the left bank of the river until our bridges were completed.

It will be remembered that the order for co-operation of Gen. McDowell was simply pended, not revoked, and therefore I was n liberty to abandon the northern approach.

A very dashing and successful reconnoiss was made near New Bridge on the 24th of by Lieut. Bowen, Topographical Engineers corted by the 4th Michigan Volunteers a squadron of the 2d U. S. Cavalry, comma respectively by Col, Woodbury and Capt. don.

Our troops encountered a Louisiana regim and, with little loss, drove it back upon brigade, killing a large number and captu several prisoners. Great credit is due to staff officers, as well as to Col. Woodbury, Gordon, and their commands, for their con on this occasion.

The work upon the bridges was commence once, and pushed forward with great vigor; the rains which from day today continue fall, flooded the valley, and raised the water greater height than had been known for tw years. This demolished a great amount of labor; and our first bridges with their approa which were not made with reference to extreme high water, were carried off or rend impassable. We were obliged, with imm labor, to construct others much longer, elevated, and stable. Our men worked in water, exposed to the enemy's fire from the posite bank.

On the 25th May I received the following gram.

Washington, May 23, 18

Maj.-Gen. McClellan,—

Your dispatch received. General Banks at Strasburg with about 6,000 men—Shi having been taken from him to swell a col for McDowell to aid you at Richmond, and rest of his force scattered at various places, the 23d a rebel force of seven to ten thous fell upon one regiment and two companies gu ing the bridges at Front Royal, destroyi entirely—crossed the Shenandoah, and on 24th, yesterday, pushed on to get north of B to Winchester. Gen. Banks ran a race them, beating them into Winchester yester evening. This morning a battle ensued betw the two forces, in which Gen. Banks was be back in full retreat towards Martinsburg, probably is broken up into a total rout. G on the Manassas Gap railroad, just now rep that Jackson is now near Front Royal with 10 following up and supporting, as I underst the force now pursuing Banks. Also that other force of 10,000 is near Orleans, follow on in the same direction. Stripped bare as are here, I will do all that we can do to prev them crossing the Potomac at Harper's Ferr above. McDowell has about 20,000 of his fo moving back to the vicinity of Front Royal, Fremont, who was at Franklin, is moving to P risonburg, both these movements intended to in the enemy's rear.

One more of McDowell's brigades is orde through here to Harper's Ferry; the rest of forces remain for the present at Fredericksb

A. Lincoln, President.

On the same day I sent the following:

Coal Harbor, May 26, 1862

Have cut the Virginia Central road in three places between Hanover C. H. and the Chickahominy. Will try to cut the other. I do not think Richmond intrenchments formidable, but am not certain. Hope very soon to be within shelling distance. Have railroad in operation from White House to Chickahominy. Hope to have Chickahominy bridge repaired to-night. Nothing of interest to-day.

Geo. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen. Com'g.

His Excellency A. Lincoln, President.

The interruption of the railroad here referred to was effected by the command of Brig.-Gen. Stoneman, and was intended to prevent the enemy from drawing supplies by that route, or from sending reinforcements to Anderson or Jackson.

At 10 A. M. I also sent the following dispatch:

"Telegrams of last night received. I am glad to know affairs are not so bad as might have been. I would earnestly call your attention to my instructions to Gen. Banks, of March 16th, to Gen. Wadsworth of same date, and to my letter of April 1st to the adjutant-general. I cannot but think that a prompt return to the principles there laid down would relieve all probability of danger. I will forward copies by mail. I beg to urge the importance of Manassas and Front Royal in contradistinction to Fredericksburg.

Geo. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen.

His Excellency, A. Lincoln, President.

Late on the 20th I sent the following:

Camp near New Bridge,
May 26, 1862, 7.30 P. M.

Have arranged to carry out your last orders. We are quietly closing in upon the enemy preparatory to the last struggle. Situated as I am I feel forced to take every possible precaution against disaster, and to secure my flanks against the probably superior force in front of me. My arrangements for to-morrow are very important, and if successful, will leave me free to strike on the return of the force detached.

His Excellency, A. Lincoln, President.

BATTLE OF HANOVER COURT HOUSE.

On the same day I received intelligence that a very considerable force of the enemy was in the vicinity of Hanover Court House, to the right and rear of our army, thus threatening our communications, and in a position either to reinforce Jackson, or to impede McDowell's junction, should he finally move to unite with us.

On the same day I also received information from Gen. McDowell, through the Secretary of War, that the enemy had fallen back from Fredericksburg towards Richmond, and that Gen. McDowell's advance was eight miles south of the Rappahannock. It was thus imperative to dislodge or defeat this force, independently even of the wishes of the President, as expressed in his telegram of the 26th. I intrusted this task to Brig.-Gen. Fitz John Porter, commanding the 5th corps, with orders to move at daybreak on the 27th.

Through a heavy rain and over bad roads, that officer moved his command as follows:

Brig.-Gen. W. H. Emory led the advance with the 5th and 6th regiments U. S. cavalry and Benson's horse battery of the 2d U. S. artillery taking the road from New Bridge via Mechanicsville to Hanover Court House.

Gen. Morell's division, composed of the brigades of Martindale, Butterfield, and McQuade, with Berdan's regiment of sharpshooters, and three batteries under Capt. Charles Griffin, 5th U. S. Artillery, followed on the same road.

Col. G. K. Warren, commanding a provisional brigade composed of the 5th and 13th New York, the 1st Connecticut Artillery acting as infantry; the 5th Pennsylvania Cavalry and Weeden's Rhode Island battery moved from his station at Old Church, by a road running to Hanover Court House, parallel to the Pamunkey. After a fatiguing march of fourteen miles through the mud and rain, Gen. Emory at noon reached a point about two miles from Hanover Court House where the road forks to Ashland, and found a portion of the enemy formed in line across the Hanover Court House road.

Gen. Emory had before this been joined by the 25th New York (of Martindale's brigade) and Berdan's sharpshooters; these regiments were deployed with a section of Benson's battery, and advanced slowly towards the enemy until reinforced by Gen. Butterfield with four regiments of his brigade, when the enemy was charged and quickly routed, one of his guns being captured by the 17th New York under Col. Lansing, after having been disabled by the fire of Benson's battery. The firing here lasted about an hour. The cavalry and Benson's battery were immediately ordered in pursuit, followed by Morell's infantry, and artillery, with the exception of Martindale's brigade. Warren's brigade having been delayed by repairing bridges &c. now arrived too late to participate in this affair; a portion of this command was sent to the Pamunkey to destroy bridges and captured quite a number of prisoners; the remainder followed Morell's division. In the meantime, Gen. Martindale, with the few remaining regiments of his brigade, and a section of artillery advanced on the Ashland road, and found a force of the enemy's infantry, cavalry, and artillery in position near Peake's Station on the Virginia Central Railroad: he soon forced them to retire towards Ashland.

The 25th New York having been ordered to rejoin him, Gen. Martindale was directed to form his brigade and move up the railroad to rejoin the rest of the command at Hanover Court House.

He sent one regiment up the railroad, but remained with the 2d Maine, afterwards joined by the 25th New York, to guard the rear of the main column.

The enemy soon returned to attack Gen. Martindale, who at once formed the 2d Maine, 25th New York and a portion of of the 44th New Jersey, with one section of Martin's battery, on the New Baidge Road, facing his own position of the morning, and then held his ground for an hour against large odds until reinforced.

General Porter was at Hanover Court House, near the head of his column, when he learned that the rear had been attacked by a large f He at once faced the whole column abou called the cavalry sent in pursuit towards land, moved the 13th ond 14th New York Griffin's battery direct to Martindale's assist pushed the 9th Massachusetts, and 52d Pen vania of McQuade's brigade through the w on the right (our original left) and attacked flank of the enemy, while Butterfield with 83d Pennsylvania, and 16th Michigan, hast towards the scene of action by the railroad through the woods further to the right, and pleted the rout of the enemy. During th mainder of this and the following day our cav was active in the pursuit, taking a numbe prisoners. Captain Harrison of the U. Our loss amounted to 53 killed, 344 woun and missing.

The force encountered and defeated was Branch's division of North Caroliua and Geo troops, supposed to have been some 9,000 str Their camp at Hanover Court House was ta and destroyed.

Having reason to believe that Gen. Ande with a strong force, was still at Ashland, I dered Gen. Syke's division of regulars to m on the 28th, from New Bridge to Hanover Co House, and remained there until the evening the 20th, when they reterned to their orig camp.

On the 28th, Gen. Stoneman's command cavalry, horse artillery, and two regiments of fantry, were also placed under General Port orders.

On the same day I visited Hanover Court Hou whence I sent the following dispatch.

Hanover Court House, May 28. 2 P. M.

Porter's action oi yesterday was truly a gl ous victory—too much credit cannot be given his magnificent division and its accomplish leader. The rout of the rebels was complete, a defeat but a complete rout. Prisoners are c stantly coming in, two companies have this m ment arrived, with excellent arms.

There is no doubt that the enemy are conc trating everything on Richmond. I will do best to cut off Jackson, but am doubtful wheth I can.

It is the policy and duty of the governme to send me by water all the well drilled troo available. I am confident that Washington is no danger. Engines and cars in large numbe have been sent up to bring down Jaokson's co mand.

I may not be able to cut them off, but will tr we have cut all but the F. & R. R. R. The r

Washington, May 28, 1862.

or-General McClellan,— am very glad of Gen. F. J. Porter's victory; if it was a total rout of the enemy, I am zled to know why the Richmond and Fred- ksburg Railroad was not seized again, as you you have all the railroads but the Richmond Fredericksburg. I am puzzled to see how, lacking that, you can have any, except the scrap from Richmond to West Point; the scrap of the Virginia Central, from Richmond to Hanover without more, is simply nothing. That the whole of the enemy is concentrating on Richmond, I think cannot be certainly known to you or me. Saxton, at Harper's Perry, informs us that a large force, supposed to be Jackson's and McEwell's, forced his advance from Charlestown to-day. Gen. King telegraphed us from Fredericksburg, that contrabands give certain information, that fifteen thousand left Hanover Junction Monday morning to reinforce Jackson. I am painfully impressed with the importance of the struggle before you, and shall aid you all I can consistently with my view of due regard to all points.

A. Lincoln.

At 6 P.M. of the 29th, I sent the Secretary of War the following dispatch.

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
May 29, 1862, 6 P.M.

Gen. Porter has gained information, that Gen. Anderson left his position in the vicinity of Fredericksburg, at 4 A.M., Sunday, with the following troops:—1st S. C., Col. Hamilton, 1 battalion S. C. Rifles, 34th and 38th N. C., 45th Georgia, 12th, 13th and 14th S. C., 3d Louisiana, 2 batteries of 4 guns each, namely, Letcher's Va., and McIntosh's S. C. batteries. General Anderson and his command, passed Ashland yesterday evening, en route for Richmond, leaving men behind to destroy bridges over the telegraph road, which they traveled. This information is reliable. It is also positively certain, that Branch's command was from Gordonsville, bound for Richmond, whither they have now gone.

It may be regarded as positive, I think, that there is no rebel force between Fredericksburg and Junction.

G. B. McClellan, Major-Gen.

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

The following was also sent on the same day:

Headquarters. Army of the Potomac,
May 29, 1862.

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War,

A detachment from Gen. F. J. Porter's command, under Major Williams, 6th Cavalry, destroyed the South Anna railroad bridge, at about 9 A.M. to-day. A large quantity of confederate public property was also destroyed at Ashland this morning. R. B. Marcy, Chief-of-Staff.

In reply to which the following was received:

Washington, May 29, 1862.

Gen. R. B. Marcy:

Your dispatch, as to South Anna and Ashland being seized by our forces this morning, is received. Understanding these points to be on the Richmond and Fredericksburg Railroad, I heartily congratulate the country, and thank Gen. McClellan and his army for the seizure.

A. Lincoln.

On the 30th I sent the following:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
May 30, 1862.

From tone of your dispatches and President's, I do not think that you at all appreciate the value and magnitude of Porter's victory. It has entirely relieved my right flank, which was seriously threatened, routed and demoralized a considerable portion of the rebel forces, taken over seven hundred and fifty prisoners, killed and wounded large numbers; one gun, many small arms, and much baggage taken. It was one of the handsomest things in the war, both in itself and its results. Porter has returned, and my army is again well in hand. Another day will make the probable field of battle passable for artillery. It is quite certain that there is nothing in front of McDowell—(Fredericksburg). I regard the burning of South Anna bridges as the least important result of Porter's movements.

G. B. McClellan, Major-Gen.

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

The results of the brilliant operation of Gen. Porter were the dispersal of Gen. Branch's division, and the clearing of our right flank and rear. It was rendered impossible for the enemy to communicate by rail with Fredericksburg, or with Jackson via Gordonsville, except by the very circuitous route of Lynchburg, and the road was left entirely open for the advance of McDowell, had he been permitted to join the army of the Potomac.

His withdrawal towards Front Royal was, in my judgment, a serious and fatal error; he could do no good in that direction; while, had he been permitted to carry out the orders of May 17, the united forces would have driven the enemy within the immediate intrenchments of Richmond before Jackson could have returned to its succor, and probably would have gained possession of that place. I respectfully refer to the reports of General Porter and his subordinate commanders, for the names of the officers who deserve especial mention for the parts they took in these affairs. But I cannot omit here my testimony to the energy and ability displayed by Gen. Porter on this occasion, since to him is mainly due the successes there gained.

OPERATIONS BEFORE RICHMOND.

On the 20th of May a reconnoissance was ordered on the south side of the Chickahominy, towards James River. This was accomplished by Brig.-Gen. H. M. Naglee, who crossed his brigade near Bottom's Bridge, and pushed forward to within two miles of James River, without serious resistance, or finding the enemy in force.

The rest of the 4th Corps, commanded by Gen. E. D. Keyes, crossed the Chickahominy on the 23d of May.

On the 24th, 25th and 26th, a very gallant reconnoissance was pushed by Gen. Naglee, with his brigade, beyond the Seven Pines, and on the 25th the 4th Corps was ordered to take up and fortify a position in the vicinity of the Seven Pines. The order was at once obeyed; a strong line of rifle-pits opened, and an abattis constructed a little in the rear of the point where the Nine Mile road comes into the Williamsburgh road.

On the same day General Heintzelman was ordered to cross with his corps (the 3d), and take a position two miles in advance of Bottom's Bridge, watching the crossings of White Oak Swamp, and covering the left and the rear of the left wing of the army. Being the senior officer on that side the river, he was placed in command of both corps, and ordered to hold the Seven Pines at all hazards, but not to withdraw the troops from the crossings of White Oak Swamp unless in an emergency.

On the 28th Gen. Keyes was ordered to advance Casey's division to "Fair Oaks" on the Williamsburg road, some three-quarters of a mile in front of the Seven Pines, leaving Couch's division at the line of rifle-pits. A line of rifle-pits and a small redoubt for six guns were commenced, and considerable of the timber in front of the line was felled on the days following. The picket line was established reaching from the Chickahominy to White Oak Swamp.

On the 30th Gen. Heintzelman, represented that the advance had met with sharp opposition in taking up their position, and that he considered the point a critical one, requested and obtained authority to make such disposition of the troops as he saw fit to meet the emergency. He immediately advanced two brigades of Kearney's division about three-fourths of a mile in front of Savage's Station, thus placing them within supporting distance of Casey's division, which was the advance of the 4th Corps.

BATTLE OF FAIR OAKS.

On the 30th the troops on the south side of the Chickahominy were in position as follows:

Casey's division on the right of the Williamsburg road, at right angles to it, the centre at Fair Oaks; Couch's division at Seven Pines; Kearney's division on the railroad, from Savage's Station towards the bridge; Hooker's division on the borders of White Oak Swamp. Constant skirmishing had been kept up between our pickets and those of the enemy, while the lines were being taken up and strengthened. Large bodies of Confederate troops were moved immediately to the front and right of Casey's position.

During the day and night of the 30th of May a very violent storm occurred. The rain, falling in torrents, rendered work on the rifle-pits and bridges impracticable, made the roads almost impassable, and threatened the destruction of the bridges over the Chickahominy.

The enemy, perceiving the unfavorable position in which we were placed, and the possibility of destroying that part of our army which was apparently cut off from the main body by the rapidly rising stream, threw an overwhelming force (grand divisions of Gens. D. H. Hill, Huger, Longstreet and G. W. Smith) upon the position occupied by Casey's division.

It appears, from the official reports of Gen. Keyes and his subordinate commanders, that at 10 o'clock A. M., on the 31st of May, an aide-de-camp of Gen. J. E. Johnston was captured by Gen. Naglee's pickets. But little information as to the movements of the enemy was obtained from him, but his presence so near our lines excited suspicion and caused increased vigilance, and the troops were ordered by Gen. Keyes to be under arms at 11 o'clock.

Between 11 and 12 it was reported to Gen. Casey that the enemy were approaching in considerable force on the Williamsburg road. At this en. Couch's division, holding the second line, Gen. Abercrombie's brigade on the right, g the Nine Mile road, with two regiments and battery across the railroad, near Fair Oaks ion; Gen. Peck's brigade on the right, and . Devin's in the centre.

Casey's division was disposed of as follows : aglee's brigade, extending from the Williams- road to the Garnett field, having one regi- t across the railroad. Gen. Wessels's brig- in the rifle-pits, and Gen. Palmer's in the rear Gen. Wessels; one battery of artillery in ad- e, with Gen. Naglee, one battery in rear of -pits, to the riget of the redoubt; one battery ear of the redoubt, and another battery un- essed in the redoubt.

n the approach of the enemy. Gen. Casey sent ard one of Gen. Palmer's regiments to sup- the picket line ; but this regiment gave way, out making much, if any, resistance.

eavy firing at once commenced, and the pick- were driven in. Gen. Keyes ordered Gen. ch to move Gen. Peck's brigade to occupy the nd on the left of the Williamsburg road, ch had not before been occupied by our es, and thus to support Gen. Casey's left, re the first attack was the most severe.

enemy now came on in heavy force, attack- Gen. Casey simultaneously in front and on flanks.

en. Keyes sent to Gen. Heintzelman for rein- ements, but the messenger was delayed, so orders were not sent to Gens. Kearney and ker until near 3 o'clock, and it was nearly 5 . when Gen. Jamison's and Barry's brigades, Gen. Kearney's division, arrived on the field. . Birney was ordered up the railroad, but, by . Kearney's order, halted his brigade before ving at the scene of action. Orders were also patched for Gen. Hooker to move up from ite Oak Swamp, and he arrived after dark at age's Station.

s soon as the firing was heard at headquar- , orders were sent to Gen. Sumner to get his mand under arma, and be ready to move at a ment's warning. His corps, consisting of Gens. hardson's and Sedgwick's divisions, was en- ped on the north side of the Chickahominy, e six miles above Bottom's Bridge. Each di- on had thrown a bridge over the stream oppo- to its own position.

t 1 o'clock Gen. Sumner moved the two divi- s to their respective bridges, with instruc- s to halt and await further orders.

t 2 o'clock orders were sent from headquar- s to cross these divisions without delay, and h them rapidly to Gen. Heintzelman's sup- t. This order was received and communicat- at half-past two, and the passage was immedi- ly commenced.

n the meantime Gen. Naglee's brigade, with batteries of Gen. Casey's division, which Gen. glee directed, strnggled gallantly to maintain redoubt and rifle-pits against the overwhelm- masses of the enemy. They were reinforced a regiment from Gen. Peck's brigade.

The artillery under the command of Col. G. D. iley, 1st New York Artillery, and afterwards under Gen. Naglee, did good execution on the advancing columns. The left of this position was, however, soon turned, and a sharp cross-fire opened upon the gunners and the men in the rifle-pits. Col. Bailey, Maj. Van Valkenburg, and Adj't Ramsey, of the same regiment, were killed. Some of the guns in the redoubt were taken, and the whole line was driven back upon the position occupied by Gen. Couch. The brigades of Gens. Wessels and Palmer, with the reinforcements which had been sent them from Gen. Couch, had also beeu driven from the field with heavy loss, and the whole position occupied by Gen. Casey's division was taken by the enemy.

Previous to this time, Gen. Keyes ordered Gen. Couch to advance two regiments to relieve the pressure upon Gen. Casey's right flank. In making this movement Gen. Couch discovered large masses of the enemy pushing towards our right and crossing the railroad, as well as a heavy column which had been held in reserve, and which was now making its way towards Fair Oaks Station. Gen. Couch at once engaged this column with these two regiments. but, though reinforced by two additional regiments, he was overpowered, and the enemy pushed between him and the main body of his division. With these four regiments and one battery Gen. Couch fell back about half a mile towards the Grape-Vine Bridge, where, hearing that Gen. Sumner had crossed. he formed line of battle facing Fair Oaks Station, and prepared to hold the position.

Gens. Berry's and Jamison's brigades had by this time arrived in front of the Seven Pines. Gen. Berry was ordered to take possession of the woods on the left, and push forward so as to have a flank fire on the enemy's lines. This movement was executed brilliantly ; Gen. Berry pusning his regiment forward through the woods, until their rifles commanded the left of the camp and works occupied by Gen. Casey's division in the morning. Their fire on the pursuing columns of the enemy was very destructive, and assisted materially in checking the pursuit in that part of the field. He held his position in these woods against several attacks of superior numbers, and after dark, being cut off by the enemy from the main body, he fell back towards White Oak Swamp, and, by a circuit, brought his men into our lines in good order.

Gen. Jamison, with two regiments—the other two of his brigade having been detached, one to Gen. Peck and one to Gen. Birney—moved rapidly to the front on the left of the Williamsburg road, and succeeded for a time in keeping the abattis clear of the enemy. but large numbers of the enemy pressing past the right of his line, he too was forced to retreat through the woods towards White Oak Swamp, and in that way gained camp under cover of night.

Brig.-Gen. Devins, who had held the centre of Gen. Couch's division, had made repeated and gallant efforts to regain portions of the ground lost in front, hut each time was driven back, and finally withdrew behind the rifle pits near Seven Pines.

Meantime, Gen. Sumner had arrived with the advance of his corps, Gen. Sedgwick's division, at the point held by Gen. Couch with four regiments and one battery. The roads leading from the bridge, were so miry, that it was only by the greatest exertion, Gen. Sedgwick had been able to get one of his batteries to the front.

The leading regiment (1st Minnesota, Col. Sully) was immediately deployed to the right of Couch to protect the flank, and the rest of the division formed in line of battle. Kirby's battery near the centre in an angle of the woods. One of Gen. Couch's regiments was sent to open communicatson with Gen. Heintzelman. No sooner were these dispositions made, than the enemy came in strong force, and opened a heavy fire along the line. He made several charges, but was repulsed with great loss, by the steady fire of the infantry, and the splendid practice of the battery. After sustaining the enemy's fire for a considerable time, Gen Sumner ordered five regiments (the 34th New York, Col. Smith, 82d New York, Lieut.-Col. Hudson, 15th Mass., Lieut.-Col. Kimball, 20th Mass., Col. Lee, 7th Michigan, Maj. Richardson, the three former, of Gen. Gorman's brigade, the two latter, of Gen. Dana's brigade) to advance and charge with bayonet. This charge was executed in the most brilliant manner. Our troops, springing over two fences which were between them and the enemy, rushed upon his lines and drove him in confusion from that part of the field. Darkness now ended the battle for that day.

During the night, dispositions were made for its early renewal. Gen. Couch's division, and so much of Gen. Casey's as could be collected together, with Gen. Kearney's, occupied the rifle-pits near Seven Pines. Gen. Peck in falling back on the left, had succeeded, late in the afternoon, in rallying a considerable number of stragglers, and was taking them once more into the action, when he was ordered back into the intrenched camp by Gen. Kearney. Gen. Hooker brought up his division about dark, having been delayed by the heaviness of the roads, and the throng of fugitives from the field, through whom, the Colonel of the leading regiment (Starr) reports, he "was obliged to force his way with the bayonet." This division bivouacked for the night, in rear of the right of the rifle-pits, on the other side of the railroad. Gen. Richardson's division also came upon the field about sunset. He had attempted the passage of the Chickahominy by the bridge opposite his own camp, but it was so far destroyed, that he was forced to move Gen. Howard's and Meagher's brigades, with all his artillery, around by Gen. Sedgwick's bridge, while Gen. French's brigade, with the utmost difficulty, crossed by the other. Gen. Sedgwick's division, with the regiments under Gen. Couch, held about the same position as when the fight ceased; and Gen. Richardson, on his arrival, was ordered to place his division on the left, to connect with Gen. Kearney. Gen. French's brigade was posted along the railroad, and Gens. Howard's and Meagher's brigades, in second and third lines. All his artillery had been left behind, it being impossible to move it forward through the deep mud, as rapidly as the infantry pushed toward the field, but during the night, the three batteries of the division were brought to the front.

About five o'clock in the morning of the 1st June, skirmishers, and some cavalry of the enemy, were discovered in front of Gen. Richardson's division. Capt. Pettit's battery (B, 1st U. S. A.) having come upon the ground, threw a few shells among them, when they dispersed. There was a wide interval between Gen. Richardson and Gen. Kearney. To close this, Gen. Richardson's line was extended to the left, and his first line moved over the railroad. Scarcely had this gained this position, when the enemy appeared in large force, from the woods in front, opened a heavy fire of musketry at short range, along the whole line. He approached very rapidly with columns of attack, formed on two roads which crossed the railroad. These columns were supported by infantry in line of battle on each side, cutting Gen. French's line. He threw out skirmishers, but appeared determined to carry all before him by one crushing blow. For nearly an hour the first line of Gen. Richardson's division, stood and returned the fire, the lines of the enemy being reinforced and relieved, time after time, until finally Gen. Howard was ordered, with his brigade, to go to Gen. French's assistance. He led his men gallantly to the front, and in a few minutes the fire of the enemy ceased, and the whole line fell back on that part of the field.

On the opening of the firing in the morning, Gen. Hooker pushed forward on the railroad with two regiments (5th and 6th New Jersey) followed by Gen. Sickles' brigade. It was found impossible to move the artillery of this division from its position, on account of the mud. On coming near the woods, which were held by the enemy in force, Gen. Hooker found Gen. Birney's brigade, Col. J. Hobart Ward in command, in line of battle. He sent back to hasten Gen. Sickles' brigade, but ascertained that it had been turned off to the left by Gen. Heintzelman to meet a column advancing in that direction. He at once made the attack with the two New Jersey regiments, calling upon Col. Ward to support him with Gen. Birney's brigade. This was well done, our troops advancing into the woods under a heavy fire, and pushing the enemy before them for more than an hour of hard fighting. A charge with the bayonet was then ordered by Gen. Hooker, with the 5th and 6th New Jersey, 3d Maine and 38th and 40th New York, and the enemy fled in confusion, throwing down arms and even clothing in his flight. Gen. Sickles having been ordered to the right, formed line of battle on both sides of the Williamsburg road, and advanced under a sharp fire from the enemy deployed in the woods in front of him. After a brisk interchange of musketry fire while crossing the open ground, the Excelsior brigade dashed into the timber with the bayonet and put the enemy to flight.

On the right the enemy opened fire after half an hour's cessation, which was promptly responded to by Gen. Richardson's division. Again the most vigorous efforts were made to break our line, and again they were frustrated by the steadiness courage of our troops. In about an hour Gen. Richardson's whole line advanced, pouring in their fire at close range, which threw the line of enemy back in some confusion. This was wed up by a bayonet charge, led by Gen. ich in person, with the 57th and 66th New k, supported by two regiments sent by Gen. ntzelman, the 71st and 73d New York, which ed the confusion of the enemy into precipi- flight. One gun captured the previous day retaken.

ur troops pushed forward as far as the lines by them on the 31st, before the attack. On battle field there were found many of our and the Confederate wounded, arms, cais-, wagons, subsistence stores, and forage, ndoned by the enemy in his rout. The state ne roads, and the impossibility of his manœu- g artillery, prevented further pursuit.

n the next morning a reconnoissance was forward, which pressed back the pickets of enemy to within five miles of Richmond, but n the impossibility of forcing even a few eries forward, precluded our holding perma- ly this position. The lines held previous to battle were therefore resumed.

revious to the arrival of Gen. Sumner upon field of battle on the 31st of May, Gen. Heint- nan, the senior corps commander present, was ne immediate command of the forces engaged. first information I received that the battle in progress, was a dispatch from him ing that Casey's division had given way. ing the night of the 31st I received a dis- ch from him dated 8.45 P.M., in which he s: "I am just in—when I got to the front, the t of Gen. Casey's division had dispersed." *

* "The rout of Gen. Casey's men had a t dispiriting effect on the troops as they e up. I saw no reason why we should have n driven back."

his official statement, together with other ounts, received previous to my arrival upon battle-field, to the effect that Casey's division given way without making a proper resist- e, caused me to state in a telegram to the retary of War on the 1st, that this division ave way unaccountably and discreditably." bsequent investigations, however, greatly mo- ed the impressions first received, and I accord- ly advised the Secretary of War of this in a patch on the 5th of June.

The official reports of Generals Keyes, Casey l Neglee, show that a very considerable por- n of this division fought well, and that brigade of Gen Naglee is entitled to credit its gallantry. This division, among the regi- nts of which were eight of comparatively new ops, was attacked by superior numbers; yet, according to the reports alluded to, it "stood the attack for three hours before it was reinforced." A portion of the division was thrown into great confusion by the first onslaught of the enemy, but the personal efforts of General Naglee, Colonel Bailey and others, who boldly went to the front and encouraged the men by their presence and example at this critical juncture, rallied a great part of the division, and thereby enabled it to act a prominent part in this severely contested battle. It therefore affords me great satisfaction to withdraw the expression contained in my first dispatch, and I cordially give my indorsement to the conclusion of the division commander, "that those parts of his command which behaved discreditably were exceptional cases."

On the 31st, when the battle of Fair Oaks commenced, we had two of our bridges nearly completed, but the rising waters floated the log-way approaches and made them almost impassable, so that it was only by the greatest efforts that Gen. Sumner crossed his corps and participated in that hard-fought engagement. The bridges became totally useless after this corps had passed, and others on a more permanent plan were commenced.

On my way to head-quarters, after the battle of Fair Oaks, I attempted to cross the bridge where Gen. Sumner had taken over his corps on the day previous. At the time Gen. Sumner crossed, this was the only available bridge above Bottom's Bridge. I found the approach from the right bank for some 400 yards submerged to the depth of several feet, and on reaching the place where the bridge had been, I found a great part of it carried away, so that I could not get my horse over, and was obliged to send him to Bottom's Bridge, six miles below, as the only practicable crossing.

The approaches to New and Mechanicsville bridges were also overflowed, and both of them were enfiladed by the enemy's batteries, established upon commanding heights on the opposite side. These batteries were supported by strong forces of the enemy, having numerous rifle-pits in their front, which would have made it necessary, even had the approaches been in the best possible condition, to have fought a sanguinary battle, with but little prospect of success, before a passage could have been secured

The only available means, therefore, of uniting our forces at Fair Oaks for an advance on Richmond soon after the battle, was to march the troops from Mechanicsville and other points on the left bank of the Chickahominy down to Bottom's Bridge, and thence over the Williamsburg road to the position near Fair Oaks, a distance of about twenty-three miles. In the condition of the roads at that time, this march could not have been made with artillery in less than two days, by which time the enemy would have been secure within his entrenchments around Richmond. In short, the idea of uniting the two wings of the army in time to make a vigorous pursuit of the enemy, with the prospect of overtaking him before he reached Richmond, only five miles distant from the field of battle, is simply absurd, and was, I presume, never for a moment seriously entertained by any one connected with the army of the Potomac. An advance involving the separation of the two wings by the impassable Chickahominy would have exposed each to defeat in detail. Therefore I held the position already gained, and completed our crossings as rapidly as possible.

In the meantime the troops at Fair Oaks were directed to strengthen their positions by a strong line of intrenchments, which protected them while the bridges were being built, gave security to the trains, liberated a large fighting force, and offered a safe retreat in the event of disaster.

On the second of June I sent the following dispatch :—

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
New Bridge, June 2d, 1862, 10.30 A.M.

Our left is everywhere advanced considerably beyond the positions it occupied before the battle.

I am in strong hopes that the Chickahominy will fall sufficiently to enable me to cross the right. We have had a terrible time with our communications; bridges and causeways built with great care, having been washed away with the freshet, leaving us almost cut off from communication. All that human labor can do is being done to accomplish our purpose.

Please regard the portion of this relating to condition of Chickahominy as confidential, as it would be serious if the enemy were aware of it. I do not yet know our loss; it has been very heavy on both sides, as the fighting was desperate; our victory complete. I expect still more fighting before we reach Richmond.

G. B. McCLELLAN, Major.-Gen.

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

On the same day I received the following from the Secretary of War :—

Washington, June 3, 1862.

Maj.-Gen, McC.—Your telegram has been received, and we are greatly rejoiced at your success, not only in itself, but because of the dauntless spirit of the troops. You have received, of course, the order made yesterday in respect to Fortress Monroe. The object was to place at your command the disposable force of that department. The indications are that Fremont or McDowell will fight Jackson to-day, and as soon as he is disposed of another large body of troops will be at your service. The intelligence from Halleck shows that the rebels are fleeing, and pursued in force from Corinth. All interest now centres in your operations, and full confidence is entertained of your brilliant and glorious success.

E. M. S., Sec. of War.

OPERATIONS BEFORE RICHMOND.

On the 3rd I received the following from the President :

Washington, June 3, 1862.

Maj.-Gen. McC. :—With these continuous rains, I am very anxious about the Chickahominy, so close in your rear and crossing your line of communication. Please look well to it.

A. L., President.

To which I replied as follows :—

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac. New Bridge, June 3d, 1862. Your dispatch of 5 p. m. just received. As the Chickahominy has been almost the only obstacle in my way for several days, your Excellency may be assured that it has been made, and will continue to be, to protect the communications across it. Nothing of importance, except that it is again raining.

G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Com'g.

A. L., President, Washington.

My views of the condition of our army on the 4th are explained in the following dispatch to the President :—

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, New Bridge, June 4th, 1862.—Terrible rain storm during the night and morning; not yet cleared. Chickahominy flooded; bridges in bad condition and still hard at work at them. I have taken every possible step to insure the security of the corps on the right bank, but I cannot reinforce them from here until my bridges are all safe, as my force is too small to insure my right and rear, should the enemy attack in that direction as they may probably attempt. I have to be very cautious now. Our loss in the late battle will probably exceed 5,000. I have not yet returns. On account of the effect it might have on our own men and the enemy, I request that you will regard this information as confidential for a few days. I am satisfied that the loss of the enemy was very considerably greater; they were terribly punished. I mention these facts now merely to show you that the army of the Potomac has had serious work, and that no child's play is before it.

You must make your calculations on the position that I have been correct from the beginning, in asserting that the serious opposition was to be made here.

Geo. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

A. L., President, Washington.

And in the following to the Secretary of War the same day :

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, New Bridge, June 4th, 1862.—Please inform me at once what reinforcements, if any, I can count upon having at Fortress Monroe or White House within the next three days, and when each regiment may be expected to arrive. It is of the utmost importance that I should know this immediately. The losses in the battle of the 31st ult. 1st will amount to 7,000. Regard this as confidential for the present.

If I can have five new regiments for Fort Monroe and its dependencies, I can draw three more old regiments from there safely. I can well dispose of four more raw regiments on my communications. I can well dispose of fifteen to twenty well-drilled regiments among the old brigades, in bringing them up to their original effective strength. Recruits are especially necessary for the regular and volunteer batteries of artillery, as well as for the regular and volunteer regiments of infantry. After the losses in our last battle, I trust that I will be no longer regarded as an alarmist. I believe we have at least one more desperate battle to fight.

GEO. B. McC. Maj.-Gen.

Hon. E. M. S., Sec. of War.

Also my dispatch to the Secretary of War of the 5th :

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, New

Bridge June 5, 1862.—Rained most of the night—as now ceased, but it is not clear. The river till very high and troublesome. Enemy opened with several batteries on our brigades near here this morning: our batteries seem to have pretty much silenced them, though some firing still kept up. The rain forces us to remain in statu quo. With great difficulty a division of infantry has been crossed this morning to support the troops on the other side should the enemy renew the attack. I felt obliged to do this, although it leaves us rather weak here.

G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

Hon. E. M. S. Sec. of War.

On the 5th the Secretary telegraphed me as follows:—

Washington, June 5, 1862, 8.30, p.m.

Maj.-Gen. McC.,—I will send you five new regiments as fast as transportation can take them: the first to start to-morrow from Baltimore. I intend sending you part of McDowell's force as soon as it can return from its trip to Front Royal, probably as many as you want. The order to ship the new regiments to Fort Monroe has already been given. I suppose that they may be sent directly to the Fort. Please advise me of this as you desire. E. M. S., Sec. of War.

On the 7th of June I telegraphed as follows:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
June, 7, 1862, 4 40 p.m.

Hon. E. M. S.,—In reply to your dispatch of 4 p.m., to-day, I have the honor to state that the Chickahominy River has risen so as to flood the entire bottom to the depth of three and four feet. I am pushing forward the bridges in spite of this, and the men are working night and day, up to their waists in water, to complete them.

The whole face of the country is a perfect bog, entirely impassable for artillery or even cavalry, except directly in the narrow roads, which renders any general movement either of this or the rebel army utterly out of the question, until we have more favorable weather.

I am glad to learn that you are pressing forward reinforcements so vigorously. I shall be in perfect readiness to move forward and take Richmond the moment McCall reaches here, and the ground will admit the passage of artillery. I have advanced my pickets about a mile to-day, driving off the rebel pickets, and securing a very advantageous position.

The rebels have several batteries established, commanding the debouches from two of our bridges, and fire upon our working parties continually, but as yet they have killed but very few of our men. G. B. McC., Maj.-General.

As I did not think it probable that any more reinforcements would be sent to me in time for the advance on Richmond, I stated in the foregoing dispatch that I should be ready to move when Gen. McCall's Division joined me; but I did not intend to be understood by this, that no more reinforcements were wanted, as will be seen from the following dispatch:

June 10, 1862, 3 30 P.M.—I have again information that Beauregard has arrived, and that some of his troops are to follow him. No great reinforcement, perhaps none whatever, can be attached to this; but it is possible, and ought to be their policy.

I am completely checked by the weather. The roads and fields are literally impassable for artillery, almost so for infantry. The Chickahominy is in a dreadful state; we have another rain storm on our hands.

I shall attack as soon as the weather and ground will permit; but there will be a delay, the extent of which no one can forsee, for the season is altogether abnormal.

In view of these circumstances, I present for your consideration the propriety of detaching largely from Halleck's army to strengthen this; for it would seem that Halleck has now no large organized force in front of him, while we have.

If this cannot be done, or even in connection with it, allow me to suggest the movement of a heavy column from Dalton upon Atlanta. If but the one can be done, it would better conform to military principles to strengthen this army; and even although the reinforcements might not arrive in season to take part in the attack upon Richmond, the moral effect would be great, and they would furnish valuable assistance in ulterior movements.

I wish to be distinctly understood that whenever the weather permits, I will attack with whatever force I may have, although a larger force would enable me to gain much more decisive results.

I would be glad to have McCall's infantry sent forward by water at once, without waiting for his artillery and cavalry.

If Gen. Prim returns via Washington, please converse with him as to the condition of affair here. G. B. McC., Major-Gen.

Hon. E. M. S., Sec.-of-War.

Our work upon the bridges continued to b pushed forward vigorously until the 20th, during which time it rained almost every day, and the exposure of the men caused much sickness.

On the 11th the following was received from the Secretary of War.

Washington, June 11, 1862.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC.—Your dispatch of three thirty (3.30) yesterday has been received. I am fully impressed with the difficulties mentioned and which no art nor skill can avoid, but only endure, and am striving to the uttermost to render you every aid in the power of the Government.

Your suggestions will be immediately communicated to Gen. Halleck, with a request that he shall conform to them. At last advice he contemplated sending a column to operate with Mitchell against Chattanooga, and thence upon East Tennessee. Buell reports Kentucky and Tennessee to be in a critical condition demanding immediate attention. Halleck says the main body of Beauregard's force is with him at Okalona. McCall's force was reported yesterday as having embarked on its way to join you. It is intended to send the residue of McDowell's force also to join you as speedily as possible. Fremont had a hard fight day before yesterday, with Jackson's force at Union Church, eight miles from Harrisonburg. He claims the victory, but was pretty badly handled; it is clear that a strong force is operating with Jackson, for the purpose of detaining the forces here from you. I am urging as fast as possible the new levies.

Be assured, general, that there never has been a moment when my desire has been otherwise than to aid you with my whole heart, mind and strength since the hour we first met; and whatever others may say for their own purposes, you have never had and never can have any one more truly your friend, or more anxious to support, or more joyful than I shall be at the success, which I have no doubt, will soon be achieved by your arms. E. M. S., Sec. of War.

On the 12th and 13th Gen. McCall's division arrived.

On the 13th of June two squadrons of the 5th U. S. Cavalry, under the command of Capt. Royal, stationed near Hanover Old Church, were attacked and overpowered by a force of the enemy's cavalry, numbering about 15,000 men, with four guns. They pushed on towards our depots, but at some distance from our main body, and, though pursued, very cleverly made the circuit of the army, repassing the Chickahominy at Long Bridge.

The burning of two schooners laden with forage and fourteen government wagons, the destruction of some sutlers' stores, the killing of several of the guard and teamsters at Garlick's Landing, some little damage done at Tunstall's Station, and a little eclat, were the precise results of this expedition.

On the 14th I sent the following to the Sec'y. of War :—Headq's., Army of the Potomac, Camp Lincoln, June 14, 1862, midnight :

All quiet in every direction. The stampede of last night has passed away. Weather now very favorable. I hope two days more will make the ground practicable. I shall advance as soon as the bridges are completed, and the ground fit for artillery to move, at the same time I would be glad to have whatever troops can be sent to me. I can use several new regiments to advantage. It ought to be distinctly understood that McDowell and his troops are completely under my control.

I received a telegram from him requesting that McCall's division might be placed so as to join him immediately on his arrival.

That request does not breathe the proper spirit; whatever troops come to me must be disposed of so as to do the most good. I do not feel that in such circumstances as those in which I am now placed, Gen. McD. should wish the general interests to be sacrificed for the purpose of increasing his command.

If I cannot fully control all his troops, I want none of them, but would prefer to fight the battle with what I have, and let others be responsible or the results.

The department lines should not be allowed to interfere with me, but Gen. McD. and all his troops sent to me, should be placed completely at my disposal, to do with them as I think best. In no other way can they be of assistance to me. I therefore request that I may have entire and full control. The stake at issue is too great to allow personal considerations to be entertained. You know that I have none. The indications are, from our balloon reconnoissances, and from all other sources, that the enemy are intrenching, daily increasing in numbers, and determined to fight desperately. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Com'g.

Hon. E. M. S., Sec'y. of War.

On the 20th, the following was communicated to the President :—Hdq's. Army of the Potomac, Camp Lincoln, June 20, 1862, 2 P. M. :

Your Excellency's dispatch of (11) A. M. received, also that of Gen. Sigel.

I have no doubt that Jackson has been reinforced from here. There is reason to believe that Gen. R. S. Ripley has recently joined Lee's army with a brigade or division from Charleston. Troops have arrived recently from Goldsboro. There is not the slightest reason to suppose that the enemy intends evacuating Richmond; he is daily increasing his defenses. I find him everywhere in force, and every reconnoissance costs many valuable lives. Yet I am obliged to feel my way foot by foot, at whatever cost, so great are the difficulties of the country. By to-morrow night the defensive works covering our position on this side of the Chickahominy should be completed. I am forced to this by my inferiority in numbers, so that I may bring the greatest possible numbers into action, and secure the army against the consequences of unforeseen disaster. I would be glad to have permission to lay before your Excellency by letter or telegraph, my views as to the present state of military affairs throughout the whole country. In the meantime I would be pleased to learn the disposition, as to number and position, of the troops not under my command, in Virginia and elsewhere.

His Ex'y. A. L., Pres't. G. B. McC., M.-G. Com.

To which I received this reply :

Washington, June 21, 1862, 6 P. M.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC.—Your dispatch of yesterday, two P. M., was received this morning. If it would not divert too much of your time and attention from the army under your immediate command, I would be glad to have your views as to the present state of military affairs throughout the whole country, as you say you would be glad to give them. I would rather it should be by letter than by telegraph, because of the better chance of secresy. As to the numbers and positions of the troops not under your command in Virginia and elsewhere, even if I could do it with accuracy, which I cannot, I would rather not transmit either by telegraph or letter, because of the chances of its reaching the enemy. I would be very glad to talk with you, but you cannot leave your camp, and I cannot well leave here.

A. L., President.

To which I sent the following reply :

Camp Lincoln, June 22, 1 P. M.—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of 8 P. M, yesterday.

Under the circumstances as stated in your dispatch, I perceive that it will be better, at least to defer, for the present, the communication I desired to make. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Com'g.

His Excellency, the President.

All the information I could obtain, previous to the 24th of June, regarding the movements of Gen. Jackson, led to the belief that he was at p donsville, where he was receiving reinforce-ents from Richmond, via. Lynchburg and Staun-n; but what his purposes were did not appear til the date specified, when a young man, very telligent, but of suspicious appearance, was ought in by our scouts from the direction of anover Court House. He at first stated that he as an escaped prisoner from Col Kenly's Mary-nd regiment, captured at Front Royal, but finally nfessed himself to be a deserter from Jackson's ommand, which he left near Gordonsville on the st. Jackson's troops were then, as he said, oving to Frederickshall, along the Virginia Cen-al Railroad, for the purpose of attacking my ear on the 28th. I immediately dispatched two usty negroes to proceed along the railroad, and scertain the truth of the statement. They were nable, however, to get beyond Hanover Court ouse, where they encountered the enemy's pick-ts, and were forced to turn back without obtain-g the desired information. On that day I sent he following dispatch:

Headquarters Army of the Potomac, June 24. 2 P. M., 1862.—A very peculiar case of desertion as just occurred from the enemy. The party tates he left Jackson, Whiting and Ewell, fifteen rigades, at Gordonsville, on the 21st; that they ere moving to Frederickshall, and that it was ntended to attack my rear on the 28th. I would e glad to learn, at your earliest convenience, the nost exact information you have as to the posi-ion and movements of Jackson, as well as the ources from which your information is derived, hat I may the better compare it with what I have.

G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen.

Hon. E. M. S., Secretary of War.

The following is his reply:

Washington, June 25, 2.35.

Maj.-Gen. McC.—We have no definite informa-ion as to the numbers or position of Jackson's orce. Gen. King yesterday reported a deserter's statement that Jackson's force was, nine days ago, forty thousand men. Some reports place ten thousand rebels under Jackson at Gordonsville; others that his force is at Port Republic, Harrison-burg and Luray. Fremont yesterday reported rumors that Western Virginia was threatened, and G Kelly that Ewell was advancing to New Creek, where Fremont had his depots. The last telegram fiom Fremont contradicts this rumor. The last telegram from Banks says the enemy's pickets are strong in advance at Luray. The people decline to give any information of his whereabouts. Within the last two days, the evi-dence is strong that for some purpose the enemy is circulating rumors of Jackson's advance in va-rious directions, with a view to conceal the real point of attack. Neither McDowell, who is at Manassas, nor Banks and Fremont, who are at Middletown, appear to have any accurate know-ledge of the subject. A letter transmitted to the department yesterday, purporting to be dated Gordonsville, on the 14th inst., stated that the actual attack was designed for Washington and Baltimore, as soon as you attacked Richmond; but that the report was to be circulated that Jackson had gone to Richmond, in order to mis-lead. This letter looked very much like a blind, and induces me to suspect that Jackson's real movement now is toward Richmond. It came from Alexandria, and is certainly designed, like the numerous rumors put afloat, to mislead. I think, therefore, that while the warning of the deserter to you may also be a blind, that it could not safely be disregarded. I will transmit to you any further information on this subject that may be received here. E. M. S., Sec. of War.

On the 25th our bridges and intrenchments being at last completed, an advance of our picket line on the left was ordered, preparatory to a general forward movement.

Immediately in front of the most advanced redoubt on the Williamsburg road was a large open field; beyond that a swampy belt of timber five hundred yards wide, which had been dis puted ground for many days. Further in advance was an open field crossed by the Willamsburg road and the railroad, and commanded by a redoubt and rifle-pits of the enemy. It was decided to push our lines to the other side of these woods, in order to enable us to ascertain the nature of the ground, and to place Generals Heintzelman and Sumner in position to support the attack intended to be made on the old Tavern on the 26th or 27th by Gen. Franklin, by assault-ing that position in the rear.

Between 8 and 9 o'clock on the morning of the 25th the advance was begun by Gen. Heintzel-man's corps. The enemy were found to be in strong force along the line, and contested the advance stubbornly, but by sunset our object was accomplished. The troops engaged in this affair were the whole of Heintzelman's corps, Palmer's brigade of Couch's division of Keyes's corps, and a part of Richardson's division of Sumner's corps. For the details I refer to the report of Gen Heintzelman.

The casualties, (not including those in Palmer's brigade, which have not been reported,) were as follows:—Officers killed 1, wounded 14, missing 1; Enlisted men killed 50, wounded 387, missing 63: Total 516.

The following telegrams were sent to the Se-cretary of War during the day from the field of operations:

Redoubt, No. 3, June 25, 1862, 1.30 p.m.

Hon. E. M. S.,—We have advanced our pickets on the left considerably, under sharp resistance. Our men behaved very handsomely. Some firing still continues. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

Redoubt No. 3, June 25, 1862, 3.15 p.m.

Hon. E. M. S., Sec. of War,—The enemy are making a desperate resistance to the advance of our picket lines. Kearney's and one half of Hooker's are where I want them.

I have this moment re-inforced Hooker's right with a brigade and a couple of guns, and hope in a few minutes to finish the work intended for the day. Our men are behaving splendidly. The enemy are fighting well also.

This is not a battle, merely an affair of Heint-zelman's corps, supported by Keye's, and thus far all goes well. We hold every foot we have gained. If we succeed in what we have under taken, it will be a very important advantage gained. Loss not large thus far. The fighting up to this time has been done by Gen. Hooker's division, which has behaved as usual, that is most splendidly.

On our right, Porter has silenced the enemy's batteries in his front.

G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

Redoubt No. 3, June 25, 1862, 5 p.m.

Hon. E. M. S., Sec. of War,—The affair is over, and we have gained our point fully, and with but little loss, notwithstanding the strong opposition. Our men have done all that could be desired. The affair was partly decided by two guns that Capt. De Russy brought gallantly into action under very difficult circumstances. The enemy was driven from the camp in front of this place, and is now quiet. G. B. McC., Maj.Gen. Com'g.

Also, on the same day, the following:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Camp Lincoln, June 25, 1862, 6.15 p.m.—I have just returned from the field, and found your dispatch in regard to Jackson.

Several contrabands just in, give information confirming supposition that Jackson's advance is at or near Hanover Court House, and that Beauregard arrived, with strong reinforcements, in Richmond yesterday.

I incline to think that Jackson will attack my right and rear. The rebel force is stated at 200,000, including Jackson and Beauregard. I shall have to contend against vastly superior odds if these reports be true. But this army will do all in the power of men, to hold their position and repulse any attack.

I regret my great inferiority in numbers, but feel that I am in no way responsible for it, as I have not failed to represent, repeatedly, the necessity of reinforcements, that this was the decisive point, and that all the available means of the government, should be concentrated here. I will do all that a General can do, with the splendid army that I have the honor to command, and if it is destroyed by overwhelming numbers, can at least die with it, and share its fate.

But if the result of the action, which will probably occur to-morrow, or within a short time, is a disaster, the responsibility can not be thrown on my shoulders, it must rest where it belongs. Since I commenced this, I have received additional intelligence confirming the supposition in regard to Jackson's movements and Beauregard's arrival. I shall probably be attacked to-morrow, and now go on the other side of the Chickahominy, to arrange for the defence of that side. I feel that there is no use in my again asking for reinforcements G. B. McC., Maj.-General.

E. M S., Sec. of war.

NUMBERS OF THE ENEMY.

The report of the Chief of the "Secret Service Corps," herewith forwarded, and dated 26th inst, shows the estimated strength of the enemy, at the time of the evacuation of Yorktown, to have been from 100,000 to 120,000. The same report puts his numbers on the 26th of June, at about 180,000, and the specific information obtained regarding their organization, warrants the belief that this estimate did not exceed his actual strength.

It will be observed that the evidence contained in the report, shows the following organizations, viz.:—two hundred regiments of infantry and cavalry, including the forces of Jackson and Ewell, just arrived; eight battalions of independent troops; five battalions of artillery; twelve companies o infantry and independent cavalry, besides forty-six companies of artillery; amounting in all to from forty to fifty brigades. There were, undoubtedly, many others whose designations we did not learn. The report also shows that numerous and heavy earth-works have been completed for the defence of Richmond, and, that in thirty-six of these, were mounted some two hundred guns.

THE SEVEN DAYS.

On the 26th. the day upon which I had decided as the time for our final advance, the enemy attacked our right in strong force, and turned my attention to the protection of our communications and depots of supply.

The event was a bitter confirmation of the military judgment, which had been reiterated to my superiors from the inception, and through the progress of the Peninsular campaign.

I notified the Secretary of war in the folllowing dispatch:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Camp Lincoln, June 26, 1862, 12 m.—I have just heard that our cavalry pickets, on the left Bank of the Chickahominy, are being driven in; it is, probably, Jackson's advanced guard. If this be true you may not hear from me for some days, as my communications will probably be cut off. The case is, perhaps, a difficult one, but I shall resort to desperate measures, and will do my best to out-manœuvre, outwit, and out-fight the enemy. Do not believe reports of disaster, and do not be discouraged, if you learn that my communications are cut off, and even Yorktown in possession of the enemy. Hope for the best, and I will not deceive the hopes you formerly placed in me.

G. B. McC., Maj.-General.

E. M. S., Secretary of War.

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Camp Lincoln, June 26, 1862. 2.30 p.m.—Your dispatch and that of President received. Jackson is driving in my pickets, &c., on other side of the Chickahominy. It is impossible to tell where reinforcements ought to go, as I am yet unable to predict result of approaching battle. It will probably be better that they should go to Fort Monroe, and thence according to state of affairs when they arrive.

It is not probable that I can maintain telegraphic communication more than an hour or two longer. G. B. McC., Major-General.

Hon. E. M. S., Sec. of War.

On the same day I received the following dispatch from the Secretary of War:

Washington, June 25, 1862, 11.20 P.M.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC.—Your telegram of 6.15 has just been received. The circumstances that have hitherto rendered it impossible for the government to send you any more reinforcements than has been done, have been so distinctly stated to you, by the President, that it is needless for me to repeat them.

Every effort has been made by the President myself to strengthen you. King's division is reached Falmouth. Shield's division and Rickett's division are at Manassas. The President designs to send a part of that force to aid you as speedily as it can be done.

E. M. S., Sec'y. of War.

Washington, June 26, 1862, 6 P. M.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC.:—Arrangements are being made rapidly as possible to send 5,000 men, as fast as they can be brought from Manassas to Alexandria, and embarked, which can be done sooner than to wait for transportation at Fredericksburg. They will be followed by more, if needed. McDowell, Banks, and Fremont's force will be consolidated as the army of Virginia, and will operate promptly in your aid by land. Nothing will be spared to sustain you, and I have undoubting faith in your success. Keep me advised fully of your condition.

E. M. S., Sec'y of War.

But 5,000 of the reinforcements spoken of in these communications came to the army of the Potomac, and these reached us at Harrison's Bar after the seven days. In anticipation of a speedy advance on Richmond, to provide for the contingency of our communications with the depot at the White House being severed by the enemy, and at the same time to be prepared for a change of the base of our operations to James River, if circumstances should render it advisable, I had made arrangements more than a week previous (on the 18th) to have transports with supplies of provisions and forage, under a convoy o gunboats, sent up James River. They reached Harrison's Landing in time to be available for the army on its arrival at this point. Events soon proved this change of base to be, though most hazardous and difficult, the only prudent course.

In order to relieve the troops of the 6th corps on the 19th of June, Gen. Reynolds and Gen. Seymour's brigades, of Gen. McCall's division (Pennsylvania Reserves), were moved from Gaines's Farm to a position on the Beaver Dam Creek; Gen. Meade being held in reserve in front of Gaines's Farm. One regiment and a battery were thrown forward to the heights overlooking Mechanicsville, a line of pickets extended along the Chickahominy River, between the Mechanicsville and Meadow Bridges.

As has already been stated, I received, while engaged on the 25th, in directing the operations of Heintzelman's corps, information which strengthened my suspicions that Jackson was advancing with a large force upon our right and rear. On this day, Gen. Casey, at the White House, was instructed to prepare for a vigorous resistance, and defensive works were ordered at Tunstall's Station. Early on the 25th, Gen. Porter was instructed to send out reconnoitering parties towards Hanover Court House to discover the position and force of the enemy, and to destroy the bridges on the Tolopotamy as far as possible.

Up to the 26th of June, the operations against Richmond had been conducted along the roads leading to it from the east and north-east. The reasons which compelled the choice of this line of approach and our continuance upon it have been alluded to above.

The superiority of the James River route, as a line of attack and supply, is too obvious to need exposition. My own opinion on that subject had been early given, and need not be repeated here. The dissipation of all hope of co-operation by land of Gen. McDowell's forces, deemed to be occupied in the defense of Washington, their inability to hold or defeat Jackson, disclosed an opportunity to the enemy, and a new danger to my right, and to the long line of supplies from the White House to the Chickahominy, and forced an immediate change of base across the Peninsula. To that end, from the evening of the 26th, every energy of the army was bent. Such a base, in the presence of a powerful enemy, is one of the most difficult undertakings in war, but I was confident in the valor and discipline of my brave army, and knew that it could be trusted equally to retreat or advance, and to fight the series of battles now inevitable, whether retreating from victories, or marching through defeats; and, in short, I had no doubt whatever of its ability, even against superior numbers, to fight its way through to the James, and get a position whence a successful advance upon Richmond would be again possible. Their superb conduct through the next seven days justified my faith.

On the same day (26th), Gen. Van. Vliet, chief quartermaster of the army of the Potomac, by my orders telegraphed to Col. Ingalls, quartermaster at the White House, as follows: "Run the cars to the last moment, and load them with provisions and ammunition. Load every wagon you have with subsistence, and send them to Savage Station by way of Bottom's Bridge. If you are obliged to abandon White House, burn everything that you cannot get off. You must throw all our supplies up the James River as soon as possible, and accompany them yourself with all your force. It will be of vast importance to establish our depots on James River without delay, if we abandon White House. I will keep you advised of every movement so long as the wires work; after that, you must exercise your own judgment."

All these commands were obeyed. So excellent were the dispositions of the different officers in command of the troops, depots and gun-boats, and so timely the warning of the approach of the enemy, that almost everything was saved, and but a small amount of stores destroyed, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy.

Gen. Stoneman's communications with the main army being cut off, he fell back upon the White House, and thence to Yorktown when the White House was evacuated.

On the 26th orders were sent to all the corps commanders on the right bank of the Chickahominy to be prepared to send as many troops as they could spare on the following day to the left bank of the river, as will be seen from the appended telegrams. Gen. Franklin received instructions to hold Gen. Slocum's division in readiness by daybreak of the 27th, and if heavy firing should at that time be heard in the direction of Gen. Porter, to move it at once to his assistance without further orders.

BEAVER DAM CREEK.

At noon, on the 26th, the approach of the ene my, who had crossed above Meadow Bridge, was discovered by the advanced pickets at that point, and at 12:30 P. M. they were attacked and driven in. All the pickets were now called in, and the regiment and battery at Mechanicsville withdrawn.

Meade's brigade was ordered up as a reserve in rear of the line, and shortly after Martindale's and Griffin's brigades, of Morell's division, were moved forward and deployed on the right of McCall's division, towards Shady Grove Church, to cover that flank. Neither of these three brigades, however, were warmly engaged, though two of Griffin's regiments relieved a portion of Reynolds's line just at the close of the action.

The position of our troops was a strong one, extending along the left bank of Beaver Dam Creek, the left resting on the Chickahominy, and the right in thick woods beyond the upper road from Mechanicsville to Coal Harbor. The lower or river road crossed the creek at Ellison's Mills. Seymour's brigade held the left of the line, from the Chickahominy to beyond the mill, partly in woods and partly in cleared ground, and Reynolds the right, principally in the woods and covering the upper road. The artillery occupied positions commanding the roads and the open ground across the creek.

Timber had been felled, rifle-pits dug, and the position generally prepared with a care that greatly contributed to the success of the day. The passage of the creek was difficult along our whole front, and impracticable for artillery, except by the two roads, where the main efforts of the enemy were directed.

At 3 P. M. he formed his line of battle, rapidly advanced his skirmishers, and soon attacked our whole line, making at the same time a determined attempt to force the passage of the upper road, which was successfully resisted by Gen. Reynolds. After a severe struggle he was forced to retire, with very heavy loss.

A rapid artillery fire, with desultory skirmishing, was maintained along the whole front, while the enemy massed his troops for another effort at the lower road, about two hours later, which was likewise repulsed by Gen. Seymour, with heavy slaughter. The firing ceased and the enemy retired about 9 P. M., the action having lasted six hours, with entire success to our arms. But few, if any, of Jackson's troops were engaged on this day; the portion of the enemy encountered were chiefly from the troops on the right bank of the river, who crossed near Meadow Bridge and at Mechanicsville. The information in my possession soon after the close of this action convinced me that Jackson was really approaching in large force. The position on Beaver Dam Creek, although so successfully defended, had its right flank too much in the air, and was too far from the main body to make it advisable to retain it longer. I therefore determined to send the heavy guns at Hogan's and Gaines's houses over the Chickahominy during the night, with as many of the wagons of the 5th Corps as possible, and to withdraw the corps itself to a position stretching around the bridges, where its flanks would be reasonably secure, and it would be within supporting distance of the main army. Gen. Porter carried out my orders to that effect. It was not advisable at that time, even had it been practicable, to withdraw the 5th Corps to the right bank of the Chickahominy. Such a movement would have exposed the rear of the army, placed us between two fires, and enabled Jackson's fresh troops to interrupt the movement to James River by crossing the Chickahominy in the vicinity of Jones Bridge before we could reach Malvern Hill with our trains. I determined, then, to resist Jackson with the 5th Corps, reinforced by all our disposable troops, in the new position near the brigade heads, in order to cover the withdrawal of the trains and heavy guns, and to give time for the arrangements to secure the adoption of the James River, as our line of supplies in lieu of the Pamunkey. The greater part of the heavy guns and wagons having been moved to the right bank of the Chickahominy, the delicate operation of withdrawing the troops from Beaver Dam Creek was commenced shortly before daylight, and successfully executed.

Meade's and Griffin's brigades were the first to leave the ground. Seymour's brigade covered the rear with the horse batteries of Captains Robertson and Tidball; but the withdrawal was so skillful and so gradual, and the repulse of the preceding day so complete, that although the enemy followed the retreat closely, and some skirmishing occurred, he did not appear in front of the new line in force till about noon of the 27th, when we were prepared to receive him.

About this time Gen. Porter, believing that Gen. Stoneman would be cut off from him, sent him orders to fall back on the White House, and afterwards rejoin the army as best he could.

GAINES'S MILL.

On the morning of the 27th of June, during the withdrawal of his troops to Mechanicsville to the selected position already mentioned, Gen. Porter telegraphed as follows;

"I hope to do without aid, though I request that Franklin or some other command be held ready to reinforce me. The enemy are so close that I expect to be hard pressed in front. I hope to have a portion in position to cover the retreat. This is a delicate movement, but relying on the good qualities of the commanders of divisions and brigades, I expect to get back and hold the new line."

This shows how closely Porter's retreat was followed.

Notwithstanding all the efforts used during the entire night to remove the heavy guns and wagons, some of the siege guns were still in position at Gaines's House after sunrise, and were finally hauled off by hand. The new position of the 5th Corps was about an arc of a circle, covering the approaches to the bridges which connected our right wing with the troops on the opposite side of the river.

[A] brigade had in reserve two of its own [r]nts; McCall's division, having been engaged [t]day before, was formed in a second line in [r] the first; Meade's brigade on the left, near [C]ickahominy; Reynolds' brigade on the right, [c]ng the approaches from Coal Harbor and [S]ch Station to Sumner's Bridge, and Sey[m]in reserve to the second line still further [r]. Gen. P. St. G. Cooke, with five companies [o]5th Regular Cavalry, two squadrons of the [R]gular Cavalry, and three squadrons of the [P]nsylvania Cavalry (lancers), were posted [o]a hill in rear of the position, and near the [C]hominy, to aid in watching the left flank [d]fending the slope to the river.

[G]eral Porter's first call for reinforcements, [w]h Gen. Barnard, did not reach me, nor his [s]d for more axes through the same officer. [A]t 3 P.M. the engagement had become so severe, [t]e enemy were so greatly superior in num[b]hat the entire second line and reserves had [m]oved forward to sustain the first line against [p]ed and desperate assaults along the whole [l]. At 3.30 Slocum's division reached the field, [a]as immediately brought into action at the [t]points of our line. On the left the contest [f]r the strip of woods running almost at right [a] to the Chickahominy in front of Adam's [h], or between that and Gaines's House. The [y] several times charged up to this wood, but [e]ach time driven back with heavy loss. The [t]rs of Sykes' division on the right also re[p]l several strong attacks. But our own loss, [o] the tremendous fire of such greatly supe[r]umbers, was very severe, and the troops, [m]of whom had been under arms more than [t]lays, were rapidly becoming exhausted by [t]asses of fresh men constantly brought against [t]

When Gen. Slocum's division arrived on [t]round, it increased Gen. Porter's force to [a]35,000, who were, probably, contending [a]st about 70,000 of the enemy. The line was [v]ely pressed in several points, and, as its be[c]erced at any one would have been fatal, it [w]navoidable for Gen. Porter, who was required to hold his position until night, to divide Slocum's division, and send parts of it, even single regiments, to the points most threatened. About 5 P.M., Gen. Porter having reported his position as critical, French's and Meagher's brigades, of Richardson's division (2d corps), were ordered to cross to his support. The enemy attacked again, in great force, at 6 P.M., but failed to break our lines, though our loss was very heavy. About 7 P.M. they threw fresh troops against Gen. Porter with still greater fury, and finally gained the woods held by our left. This reverse, aided by the confusion that followed an unsuccessful charge by five companies of the 5th Cavalry, and followed, as it was, by more determined assaults on the remainder of our lines, now outflanked, caused a general retreat from our position, to the hill in rear, overlooking the bridge. French's and Meagher's brigades now appeared, driving before them the stragglers, who were thronging toward the bridge.

These brigades advanced boldly to the front, and by their example, as well as by the steadiness of their bearing, reanimated our own troops, and warned the enemy that reinforcements had arrived. It was now dusk. The enemy already repulsed several times, with terrible slaughter, and hearing the shouts of the fresh troops, failed to follow up their advantage. This gave an opportunity to rally our men behind the brigades of Gen. French and Meagher, and they again marched up the hill, ready to repulse another attack. During the night our thinned and exhausted regiments were all withdrawn in safety, and by the following morning all had reached the other side of the stream. The regular infantry formed the rear guard, and about 6 o'clock, on the morning of the 28th, crossed the river, destroying the bridge behind them.

Our loss in this battle, in killed, wounded and missing, was very heavy, especially in officers, many of whom were killed, wounded, or taken prisoners, while gallantly leading on their men, or rallying them to renewed exertions. It is impossible to arrive at the exact numbers lost in this desperate engagement, owing to the series of battles which followed each other in quick succession, and in which the whole army was engaged. No general returns were made, until after we had arrived at Harrison's Landing, when the losses for the whole seven days were estimated together.

Although we were finally forced from our first line, after the enemy had been repeatedly driven back, yet the objects sought for had been attained. The enemy was held at bay, our siege-guns and material were saved, and the right wing had now joined the main body of the army.

The number of guns captured by the enemy at this battle was 22. Three of which were lost by being run off the bridge during the final withdrawal.

Great credit is due for the efficiency and bravery with which this arm of the service (the artillery) was fought, and it was not until the last successful charge of the enemy, that the cannoneers were driven from their pieces, or struck down, and the guns captured. Deidrich's, Knieriem's, and Grimmis's batteries, took position during the engagement in the front of General Smith's line on the right bank of the stream, and with a battery of siege-guns, served by the First Connecticut Artillery, helped to drive back the enemy in front of Gen. Porter.

So threatening were the movements of the enemy, on both banks of the Chickahominy, that it was impossible to decide, until the afternoon, where the real attack would be made. Large forces of infantry were seen during the day, near the Old Tavern, on Franklin's right, and threatening demonstrations were frequently made along the entire line, on this side of the river, which rendered it necessary to hold a considerable force in position to meet them.

On the 26th a circular was sent to the corps commanders on the right bank of the river, asking them how many of their troops could be spared to reinforce Gen. Porter, after retaining sufficient to hold their positions for twenty-four hours.

To this the following replies were received:

Headq's. 3d Corps, June 26, 4 P. M.

Gen. R. B. Marcy:—I think I can hold the intrenchments with four brigades for twenty-four hours. That would leave two brigades disposable for service on the other side of the river; but the men are so tired and worn out, that I fear they would not be in a condition to fight after making a march of any distance. . . .

S. P. Heintzelman, Brig.-Gen.

Telegrams from Gen. Heintzelman on the 25th and 26th had indicated that the enemy was in large force in front of Gen's. Hooker and Kearney, and on the Charles City road, (Longstreet, Hill and Huger), and Gen. Heintzelman expressed the opinion on the night of the 25th that he could not hold his advanced position without reinforcements.

Gen. Keyes telegraphed:

"As to how many men will be able to hold this position for 24 hours, I must answer, all I have, if the enemy is as strong as ever in front, it having at all times appeared to me that our forces on this flank are small enough."

On the morning of the 27th, the following dispatch was set to Gen. Sumner:

Headq's. Army of the Potomac, June 27, 8.45 A.M.

Gen. E. V. Sumner:—Gen. Smith just reports that "six or eight regiments have moved down to the woods in front of Gen. Sumner."

R. B. Marcy, Chief-of-Staff.

At 11 o'clock A.M., Gen. Sumner telegraphed as follows:—"The enemy threatens an attack on my right, near Smith." At 12.30 P.M. he telegraphed: "Sharp shelling on both sides." At 2.45 P.M.: "Sharp musketry firing in front of Burns. We are replying with artillery and infantry. The man on the look-out reports some troops drawn up in line of battle about opposite my right and Smith's left; the number cannot be made out."

In accordance with orders given on the night of the 26th, Gen. Slocum's division commenced crossing the river to support Gen. Porter, soon after daybreak on the morning of the 27th; but, as the firing in front of Gen. Porter ceased, the movement was suspended. At 2 P.M. Gen. Porter called for reinforcements. I ordered them at once, and at 3.25 P.M. sent him the following:

"Slocum is now crossing at Alexander's [illegible] with his whole command. Enemy has [illegible] menced an infantry attack on Smith's left. [illegible] ordered down Sumner's and Heintzelman's [illegible] serves, and you can count on the whole [illegible] cum's. Go on as you have begun."

During the day the following dispatches [illegible] received, which will show the condition of [illegible] on the right bank of the Chickahominy:

June 27, 1 [illegible]

To Col. A. V. Colburn, Ass't.-Adj.-Gen.:

Gen. Smith thinks the enemy are massing [illegible] columns to the right of James Garnett's [illegible] and on the other side of the river oppos[illegible] Three regiments are reported to be moving [illegible] Sumner's to Smith's front. The arrangemen[illegible] very good—made by Smith.

W. B. Franklin, Brig.-[illegible]

Afterwards he telegraphed: "The enem[illegible] begun an attack on Smith's left with infant[illegible] know no details."

Afterwards the following: "The enem[illegible] opened on Smith from a battery of three [illegible] to the right of the White House. Our she[illegible] bursting well, and Smith thinks Sumner wil[illegible] have a cross fire upon them that will s[illegible] them."

Afterwards, at 5.50 P.M., the following wa[illegible] to Gen. Keyes: "Please send one briga[illegible] Couch's division to these headquarters wit[illegible] moment's delay. A staff officer will be h[illegible] direct the brigade where to go."

Subsequently the following was sent to [illegible] Sumner and Franklin:

"Is there any sign of the enemy being in [illegible] in your front? Can you spare any more fo[illegible] be sent to Gen. Porter? Answer at once."

At 5.15 P.M. the following was received [illegible] Gen. Franklin:

"I do not think it prudent to take any [illegible] troops from here at present."

Gen. Sumner replied as follows:

"If the general desires to trust the defen[illegible] my position to the front line alone, I can [illegible] French with three regiments, and Meagher [illegible] his brigade to the right; everything is so [illegible] tain, that I think it would be hazardous to [illegible]

These two brigades were sent to rein[illegible] Gen. Porter, as has been observed.

At 5.25 I sent the following to Gen. Frank[illegible]

"Porter is hard pressed, it is not a quest[illegible] prudence, but of possibilities. Can you po[illegible] maintain your position until dark with tw[illegible] gades? I have ordered eight regiments of [illegible] ner's to support Porter, one brigade of Cou[illegible] this place; Heintzelman's brigade to go i[illegible] of Sumner. If possible send a brigade t[illegible] port Porter; it should follow the regimen[illegible] dered from Sumner."

"If it is possible send another brigade to [illegible] force Gen. Smith. It is said three heavy col[illegible] of infantry are moving on him."

From the foregoing dispatches it will be [illegible] that all disposable troops were sent from [illegible] right bank of the river to reinforce Gen P[illegible] and that the corps commanders were left [illegible] smaller forces to hold their positions than [illegible] deemed adequate.

CHANGE OF BASE.

If, other hand, the enemy had concentrated forces at Richmond during the progress of tack, and we had been defeated, we must in all probability have lost our trains before reaching the flotilla.

The battles which continued day after day, in the progress of our flank movement to the James, with the exception of the one at Gaines's Mill, were successes to our arms, and the closing engagement at Malvern Hill was the most decisive of all.

On the evening of the 27th of June, I assembled the corps commanders at my headquarters, and informed them of the plan, its reasons, and my choice of route and method of execution.

Gen. Keyes was directed to move his corps, with its artillery and baggage, across the White Oak Swamp bridge, and to seize strong positions on the opposite side of the swamp, to cover the passage of the other troops and trains.

This order was executed on the 28th by noon. Before daybreak on the 28th I went to Savage's Station, and remained there during the day and night, directing the withdrawal of the trains and supplies of the army.

Orders were given to the different commanders to load their wagons with ammunition and provisions and the necessary baggage of the officers and men, and to destroy all property which could not be transported with the army. Orders were also given to leave with those of the sick and wounded who could not be transported, a proper complement of surgeons and attendants, with a bountiful supply of rations and medical stores.

The large herd of 2,500 beef cattle was, by the chief commissary, Col. Clarke, transferred to the James River without loss.

On the morning of the 28th, while Gen. Franklin was withdrawing his command from Golding Farm, the enemy opened upon Gen. Smith's division, from Garnett's Hill, from the valley above, and from Gaines's Hill on the opposite side of the Chickahominy, and shortly afterwards two Georgia regiments attempted to carry the works about to be evacuated, but this attack was repulsed by the 23d New York, and the 49th Pennsylvania Volunteers on picket, and a section of Mott's battery.

Porter's corps was moved across White Oak Swamp during the day and night, and took up positions covering the roads leading from Richmond towards White Oak Swamp and Long Bridge. McCall's division was ordered, on the night of the 28th, to move across the Swamp and take a proper position to assist in covering the remaining troops and trains. During the same night the corps of Sumner, Heintzelman, and the division of Smith, were ordered to an interior line, the left resting on Keyes's old intrenchments, and curving to the right so as to cover Savage's Station. Gen. Slocum's division, of Franklin's corps, was ordered to Savage's Station in reserve. They were ordered to hold this position until dark of the 29th, in order to cover the withdrawal of the trains, and then to fall back across the Swamp and unite with the remainder of the army.

On the 28th I sent the following to the Secretary of War:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Savage's Station, June 28, 1862. 12.20 A. M.

I now know the whole history of the day. On this side of the river, the right bank, we repulsed several strong attacks: on the left bank our men did all that men could do—all that soldiers could accomplish, but they were overwhelmed by vastly superior numbers soon after I had brought my last reserves into action. The loss on both sides is terrible. I believe it will prove to be the most desperate battle of the war. The sad remnants of my men behave as men—those battalions who fought most bravely, and suffered most, are still in the best order. My regulars were superb; and I count upon what are left to turn another battle in company with their gallant comrades of the volunteers. Had I twenty thousand, or even ten thousand fresh troops to use to-morrow I could take Richmond; but I have not a man in reserve, and shall be glad to cover my retreat, and save the material and personnel of the army.

If we have lost the day, we have yet preserved our honor, and no one need blush for the army of the Potomac. I have lost this battle, because my force was too small.

I again repeat that I am not responsible for this, and I say it with the earnestness of a general, who feels in his heart the loss of every brave man who has been needlessly sacrificed to-day. I still hope to retrieve our fortunes, but to do this, the government must view the matter in the same earnest light that I do. You must send me very large reinforcements, and send them at once.

I shall draw back to this side of the Chickahominy, and think I can withdraw all our material. Please understand that in this battle we have lost nothing but men, and those the best we have.

In addition to what I have already said, I only wish to say to the President that I think he is wrong in regarding me as ungenerous, when I said that my force was too weak. I merely reiterated a truth, which to-day has been too plainly proved. If at this instant, I could dispose of ten thousand fresh men, I could gain the victory to-morrow.

I know that a few thousand more men, would have changed this battle from a defeat to a victory; as it is, the government must not, and cannot, hold me responsible for the result.

I feel too earnestly to-night, I have seen too many dead and wounded comrades, to feel otherwise than that the government has not sustained this army. If you do not do so now, the game is lost. If I save this army now, I tell you plainly that I owe no thanks to you, or to any other persons in Washington.

You have done your best to sacrifice this army.

G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen., to Hon. E. M. Stanton, Sec. of War.

The headquarter's camp at Savage's Station, was broken up early on the morning of the 29th, and moved across White Oak Swamp.

As the essential part of this day's operations was the passage of the trains across the Swamp, their protection against attack from the direction of New Market and Richmond, as well as the immediate and secure establishment of our communications with the gun-boats, I passed the day in examining the ground, directing the posting of the troops, and assuring the uninterrupted movement of the trains.

In the afternoon I instructed Gen. Keyes to move during the night to James River, and occupy a defensive position near Malvern Hill to cure our extreme left flank.

Gen. F. J. Porter was ordered to follow Keyes, prolong the line towards the right. The troops were to be pushed on towards James River in rear of these corps, and placed under the direction of the gun-boats as they arrived.

A sharp skirmish with the enemy's cavalry early this day on the Quaker Road, showed that his efforts were about to be directed towards impeding our progress to the river, and rendered my presence in that quarter necessary.

ALLENS' FIELD.

Gen. Sumner vacated his works at Fair Oaks on June 29th, at day-light, and marched his command to Orchard Station, halting at Allen's Farm, between Orchard and Savage's Stations.

The division of Richardson and Sedgwick was formed on the right of the railroad, facing towards Richmond, Richardson holding the right and Sedgwick joining the right of Heintzelman's corps.

The first line of Richardson's division was held by Gen. French, Gen. Caldwell supporting the second. A log building in front of Richardson's division, was held by Col. Brooks with one regiment, (53d Pennsylvania Volunteers,) with Hazzard's battery on an elevated piece of ground a little in rear of Col. Brook's command.

At 9 A. M., the enemy commenced a furious attack on the right of Gen. Sedgwick, but was repulsed. The left of Gen. Richardson was then attacked, the enemy attempting in vain to turn the position of Col. Brooks. Capt. Hazzard's battery, and Capt. Pettit's battery, which afterwards replaced it, were served with great effect, while the 53d Pennsylvania kept up a destructive fire on the advancing enemy, compelling them at last to retire in disorder. The enemy renewed the attack three times, but were as often repulsed.

SAVAGE'S STATION.

Gen. Slocum arrived at Savage's Station in the early hour on the 29th, and was ordered to cross White Oak Swamp and relieve Gen. Keyes' corps. As soon as Gen. Keyes was thus relieved he removed towards James River, which he reached in safety, with all his artillery and baggage, and on the morning of the 30th, and took up a position below Turkey Creek Bridge.

During the morning Gen. Franklin heard that the enemy, after having repaired the bridges, was crossing the Chickahominy in large force and advancing toward Savage's Station. He communicated this information to Gen. Sumner at Allen's Farm, and moved Smith's division to Savage's Station.

A little after noon Gen. Sumner united his forces with those of Gen. Franklin, and assumed command.

I had ordered Gen. Heintzelman, with his corps, to hold the Williamsburg road until at a point where were several field works, in the skirt of timber between these works and the White road; but he fell back before night, and crossed White Oak Swamp at Brackett's Ford.

Gen. Sumner in his report of the battle station, says: "When the enemy appeared Williamsburg road, I could not imagine Heintzelman did not attack him, and some time afterwards did I learn, to my amazement, that Gen. Heintzelman had left and retreated with his whole corps (5,000 men) before the action commenced. direction might have been attended with disastrous consequences, and although the enemy signally and drove him from we should certainly have given him a crushing blow if Gen. Heintzelman had been with his corps."

Heintzelman, in the report of the operations his corps, says:

"The night of the 28th of June I received order to withdraw the troops of my corps from advanced position they had taken on the 25th and to occupy the intrenched lines about in rear. A map was sent me showing me stations Gen. Sumner's and Gen. Franklin's would occupy. About sunrise the next troops slowly fell back to the new position cautiously followed by the enemy taking on of our camps as soon as we left them. some misapprehension, Gen. Sumner held advanced position than was indicated on furnished me, thus leaving a space of three-fourths of a mile between the right corps and Gen. Smith's division of Gen. 's corps. . . . .

"A. M., on the 29th, the enemy commenced attack on Gen. Sumner's troops, a few shells within my lines. Late in the afternoon reached me that the rebels were in possession Dr. Trent's house, only a mile and a half Savage's Station. I sent several cavalry reconnoissances, and finally was satisfied of the Gen. Franklin came to my headquarters, learned of the interval between his left Gen. Sumner's right, in which space Dr. house is. Also that the rebels had repaired one of the bridges across the Chickahominy were advancing.

"I rode forward to see Gen. Sumner, and met troops falling back on the Williamsburg road, in my lines. Gen. Sumner informed me that intended to make a stand at Savage's Station, for me to join him to determine upon the action. This movement of Gen. Sumner's uncovering my right flank, it became necessary for me once to withdraw my troops. . . . .

"I rode back to find Gen. Sumner; after some from the mass of troops in the field, I found and learned that the course of action had determined on; so returned to my command give the necessary orders for the destruction the railroad cars, ammunition, and provisions still remaining on the ground. . . . .

"The whole open space near Savage's Station crowded with troops, more than I supposed to be brought into action judiciously. An from the commanding general had in the morning reported to me, to point out a road across White Oak Swamp, starting from the left of Kearney's position, and leading by Brackett's Ford. . . . . The advance of the column reached the Charles City Road at 6 1-2 P. M., and near at 10 P. M without accident.

The orders given by me to Generals Sumner, Heintzelman, and Franklin, were to hold the positions assigned them until dark. As stated by Gen. Heintzelman, Gen. Sumner did not occupy the designated position, but as he was the senior officer present on that side of the White Oak Swamp, he may have thought that the movements of the enemy justified a deviation from the letter of the orders. It appears from his report that he assumed command of all the troops near Savage's Station, and determined to resist the enemy there, and that he gave Gen. Heintzelman orders to hold the same position as I had assigned him.

The aide sent by me to Gen. Heintzelman, to point out the road across the swamp, was to guide him in retiring after dark.

On reaching Savage's Station Sumner's and Franklin's commands were drawn up in line of battle in the large open field to the left of the railroad, the left resting on the edge of the woods, and the right extending down to the railroad.

Gen. Brooks, with his brigade, held the wood to the left of the field, where he did excellent service, receiving a wound, but retaining his command.

Gen. Hancock's brigade was thrown into the woods on the right and front.

At 4 P. M. the enemy commenced his attack in large force by the Williamsburg road. It was gallantly met by Gen. Burns' brigade, supported and reinforced by two lines in reserve, and finally by the New York 69th, Hazzard's and Pettit's batteries again doing good service. Osborne's and Bramhall's batteries also took part effectively in this action, which was continued with great obstinacy until between 8 and 9 P. M., when the enemy were driven from the field.

MOVEMENTS TOWARDS JAMES RIVER.

Immediately after the battle the orders were repeated for all the troops to fall back and cross White Oak Swamp, which was accomplished during the night, in good order.

By midnight all the troops were on the road to White Oak Swamp Bridge, Gen. French, with his brigade, acting as rear guard, and at 5 A. M., on the 30th all had crossed, and the bridge was destroyed.

On the afternoon and night of the 29th, I gave the corps commanders their instructions for the operations of the following day. As stated before, Porter's corps was to move forward to James River, and with the corps of Gen. Keyes, to occupy a position at or near Turkey Bend, on a line perpendicular to the river, thus covering the Charles City road to Richmond, opening communication with the gun-boats, and covering the passage of the supply trains, which were pushed forward as rapidly as possible upon Haxall's plantation. The remaining corps were pressed onward, and posted so as to guard the approaches from Richmond as well as the crossing of the White Oak Swamp, over which the army had passed.

Gen. Franklin was ordered to hold the passage of White-Oak Swamp Bridge, and cover the withdrawal of the trains from that point. His command consisted of his own corps, with Gen.

Richardson's division and Gen. Naglee's brigade placed under his orders for the occasion.

Gen. Slocum's division was on the right of the Charles City road.

On the morning of the 30th I again gave to the corps commanders within reach instructions for posting their troops. I found that, notwithstanding all the efforts of my personal staff and other officers, the roads were blocked by wagons, and there was great difficulty in keeping the trains in motion.

The engineer officers whom I had sent forward on the 28th to reconnoitre the roads, had neither returned nor sent me any reports or guides.

Gens. Keyes and Porter had been delayed, one by losing the road, and the other in repairing an old road, and had not been able to send me any information. We then knew of but one road for the movement of troops and our immense trains.

It was therefore necessary to post the troops in advance of this road, as well as our limited knowledge of the ground permitted, so as to cover the movements of the trains in rear.

I then examined the whole line from the swamp to the left, giving final instructions for the posting of the troops and the obstruction of the roads towards Richmond, and all corps commanders were directed to hold their positions until the trains had passed, after which a more concentrated position was to be taken up near James River.

Our force was too small to occupy and hold the entire line from the White-Oak Swamp to the river, exposed as it was to be taken in reverse by a movement across the lower part of the swamp, or across the Chickahominy below the swamp. Moreover the troops were then greatly exhausted, and required rest in a more secure position.

I extended my examinations of the country as far as Haxall's, looking at all the approaches to Malvern, which position I perceived to be the key to our operations in this quarter, and was thus enabled to expedite very considerably the passage of the trains, and to rectify the positions of the troops.

Everything being then quiet, I sent aids to the different corps commanders to inform them what I had done on the left, and to bring me information of the condition of affairs on the right. I returned from Malvern to Haxall's, and, having made arrangements for instant communication from Malvern by signals, went on board of Capt. Rodgers's gun-boat, lying near, to confer with him in reference to the condition of our supply vessels, and the state of things on the river.

It was his opinion that it would be necessary for the army to fall back to a position below City Point, as the channel there was so near the southern shore that it would not be possible to bring up the transports should the enemy occupy it. Harrison's Landing was, in his opinion, the nearest suitable point. Upon the termination of this interview, I returned to Malvern Hill, and remained there until shortly before daylight.

On the morning of the 30th Gen. Sumner was ordered to march with Sedgwick's division to Glendale ("Nelson's Farm").

Gen. McCall's division (Pennsylvania Res was halted during the morning on the New ket road, just in advance of the point w road turns off to Quaker Church. n. McCall's troops soon began to emerge the woods into the open field. Several bats were in position and began to fire into the ls over the heads of our men in front. Captain De Russy's battery was placed on the right of Gen. Sumner's artillery, with orders to shell the woods. Gen. Burns's brigade was then advanced to meet the enemy, and soon drove him back. Other troops began to return from the White Oak Swamp.

Later in the day, at the call of Gen. Kearney, Gen. Taylor's 1st New Jersey brigade, Slocum's division, was sent to occupy a portion of Gen. McCall's deserted position, a battery accompanying the brigade. They soon drove back the enemy, who shortly after gave up the attack, contenting themselves with keeping up a desultory firing till late at night. Between 12 and 1 o'clock at night Gen. Heintzelman commenced to withdraw his corps, and soon after daylight both of his divisions, with Gen. Slocum's division, and a portion of Gen. Sumner's command, reached Malvern Hill.

On the morning of the 30th Gen. Sumner, in obedience to orders, had moved promptly to Glendale, and upon a call from Gen. Franklin for reinforcements, sent him two brigades, which returned in time to participate and render good service in the battle near Glendale. Gen. Sumner says of this battle:

"The battle of Glendale was the most severe action since the battle of Fair Oaks. About 3 o'clock P.M. the action commenced, and after a furious contest, lasting till after dark, the enemy was routed at all points and driven from the field."

The rear of the supply trains and the reserve artillery of the army reached Malvern Hill about 4 P.M. At about this time the enemy began to appear in Gen. Porter's front, and at 5 o'clock advanced in large force against his left flank, posting artillery under cover of a skirt of timber, with a view to engage our force on Malvern Hill, while with his infantry and some artillery he attacked Colonel Warren's brigade. A concentrated fire of about thirty guns were brought to bear on the enemy, which, with the infantry fire of Colonel Warren's command, compelled him to retreat, leaving two guns in the hands of Col. Warren.

The gunboats rendered most efficient aid at this time, and helped to drive back the enemy. It was very late at night before my aides returned to give me the result of the day's fighting along the whole line, and the true position of affairs. While waiting to hear from Gen. Franklin before sending orders to Gens. Sumner and Heintzelman, I received a message from the latter that Gen. Franklin was falling back; whereupon I sent Col. Coburn of my staff with orders to verify this, and if it were true, to order in Gens. Sumner and Heintzelman at once. He had not gone far when he met two officers from Gen. Franklin's headquarters with the information that he was falling back. Orders were then sent to Gens. Sumner and Heintzelman to fall back also, and definite instructions were given as to the movement, which was to commence on the right. The orders met these troops already en route to Malvern. Instructions were also sent to Gen. Franklin as to the route he was to follow.

General Barnard then received full instructions for posting the troops as they arrived. I then returned to Haxall's, and again left for Malvern soon after daybreak, accompanied by several general officers. I once more made the entire circuit of the position, and then returned to Haxall's whence I went with Captain Rodgers to select the final location for the army and its depots. I returned to Malvern before the serious fighting commenced, and after riding along the lines and seeing most cause to feel anxious about the right, remained in that vicinity.

MALVERN HILL.

The position selected for resisting the further advance of the enemy on the 1st of July, was with the left and centre of our lines resting on "Maivern Hill," while the right curved backwards through a wooded country toward a point below Haxall's on James River. Malvern Hill is an elevated plateau about a mile and a half by three-fourths of a mile area, well cleared of timber, and with several converging roads running over it. In front are numerous defensible ravines, and the ground slopes gradually toward the north and east to the woodland, giving clear ranges for artillery in those directions. Toward the northwest the plateau falls off more abruptly into a ravine which exeends to James River. From the position of the enemy, his most obvious lines of attack would come from the directions of Richmond and White Oak Swamp, and would almost of necessity strike us upon our left wing. Here, therefore, the lines were strengthened by massing the troops, and collecting the principal part of the artillery. Porter's corps held the left of the line (Sykes' division on the left, Morell's on the right) with the artillery of his two divisions advantageontly posted ; and the artillery of the reserve so disposed on the high ground that a concentrated fire of some sixty guns could be brought to bear on any point in his front or left. Colonel Tyler also had, with great exertion succeededin getting ten of his siege guns in position on the highest point of the hill.

Couch's division was placed on the right of Porter, next came Kearney and Hooker, next Sedgwick and Richardson, next Smith and Slocum, then the remainder of Keyes' corps, extending by a backward curve nearly to the river. The Pennsylvania Reserve Corps was held in reserve and stationed behind Porter's and Couch's position. One brigade of Porter's was thrown to the left on the low ground, to protect the flank from any movement direct from the Richmond road. The line was very strong along the whole front of the open plateau; but from thence to the extreme right, the troops were more deployed. This formation was imperative, as an attack would probably be made on our left.

The right was rendered as secure as possible by slashing the timber and by barricading the roads. Commodore Rodgers, commanding the flotilla on James River, placed his gun-boats so as to protect our flanks, and to command the approaches from Richmond.

Between 9 and 10 A. M. the enemy commenced feeling along our whole left wing with his artillery and skirmishers, as far to the right as Hooker's division.

About two o'clock a column of the enem observed moving towards our right, withi skirt of woods in front of Heintzelman's but beyond the range of our artillery. Ar ments were at once made to meet the antic attack in that quarter: but though the c was long, occupying more than two hours i ing, it disappeared, and was not again hea The presumption is, that it retired by the and participated in the attack afterwards m our left.

About 3 P. M. a heavy fire of artillery o on Kearney's left, and Couch's division, sp followed up by a brisk attack of infanti Couch's front. The artillery was replied to good effect by our own, and the infant Couch's division remained lying on the g until the advancing column was within short ketry range, when they sprang to their feet poured in a deadly volley, which entirely the attacking force, and drove them in dis back over their own ground. This adva was followed up until we had advanced the of our line some seven or eight hundred and rested upon a thick clump of trees, givi a stronger position, and a better fire.

Shortly after four o'clock the firing c along the whole front; but no disposition evinced on the part of the enemy to with from the field.

Caldwell's brigade, having been detached Richardson's division, was stationed upon Co right, by Gen. Porter, to whom he had be dered to report. The whole line was surve the generals, and everything held in read to meet the coming attack. At 6 o'clock th my suddenly opened upon Couch and Porter the whole strength of his artillery, and at began pushing forward his columns of atta carry the hill. Brigade after brigade, fo under cover of the woods, started at a r cross the open space, and charge our batte but the heavy fire of our guns, with the cool steady volleys of our infantry, in every case, them reeling back to shelter, and covered ground with their dead and wounded. In eral instances our infantry withheld their until the attacking columns, which rushed thr the storm of canister and shell from our artil had reached within a few yards of our l They then poured in a single volley, and da forward with the bayonet, capturing priso and colors, and driving the routed column confusion from the field.

About seven o'clock, as fresh troops were cumulating in front of Porter and Couch, Mea and Sickles were sent with their brigades as as it was considered prudent to withdraw portion of Sumner's and Heintzelman's troop reinforce that part of the line, and hold the p tion. These brigades relieved such regiment Porter's corps and Couch's division, as had pended their ammunition, and batteries from reserve were pushed forward to replace th whose boxes were empty. Until dark the ene persisted in his efforts to take position so t ciously defended: but despite his vastly supe numbers his repeated and desperate attacks, w sed with fearful loss, and darkness ended the of Malvern Hill, though it was not until 9 o'clock that the artillery ceased its fire.

OVEMENT TO HARRISON'S LANDING.

though the result of the battle of Malvern a complete victory, it was nevertheless ne- ry to fall back still further, in order to reach nt where our supplies could be brought to ith certainty. As before stated, in the on of Capt. Rodgers, commanding the gun- flotilla, this could only be done below City . Concurring in his opinion, I selected Har- 's Bar as the new position of our supplies of forage, and ammunition, made it imperative ach the transports immediately.

e greater portion of the transportation of the having been started for Harrison's Landing g the night of the 30th of June and 1st of , the order for the movement of the troops at once issued upon the final repulse of the y at Malvern Hill.

e order prescribed a movement by the left rear—Gen. Keyes' corps to cover the manœ- r. It was not carried out in detail as regards divisions on the left, the roads being some- t blocked by the rear of our trains. Porter Couch were not able to move out as early as been anticipated, and Porter found it neces- to place a rear-guard between his command the enemy. Col. Averill, of the 3d Pennsyl- ia Cavalry, was entrusted with this delicate y. He had under his command his own regi- t and Lieut.-Col. Buchanan's brigade of regu- infantry, and one battery. By a judicious use the resources at his command, he deceived the my so as to cover the withdrawal of the left g without being attacked, remaining himself the previous day's battle-field until about 7 lock of the 2d July. Meantime, Gen. Keyes ing received his orders, commenced vigorous parations for covering the movement of the re army, and protecting the trains. It being evident that the immense number of wagons and artillery carriages pertaining to the army could not move with celerity along a single road, Gen. Keyes took advantage of every accident of the ground to open new avenues, and to facilitate the movement. He made preparations for obstructing the roads after the army had passed, so as to prevent any rapid pursuit, destroying effectually Turkey Bridge, on the main road, and rendering other roads and approaches temporarily impassable by felling trees across them. He kept the trains well closed up, and directed the march so that the troops could march on each side of the roads, not obstructing the passage, but being in good position to repel an attack from any quarter. His dispositions were so successful that, to use his own words: "I do not think more vehicles or more public property were abandoned on the march from Turkey Bridge than would have been left, in the same state of the roads, if the army had been moving toward the enemy, instead of away from him; and when it is understood that the carriages and teams belonging to this army, stretched out in one line, would extend not far from forty miles, the energy and caution necessary for their safe withdrawal from the presence of an enemy vastly superior in numbers, will be appreciated."

The last of the wagons did not reach the site selected at Harrison's Bar, until after dark on the 3d of July, and the rear guard did not move into their camp until everything was secure. The enemy followed up with a small force, and on the 3d threw a few shells at the rear guard, but were quickly dispersed by our batteries, and the fire of the gun-boats.

Great credit must be awarded to Gen. Keyes, for the skill and energy which characterized his performance of the important and delicate duties entrusted to his charge.

High praise is also due to the officers and men of the 1st Connecticut Artillery, Col. Tyler, for the manner in which they withdrew all the heavy guns during the seven days, and from Malvern Hill. Owing to the crowded state of the roads, the teams could not be brought within a couple of miles of the position, but these energetic soldiers removed the guns by hand for that distance, leaving nothing behind.

THIRD PERIOD.

CLOSE OF THE PENINSULAR CAMPAIGN.

On the 1st of July, I received the following from the President:

Washington, July 1, 1862. 3.30 P. M. Maj.-Gen. Geo. B. McClellan,—

It is impossible to reinforce you for your present emergency. If we had a million of men, we could not get them to give you in time. We have not the men to send. If you are not strong enough to face the enemy, you must find a place of security and wait, rest and repair.

Maintain your ground if you can, but save the army at all events, even if you fall back to Fort Monroe. We still have strength enough in the country, and will bring it out. A. LINCOLN.

In a dispatch from the President to me on the 2d of July, he says:

"If you think you are not strong enough to take Richmond just now, I do not ask you to. Try just now to save the army material and personnel, and I will strengthen it for the offensive again as fast as I can.

"The governors of eighteen states offer me a new levy of three hundred thousand, which I accept."

On the 3d of July, the following kind despatch was received from the President:

(Extract.)

Washington, July 3, 1862. 3 P. M.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC.—Yours of 5.30 yesterday is just received. I am satisfied that yourself, officers and men have done the best you could. All accounts say better fighting was never done. Ten thousand thanks for it A. LINCOLN.

To G. B. McC.

On the 4th, I sent the following to the President:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Harrison's Bar, James River, July 4, 1862.

To the President;—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch of the 2d instant.

I shall make a stand at this place, and endeavor to give my men the repose they so much reqnire.

After sending my communication on Tuesday, the enemy attacked the left of our lines, and a fierce battle ensued, lasting until night; they were repulsed with great slaughter. Had their attack succeeded, the consequences would have been disastrous in the extreme. This closed the hard fighting which had continued from the afternoon of the 26th ult. in a daily series of engagements, wholly unparalleled on this continent for determination and slaughter on both sides.

The mutual loss in killed and wounded, is enormous. That of the enemy certainly greatest. On Tuesday evening the 1st., our army commenced its movement from Haxall's to this point. Our line of defence there, being too extended to be maintained by our weakened forces. Our train was immense, and about 4 A. M. on the 2d, a heavy storm of rain began, which continued during the entire day, and until the forenoon of yesterday.

The road became horrible. Troops, artillery, and wagons, moved on steadily, and our whole army, men and material, was finally brought safe into this camp. The last of the wagons reached here at noon yesterday. The exhaustion was very great, but the army preserved its morale, and would have repelled any attack which the enemy was in condition to make.

We now occupy a line of heights about two miles from the James, a plain extending from there to the river. Our front is about three miles long. These heights command onr whole position, and must be maintained. The gunboats can render valuable support on both flanks. If the enemy attack us in front, we must hold our ground as best we may, and at whatever cost.

Our positions can be carried only by overwhelming numbers. The spirit of the army is excellent. Stragglers are finding their regiments, and the soldiery exhibit the best results of discipline. Our position is by no means impregnable, especially as a morass extends on this side of the high ground from our centre to the James on our right. The enemy may attack in vast n bers, and if so our front will be the scene desperate battle which if lost, will be deci Our army is fearfully weakened by killed, wo ed, and prisoners. I cannot now approxima any statement of our losses, but we are not l en in any conflict. The enemy were unabl their utmost efforts to drive us from any Never did such a change of base, involvir retrogade movement, and under incessant att from a most determined and vastly more n rous foe, partake so little of disorder. hile General-in-Chief, and directing the oper-
of all our armies in the field, I had become y impressed with the importance of adopt-d carrying out certain views regarding the ct of the war, which, in my judgment, were ial to its objects and its success. During ive campaign of three months in the enecountry these were so fully confirmed that eived it a duty, in the critical position we occupied, not to withhold a candid expresf the more important of these views from ommander-in-chief whom the constitution s at the head of the armies and navies, as is of the government of the nation. The ing is a copy of my letter to Mr. Lincoln:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
near Harrison's Landing, Va., July 7, 1862.
, President,—You have been fully informed he rebel army is in our front, with the pur-of overwhelming us by attacking our posior reducing us by blocking our river com-ations. I can not but regard our condition tical, and I earnestly desire, in view of pos-contingencies, to lay before your Excellency, our private consideration, my general views rning the existing state of the rebellion, gh they do not strictly relate to the situa-of this army, or strictly come within scope y official duties. These views amount to ctions, and are deeply impressed upon my and heart. Our cause must never be abanl; it is the cause of free institutions and government. The Constitution and the must be preserved, whatever may be the n time treasure or blood. If secession is successful, other dissolutions are clearly to be seen in the future. Let neither military disaster, political faction, or foreign war, shake your settled purpose to enforce the equal operation of the laws of the United States upon the people of every State.

The time has come when the government must determine upon a civil and military policy covering the whole ground of our national trouble. The responsibility of determining, declaring, and supporting such civil and military policy, and of directing the whole course of national affairs in regard to the rebellion must now be assumed and exercised by you, or our cause will be lost. The constitution gives you power sufficient even for the present terrible exigency.

This rebellion has assumed the character of war; as such it should be regarded; and it should be conducted upon the highest principles known to Christian civilization. It should not be a war looking to the subjugation of the people of any State in any event. It should not be at all a war upon population, but against armed forces and political organizations. Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organization of States, or forcible abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a moment. In prosecuting the war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject only to the necessity of military operations. All private property taken for military use should be paid or receipted for; pillage and waste should be treated as high crimes; all unnecessary trespass sternly prohibited, and offensive demeanor by the military towards citizens promptly rebuked. Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist, and oaths not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. Military government should be confined to the preservation of public order and the protection of political rights. Military power should not be allowed to interfere with the relations of servitude, either by supporting or impairing the authority of the master, except for suppressing disorder, as in other cases. Slaves contraband under the act of Congress, seeking military protection, should receive it. The right of the government to appropriate permanently to its own service, claims to slave labor, should be asserted, and the right of the owner to compensation therefor should be recognized.

This principle might be extended, upon grounds of military necessity and security, to all the slaves within a particular State, thus working manumission in such State; and in Missouri, perhaps in Western Virginia also, and possibly even in Maryland, the expediency of such a measure is only a question of time.

A system of policy thus constitutional and conservative, and pervaded by the influences of Christianity and freedom, would receive the support of almost all truly loyal men, would deeply impress the rebel masses and all foreign nations, and it might be humbly hoped that it would commend itself to the favor of the Almighty.

Unless the principles governing the future conduct of our struggle shall be made known and approved, the effort to obtain requisite forces will be almost hopeless. A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our present armies.

The policy of the government must be supported by concentrations of military power. The national forces should not be dispersed in expeditions, posts of occupation, and numerous armies, but should be mainly collected into masses, and brought to bear upon the armies of the confederate States. Those armies thoroughly defeated, the political structure which they support would soon cease to exist.

In carrying out any system of policy which you may form, you will require a commander-in-chief of the army; one who possesses your confidence, understands your views, and who is competent to execute your orders by directing the military forces of the nation to the accomplishment of the objects by you proposed. I do not ask that place for myself. I am willing to serve you in such position as you may assign me, and I will do so as faithfully as ever subordinate served superior.

I may be on the brink of eternity, and as I hope for forgiveness from my Maker, I have written this letter with sincerity towards you, and from love of my country. Very respectfully, your obedient servant, G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

His Excellency A. L., President.

I telegraphed the President on the 11th as follows:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Berkeley, July 11, 1862. 3 P.M.

We are very strong here now so far as defensive is concerned. Hope you will soon make us strong enough to advance and try it again. All in fine spirits. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Berkeley, July 12, 1862, 7.15 P.M.—Hill and Longstreet crossed into New Kent County via Long Bridge. I am still ignorant what road they afterwards took, but will know shortly.

Nothing else of interest since last dispatch, rain ceased and everything quiet. Men resting well, but beginning to be impatient for another fight.

I am more and more convinced that this army ought not to be withdrawn from here: but promptly reinforced and thrown again upon Richmond. If we have a little more than half a chance we can take it. I dread the effects of any retreat upon the morale of the men.

G. B. McC. to A. L., President.

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Berkeley, July 18, 1862, 8 A.M.—I have consulted fully with Gen. Burnside, and would commend to your favorable consideration the general's plan for bringing seven additional regiments from North Carolina, by leaving Newbern to the care of the gunboats. It appears manifestly to be our policy to concentrate here everything we can possibly spare from less important points, to make sure of crushing the enemy at Richmond, which seems clearly to be the most important point in dom. Nothing should be left to chance he would recommend that Gen. Burnside, wi his troops, be ordered to this army, to ena to assume the offensive as soon as possible.

ne 1st of August, I received the following hes :

Washington, July 30, 1862. 8 P.M.

irected to make arrangements for them at places, and the quarter-master-general to e transportation. I hope you will send r removal. H. W. H., Maj.-Gen.

s clear that the general-in-chief attached weight to the report received from Gen.
and I was justified in supposing that the in regard to removing the sick, contemplated an offensive movement, rather than a retreat, as I had no other data than the telegrams just given, from which to form an opinion as to the intentions of the government. The following telegram strengthened me in that belief.

Washington, July 31, 162. 10 A.M.
Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC.—General Pope again telegraphs that the enemy is reported to be evacuating Richmond, and falling back on Danville and Lynchburg. H. W. H., Maj.-Gen.

In occupying Coggin's Point, as already described, I was influenced by the necessity of possessing a secure debouche on the south of the James, in order to enable me to move on the communications of Richmond in that direction, as well as to prevent a repetition of midnight cannonanades.

To carry out Gen. Halleck's first order of July 30th, it was necessary first to gain possession of Malvern Hill, which was occupied by the enemy, apparently in some little force, and controlled the direct approach to Richmond. Its temporary occupation, at least, was equally necessary in the event of a movement upon Petersburg, or even the abandonment of the Peninsula. Gen. Hooker, with his own division and Pleasonton's cavalry, was therefore directed to gain possession of Malvern Hill on the night of the 2d August. He failed to do so, as the following dispatch recites:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Berkley,
August 9, 1862. 10.20 P.M.

The movement undertaken up the river last night failed, on account of the incompetency of guides. The proper steps have been taken today to remedy this evil, and I hope to be ready to-morrow night to carry out your suggestions as to pressing ; at least, to accomplish the first indispensable step. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

Maj.-Gen. Halleck, Comd'g U. S. Army.

On the 4th Gen. Hooker was reinforded by Gen.
Sedgwick's division, and, having obtained a knowledge of the roads, he succeeded in turning Malvern Hill, and driving the enemy back towards Richmond. The following is my report of this affair at the time :

Malvern Hill, August 5, 1862. 1 P.M.
Maj.-Gen. H. W. Hallock, Comd'g. U. S. Army General Hooker, at 5.30 this morning, attacked a very considerable force of infantry and artillery stationed at this place, and carried it handsomely driving the enemy towards New Market, which is four miles distant, and where it is said they have a large force. We have captured 100 prisoners, killed and wounded several, with a loss on our part of only three killed and eleven wounded
—among the latter two officers.

I shall probably remain here to-night, ready to act as circumstances may require, after the return of my cavalry reconnoissances.

The mass of the enemy escaped under the cover of a dense fog, but our cavalry are still in pursuit, and I trust may succeed in capturing many more.

This is a very advantageous position to cover an advance on Richmond, and only 14¾ miles distant, and I feel confident that, with reinforcements, I could march this army there in five days.

I this instant learn that several brigades of the enemy are four miles from here, on the Quaker road, and I have taken steps to prepare to meet them.

Gen. Hooker's dispositions were admirable, and his officers and men displayed their usual gallantry. G. B. McC., Major-Gen.

On the same day the following telegram was sent:

Malvern Hill, Aug 5, 1862, 8 P.M.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., Commanding U. S. Army. —Since my last dispatch Colonel Averell has returned from a reconnoissance in the direction of Savage's Station, towards Richmond. He encountered the 10th Virginia cavalry near White Oak Swamp Bridge, charged and drove them some distance towards Richmond, capturing 28 men and horses, and killing and wounding several.

Our troops have advanced twelve miles in one direction, and seventeen in another, towards Richmond, to-day.

We have secured a strong position on Coggin's Point, opposite our quartermaster's depot, which will effectually prevent the rebels from using artillery hereafter against our camps.

I learn this evening that there is a force of 20,000 men about six miles back from this point, on the south bank of the river, what their object is I do not know, but will keep a sharp look out on their movements.

I am sending off sick as rapidly as our transports will take them. I am also doing everything in my power to carry out your orders, to push reconnoisances towards the rebel capital, and hope soon to find out whether the reports regarding the abandonment of that place are true.

G. B. McC., Major-Gen.

To the dispatch of 1 P.M., August 5, the following answer was received:

Washington, August 6, 1862, 3 A.M.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC.—I have no reinforcements to send you. H. W. H. Maj.-Gen.

And soon after the following:

Washington, August 6, 1862.

Maj,-Gen. G. B. McC.—You will immediately send a regiment of cavalry and several batteries of artillery to Burnside's command at Acquia Creek. It is reported that Jackson is moving north with a very large force.

H. W. H, Major-General.

On the 4th I had received Gen. Halleck's order of the 3d (which appears below), directing me to withdraw the army to Acquia, and on the same day sent an earnest protest against it.

A few hours before this, Gen. Hooker had informed me that his cavalry pickets reported large bodies of the enemy advancing and driving them in, and that he would probably be attacked at daybreak. Under these circumstances I had determined to support him, but as I could not get the whole army in position until the next afternoon, I concluded, upon the receipt of the above telegram from the general-in-chief, to withdraw Gen. Hooker, that there might be the least possible delay in conforming to Gen. Halleck's orders. I therefore sent to Gen. Hooker the following letter:

The order required me to send them away "as ickly as possible, and to notify the Gen.-in-Chief en they were removed."

Previous to the receipt of the dispatch of the of August, not having been advised of what army under my command was expected to do, which way it was to move, if it moved at all, I t the following dispatch:

Headq's., Army of the Potomac, Berkeley, Aug. 3, 1862.

I hear of sea steamers at Fort Monroe: are they r removing my sick? If so, to what extent am required to go in sending them off?

There are not many who need go

As I am not in any way informed of the intentions of the government in regard to this army, I am unable to judge what proportion of the sick should leave here, and must ask for specific orders.

G. B. McC. to Maj.-Gen. H. W. H.

If the army was to retreat to Fort Monroe, it was important that it should be unincumbered with any sick, wounded, or other men who might at all interfere with its mobility; but if the object was to operate directly on Richmond from the position we then occupied, there were many cases of slight sickness which would speedily be cured, and the patients returned to duty. As the service of every man would be important in the event of a forward offensive movement, I conceived it to be of the utmost consequence that I should know what was to be done. It was to ascertain this that I sent the dispatch of 11 P. M. on the 3d, before receiving the following telegram:

Washington, Aug. 3, 1862. 7.45 P. M.

Maj.-Gen. Geo. B. McC.—I have waited most anxiously to learn the result of your forced reconnoissance towards Richmond, and also whether all your sick have been sent away, and I can get no answer to my telegram. It is determined to withdraw your army from the Peninsula to Acquia Creek. You will take immediate measures to effect this, covering the movement the best you can. Its real object and withdrawal should be concealed even from your own officers. Your material and transportation should be removed first. You will assume control of all the means of transportation within your reach, and apply to the naval forces for all the assistance they can render you. You will consult freely with the commander of these forces. The entire execution of the movement is left to your discretion and judgment. You will leave such forces as you may deem proper at Fort Monroe, Norfolk, and other places which we must occupy.

H. W. H., Maj-Gen. Comd'g U. S. A.

I proceeded to obey this order with all possible rapidity, firmly impressed, however, with the conviction that the withdrawal of the army of the Potomac from Harrison's Landing, where its communications had, by the co-operation of the gun-boats, been rendered perfectly secure, would at the time have the most disastrous effect upon our cause. I did not, as the commander of that army, allow the occasion to pass without distinctly setting forth my views upon the subject to the authorities, as in the following telegram.

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Berkely, Aug. 4, 1862. 12 M.

Your telegram of last evening is received. I must confess that it has caused me the greatest pain I ever experienced, for I am convinced that the order to withdraw this army to Acquia Creek will prove disastrous to our cause.

I fear it will be a fatal blow.

Several days are necessary to complete the preparations for so important a movement as this, and while they are in progress, I beg that careful consideration may be given to my statements.

This army is now in excellent discipline and condition. We hold a debouche on both banks of the James River, so that we are free to act in any direction, and with the assistance of the gun-boats I consider our communications as now secure. We are twenty-five miles from Richmond, and are not likely to meet the enemy in force sufficient to fight a battle, until we have marched fifteen to eighteen miles, which brings us practically within ten miles of Richmond. Our longest line of land transportation would be from this point twenty-five miles: but with the aid of the gun-boats we can supply the army by water during its advance, certainly to within twelve miles of Richmond.

At Acquia Creek we would be seventy-five miles from Richmond, with land transportation all the way.

From here to Fort Monroe, is a march of about seventy miles, for I regard it as impracticable to withdraw this army and its material, except by land.

The result of the movement would thus be a march of one hundred and forty-five miles to reach a point now only twenty-five miles distant, and to deprive ourselves entirely of the powerful aid of the gun-boats and water transportation. Add to this the certain demoralization of this army, which would ensue, the terribly depressing effect upon the people of the North, and the strong probability that it would influence foreign powers to recognize our adversaries, and there appear to me sufficient reasons to make it my imperative duty to urge, in the strongest terms afforded by our language, that this order may be rescinded, and that, far from recalling this army it be promptly reinforced to enable it to resume the offensive.

It may be said that there are no reinforcements available. I point to Burnside's force, to that of Pope, not necessary to maintain a strict defensive in front of Washington and Harper's Ferry, to those portions of the army of the west not required for a strict defensive there. Here directly in front of this army, is the heart of the rebellion; it is here that all our resources should be collected to strike the blow which will determine the fate of the nation. All points of secondary importance elsewhere should be abandoned, and every available man brought here—a decided victory here, and the military strength of the rebellion is crushed—it matters not what partial reverses we may meet with elsewhere. Here is the true defense of Washington; it is here on the banks of the James that the fate of the Union should be decided

Clear in my convictions of right, strong in the consciousness that I have ever been, and still am actuated solely by love of my country, knowing that no ambitious or selfish motives have influenced me from the commencement of this war, I do now, what I never did in my life before, I entreat that this order may be rescinded.

If my counsel does not prevail, I will with a sad heart obey your orders to the utmost of my power, directing to the movement, which I clearly foresee will be one of the utmost delicacy and difficulty, whatever skill I may possess.

Whatever the result may be, and God grant that I am mistaken in my forebodings, I shall at least have the internal satisfaction that I have written and spoken frankly, and have sought to do the best in my power to avert disaster t my country. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

It is believed that it can done now without serious danger. This m not be so if there should be any delay.

I will write you my views more fully by m H. W. H., Maj.-Gen. Comd'g U. S. A.

The letter was as follows:

Headquarters of the Army,

Washington, Aug. 6, 18

Maj.-Gen. McC., Comd'g. &c., Berkeley, Va.

General,—Your telegram of yesterday was ceived this morning, and I immediately telegrap ed a brief reply, promising to write you mo fully by mail.

You, General, certainly could not have be more pained at receiving my order, than I was the necessity of issuing it. I was advised b high officers, in whose judgment I had great co fidence, to make the order immediately on m arrival here, but I determined not to do so un I could learn your wishes from a personal inte view: and even after that interview I tried eve means in my power to avoid withdrawing yo army, and delayed my decision as long as I dare to delay it.

I assure you, General, it was not a hasty an unconsidered act, but one that caused me mo anxious thought than any other of my life. B after full and mature consideration of all the pr and cons, I was reluctantly forced to the conclu sion that the order must be issued. There wa to my mind, no alternative.

Allow me to allude to a few of the facts in th

You and your officers, at our interview, nated the enemy's forces in and around mond at two hundred thousand men. Since , you and others report that they have re- ed and are receiving large reinforcements the South.

n. Pope's army, now covering Washington, nly about forty thousand. Your effective is only about ninety thousand. You are t thirty miles from Richmond, and Gen. Pope ty or ninety, with the enemy directly be- n you, ready to fall with his superior num- upon one or the other, as he may elect. her can reinforce the other in case of such tack. If Gen. Pope s army be diminished to force you, Washington, Maryland, and Penn- nia would be left uncovered and exposed. ur force be reduced to strengthen Pope, you ld be too weak to even hold the position you occupy, should the enemy turn round and k you in full force. In other words, the old of the Potomac is split into two parts, with ntire force of the enemy directly between . They can not be united by land without sing both to destruction, and yet they must nited. To send Pope's forces by water to Peninsula, is, under present circumstances, a ary impossibility. The only alternative is to the forces on the Peninsula to some point water, say Fredericksburg, where the two es can be united.

et me now allude to some of the objections ch you have urged. You say that the with- val from the present position will cause the ain demoralization of the army, "which is in excellent discipline and condition." I not understand why a simple change of posi- to a new and by no means distant base, will oralize an army in excellent discipline, unless officers themselves assist in that demoraliza- , which I am satisfied they will not. Your ge of front from your extreme right at Han- r Court House to your present position was r thirty miles, but I have not heard that it oralized your troops, notwithstanding the re losses they sustained in effecting it.

new base on the Rappahannock at Freder- sburg brings you within about sixty miles of hmond, and secures a reinforcement of forty fifty thousand fresh and disciplined troops. reover, you yourself suggested that a junction ht be effected at Yorktown; but that a flank ch across the Isthmus would be more hazar- us than to retire to Fort Monroe. You will member that Yorktown is two or three miles ther from Richmond than Fredericksburg is. ides the latter is between Richmond and shington, and covers Washington from any ack by the enemy.

The political effect of the withdrawal may at t be unfavorable; but I think the public are ginning to understand its necessity, and that y will have much more confidence in a united y, than in its separated fragments.

But you will reply, why not reinforce me here, that I can strike Richmond from my present sition? To do this you said at our interview, t you required thirty thousand additional troops. I told you that it was impossible to give you so many. You finally thought you would have "some chance" of success with twenty thousand. But you afterwards telegraphed me that you would require thirty-five thousand, as the enemy was being largely reinforced. If your estimate of the enemy's strength was correct, your requisition was perfectly reasonable; but it was utterly impossible to fill it until new troops could be enlisted and organized, which would require several weeks.

To keep your army in its present position until it could be so reinforced, would almost destroy it in that climate. The months of August and September are almost fatal to whites who live on that part of James River, and even after you receive the reinforcements asked for, you admitted that you must reduce Fort Darling and the river batteries, before you could advance on Richmond. It is by no means certain that the reduction of these fortifications would not require considerable time, perhaps as much as those at Yorktown. This delay might not only be fatal to the health of your army, but in the meantime Gen. Pope's forces would be exposed to the heavy blows of the enemy without the slightest hope of assistance from you.

In regard to the demoralizing effect of a withdrawal from the Peninsula to the Rappahannock, I must remark that a large number of your highest officers, indeed, a majority of those whose opinions have been reported to me, are decidedly in favor of the movement. Even several of those who originally advocated the line of the Peninsula, now advise its abandonment.

I have not inquired, and do not wish to know by whose advice, or for what reasons the army of the Potomac was separated into two parts with the enemy between them. I must take things as I find them. I find the forces divided, and I wish to unite them. Only one feasible plan has been presented for doing this. If you or any one else had presented a better plan, I certainly should have adopted it. But all of your plans require reinforcements, which it is impossible to give you. It is very easy to ask for reinforcements; but it is not so easy to give them when you have no disposable troops at your command.

I have written very plainly, as I understand the case, and I hope you will give me credit for having fully considered the matter, although I may have arrived at very different conlusions from your own.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. W. H., Gen.-in-Chief.

On the 7th I received the following telegram:

Washington, Aug. 7, 1862, 10 A.M.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC.:—You will immediately report the number of sick sent off since you received my order; the number still to be shipped, and the amount of transportation at your disposal; that is, the number of persons that can be carried on all the vessels which by my order you were authorized to control.

H. W. H., Maj.-Gen.

To which I made this reply:

Headq's., Army of the Pot'c., Aug. 7, '62, 10.40 P.M.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., Com. U. S. A.:—In reply to your despatch of 10 A. M. to-day I report the number of sick sent off since I received your order, as follows: 3,740, including some that are embarked to-night, and will leave to-morrow morning. The number still to be shipped, is, as nearly as can be ascertained, 5,700.

The embarkation of five batteries of artillery, horses, wagons, etc., required most of our available boats except the ferry-boats. All the transports that can ascend to this place, have been ordered up, they will be here to-morrow evening. Col. Ingalls reports to me that there are no transports now available for cavalry, and will not be for two or three days. As soon as they can be obtained, I shall send off the 1st New York cavalry.

After the transports with sick and wounded have returned, including some heavy draft steamers at Fort Monroe, that cannot come to this point, we can transport 25,000 men at a time. We have some propellers here, but they are laden with commissary supplies, and are not available. The transports now employed in transporting sick and wounded, will carry 12,000 well infantry soldiers, Those at Fort Monroe, and of too heavy draft to come here, will carry 8,000 or 10,000 infantry. Several of the largest steamers have been used for transporting prisoners of war, and have only been available for the sick to-day.

G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen.

The report of my chief quartermaster upon the subject is as follows:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Office of chief Quartermaster, Harrison's Landing, Aug. 7, 1862.

GENERAL:—I have the honor to return the papers herewith, which you sent me, with the following remarks:

We are embarking five batteries of artillery, with their horses, baggage, etc., which requires the detailing of most of our available boats, except the ferry-boats.

The medical departmen has 10 or 12 of our largest transport vessels which, if disposable, could carry 12,000 men. Besides, there are some heavy draft steamers at Fort Monroe, that cannot come to this point, but which can carry 8,000 or 10,000 infantry.

I have ordered all up here that can ascend to this depot. They will be here to-morrow evening. As it now is, after the details already made, we cannot transport from this place more than 5,000 infantry.

There are no transports now available for cavalry. From and after to-morrow, if the vessels arrive, I could transport 10,000 infantry. In two or three days a regiment of cavalry can be sent if required.

If you wait and ship from Yorktown or Fort Monroe, after the sick and wounded transports are at my disposal, we can transport 25,000 at a time. The number that can be transported, is contingent on circumstances referred to.

Most of the propellers here are laden with commissary, or other supplies, and most of the tugs are necessary to tow off sail craft, also laden with supplies.

I am very respectfully, your most obedient servant, RUFUS INGALLS, Chief Quartermaster.

Gen. R. B. Marcy, Chief of Staff.

On the 9th I received this despatch:

Washington, Aug. 9, 1862. 12.45 P.

MAJ.-GEN. G. B. McC.—I am of opinion that enemy is massing his forces in front of Gene Pope and Burnside, and that he expects to cr them, and move forward to the Potomac. must send reinforcements instantly to Acc Creek.

Considering the amount of transportatior your disposal, your delay is not satisfact you must move with all possible celerity.

H. W. H. Maj-Ger

To which I sent the following reply:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Berke Aug. 10, 1862. 8 A. M.

Telegram of yesterday received. The bat ies sent to Burnside, took the last available tr port yesterday morning. Enough have since rived to ship one regiment of cavalry to-day.

The sick are being embarked as rapidly as p sible. There has been no unnecessary delay you assert, not an hour, but everything has be and is being pushed as rapidly as possible to c ry out your orders.

G. B. McC. to Maj.-Gen, H. W. H., Comd'g S. Army.

The following report, made on the same by the officer then in charge of the transpo exposes the injustice of the remark in the patch of the general-in-chief, that, "consider the amount of transportation at your dispo your delay is not satisfactory."

Assistant Quartermaster's office, Army of Potomac, Harrison's Landing, Va., Aug. 10, 18

GEN. M. C. MEIGS, Quartermaster General U. Army, Washington:—Col. Ingalls being hims ill, has requested me to telegraph to you conce ing the state and capacity of the transports n here.

On the night of the 8th I despatched elev steamers, principally small ones, and six scho ers, with five batteries of heavy horse artille none of which have yet returned.

Requisition is made this morning for transpo ation of one thousand cavalry to Acquia Cre All the schooners that had been chartered carrying horses, have been long since discharg or changed into freight vessels.

A large proportion of the steamers now he are still loaded with stores, or are in the floati hospital service, engaged in removing the sic To transport the one thousand cavalry to-day w take all the available steamers now here not e gaged in the service of the harbor. These steam ers could take a large number of infantry; b are not well adapted to the carrying of horse and much space is thus lost.

Several steamers are expected here to-day, a we are unloading schooers rapidly. Most of the are not chartered, but are being taken for t service required at same rates of pay as oth chartered schooners.

If you could cause a more speedy return the steamers sent away from here, it would facil tate matters.

C. G. SAWTELLE, Capt. and A. Q. M. Comd'g Depo

Our wharf facilities at Harrison's Landing wer very limited, admitting but few vessels at on time. These were continually in use as long a re were disposable vessels, and the officers of medical and quartermaster's departments, h all their available forces, were incessantly upied, day and night, in embarking and send-off the sick men, troops and material.

Notwithstanding the repeated representations ade to the general-in-chief that such were the ts, on the 10th I received the following:

Washington, Aug. 10, 1862, 12 P. M.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC.:—The enemy is crossing Rapidan in large foree. They are fighting
n. Pope to-day; there must be no further delay your movements. That which has already oc-red was entirely unexpected, and must be isfactorily explained. Let not a moment's time lost, and telegraph me daily what progress u have made in executing the order to transfer ur troops. H. W. H., Maj.-Gen.

To which I sent this reply:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
Berkeley, Aug. 10, 1862, 12.30 P. M.

Your despatch of to-day is received. I assure u again that there has not been any unnecesry delay in carrying out your orders. You are obably laboring under some great mistake as the amount of transportation available here. I ve pushed matters to the utmost in getting off
r sick, and the troops you ordered to Burnside.
Col. Ingalls has more than once informed the uartermaster General of the condition of our ater transportation. From the fact that you rected me to keep the order secret, I took it r granted that you would take the steps necesry to provide the requisite transportation. A rge number of transports for all arms of ser-ce, and for wagons, should at once be sent to orktown and Fort Monroe. I shall be ready to ove the whole army by land, the moment the ck are disposed of. You may be sure that not hour's delay will occur that can be avoided. I ar you do not realize the difficulty of the ope-tion proposed. The regiment of cavalry for rnside has been in course of embarkation to-ay and to-night. Ten steamers were required r the purpose. Twelve hundred and fifty-eight ck loaded to-day and to-night. Our means ex-austed, except one vessel returning to Fort onroe in the morning, which will take some ve hundred cases of slight sickness.

The present moment is probably not the proper ne for me to refer to the unnecessarily harsh and njust tone of your telegrams of late. It will, owever, make no difference in my official action.

G. B. McC. to Maj-Gen. H. W. H. Comd'g U. S. rmy.

On the 11th this report was made:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Berkely,
ug. 11, 1862. 11.40 P. M.

The embarkation of eight hundred and fifty avalry and one brigade of infantry will be comleted by two o'clock in the morning, five hun-red sick were embarked to-day; another vessel rrived to-night, and six hundred more sick are ow being embarked. I still have some four housand sick to dispose of. You have been grossly misled as to the amount of transportaion at my disposal. Vessels loaded to their utmost capacity with stores and others indispensable for service here, have been reported to you as available for carrying sick and well. I am sending off all that can be unloaded at Fort Monroe, to have them return here. I repeat that I have lost no time in carrying out your orders.

G. B. McC., Maj-Gen. Comd'g to Maj-Gen H. W.
H. Comd'g U. S. Army.

On the same day I received the following from the quartermaster in charge of the depot:

Assistant Quartermaster's Office, Army of the Potomac, Harrison's Landing, Va., Aug. 11, 1862.

Colonel:—In reply to the communication from Gen. Marcy, which was referred to me by you, I have to state that there are now in this harbor no disposable transports not already detailed either for the use of the hospital department, or the transportation of the N. Y. cavalry, or for the necessary service of the harbor. I think the steamers loading, and to be loaded with cavalry could take in addition, three thousand infantry;
these boats are however directed to leave as fast as they are loaded; some have already started.
The embarkation of this cavalry regiment is going on very slowly, and it is not in my power to hurry the matter, although I have had several agents of the department, and one commissioned officer at the wharf to render all the assistance possible. The entire army is this morning turning in to be stored on vessels, knapsacks, officer's baggage and other surplus property, and with our limited wharf facilities, it is impossible, unless the regular issues of forage, &c. are suspended, to avoid great confusion and delay with what is already ordered to be done; of course, if any infantry is ordered to embark on these cavalry transports, the confusion and difficulties will be increased.

I know of no boats that may be expected here to-day, except the "South America" and "Fanny Cadwallader" (a propeller) which were ordered to be sent back from Fort Monroe.

The transports with the artillery left for Acquia Creek on the night of the 8th and the morning of the 9th. They were ordered to return immedi ately. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, C. G. SAWTELLE.

Capt. and A. Q. M. Comd'g Depot.

Lieut.-Col. Rufus Ingalls, A. D. C. and chief Q. M.
Army of the Potomac.

On the 12th I received the following:

Washington, Aug. 12. 1862. 12 M.

Maj-Gen. G. B. McClellan —The quartermaster general iuforms me that nearly every available steam vessel in the country is now under your control. To send more from Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York, would interfere with the transportation of army supplies, and break up the channels of travel by which we are to bring forward the new troops. Burnside moved nearly thirteen thousand troops to Acquia Creek, in less than two days, and his transports were immediately sent back to you. All vessels in the James River and Chesapeake Bay were placed, at your disposal, and it was supposed that eight or ten thousand of your men could be transported daily. In addition to steamers, there is a large fleet of sailing vessels which could be used as transports. The bulk of your material on shore, it was thought, could be sent to Fort Monroe covered by that part of the army which could not get water transportation. Such were the views of the government here; perhaps we were misinformed as to the facts; if so, the delay could be explained. Nothing in my telegram was intentionally harsh or unjust; but the delay was so unexpected, that an explanation was required. There has been and is the most urgent necessity for dispatch, and not a single moment must be lost in getting additional troops in front of Washington. H. W. H. Maj-Gen.

Your dispatch of noon to-day received. It is positively the fact that no more men could have embarked hence than have gone, and that no unnecessary delay has occurred. Before your orders received, Col. Ingalls directed all available vessels to come from Monroe. Officers have been sent to take personal direction. Have heard nothing here of Burnside's fleet. There are some vessels at Monroe, such as Atlantic and Baltic, which draw too much to come here. Hospital accommodations exhausted this side New York. Propose filling Atlantic and Baltic with serious cases for New York, and to encamp slight cases for the present at Monroe. In this way can probably get off the 3,400 sick still on hand by day after to-morrow night. I am sure that you have been misinformed as to the availability of vessels on hand. We cannot use heavy loaded supply vessels for troops or animals, and such constitute the mass of those here, which have been represented to you as capable of transporting this army. I fear you will find very great delay in embarking troops and marerial at Yorktown and Monroe, both from want of vessels and of facilities for embarkation. At least two additional wharves should be built at each place. I ordered two at the latter some two weeks ago, but you countermanded the order.

I learn that wharf accommodations at Acquia are altogether inadequate for landing troops and supplies to any large extent. Not an hour should be lost in remedying this. Great delays will ensue there from shallow water. You will find a large deficiency in horse transports; we had nearly 200 when we came here. I learn of only 20 provided now; they carry about 50 horses each. More hospital accommodations should be provided. We are much impeded here because our wharves are used night and day to land current supplies. At Monroe a similar difficulty will occur. With all the facilities at Alexandria and Washington, six weeks about were occupied in embarking this army and its material.

Burnside's troops are not a fair criterion for rate of embarkation. All his means were in hand—his outfit specially prepared for that purpose, and his men habituated to the movement.

There shall be no unnecessary delay, but I cannot manufacture vessels. I state these difficulties from experience, and because it appears to me that we have been lately working at cross purposes, because you have not been properly informed by those around you who ought to know the inherent difficulties of such an undertaking.

It is not possible for any one to place this army where you wish it, ready to move, in less than a month. If Washington is in danger now, this army can scarcely arrive in time to save it; it is in much better position to do so from here than from Acquia. Our material can only be saved by using the whole army to cover it if we are pressed. If sensibly weakened by detachments, the result might be the loss of much material and many men. I will be at the telegraph office tomorrow morning to talk with you.

G. B. McC. to H. W. H., Washington, D. C.

To the reasons given in the foregoing dispatch to show why Gen. Burnside's movement from Fort Monroe was not a fair criterion for our operations, the following may be added:

He was not encumbered by either sick or wounded men.

He had no cavalry, artillery, wagons or teams. His force consisted of infantry alone, with a few ambulances and officers' horses.

His baggage was already on the transports where it had remained since his arrival from North Carolina, and his men had only to resume their places on board.

The cavalry and artillery mentioned in my dispatches of the 7th, 10th and 11th were sent to supply his total deficiency in those arms.

I may also repeat that the vessels used by Gen. Burnside had not returned from Acquia when the army left Harrison's Bar.

It will be seen from the concluding paragraph of the foregoing dispach, that in order to have a more direct, speedy and full explanation of the condition of affairs in the army than I could by sending a single dispatch by steamer to the nearest telegraph office at Jamestown Island some seventy miles distant, and waiting ten hours for a reply, I proposed to go in person to the office. On my arrival at Jamestown Island there was an interruption in the electric current, which rendered it necessary for me to continue on to Fort Monroe, and cross the Chesapeake Bay to Cherry Stone Inlet on the "Eastern Shore," where I arrived late in the evening and immediately sent the annexed dispatches.

Cherry Stone, Aug. 13, 1862, 11.30 P.M.—Please come to office: wish to talk to you. What news from Pope? G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., Washington.

Cherry Stone Inlet, Aug. 14, 1862, 12.30 A.M.—Started to Jamestown Island to talk with you; found cable broken, and came here. Please read my long telegram. [See above dispatch of Aug. 12, 11 P.M.] All quiet at camp. Enemy burned wharves at City Point yesterday. No rebel pickets within eight miles of Coggin's Point yesterday. Richmond prisoners state that large force, with guns, left Richmond, northward, Sunday.

G. B. McC. Maj.-Gen. Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., Wash.

To which the following reply was received:

Washington, August 14, 1862, 1.40 A.M.—I have read your dispatch. There is no change of plans. You will send up your troops as rapidly as possible. There is no difficulty in landing them. According to your own accounts there is now no difficulty in withdrawing your forces. Do so with all possible rapidity.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC. H. W. H., Maj.-Gen.

Before I had time to decipher and reply to this dispatch, the telegraph operator in Washington informed me that Gen. Halleck had gone out of the office immediately after writing this dispatch, without leaving any intimation of the fact for me or waiting for any information as to the object of my journey across the bay. As there was no possibility of other communication with him at that time, I sent the following dispatch, and returned to Harrison's Landing.

Cherry Stone Inlet, Aug. 14, 1862, 1.40 A. M.

Your orders will be obeyed. I return at once. I had hoped to have had a longer and fuller conversation with you, after traveling so far for the purpose. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen.

Maj.-Gen. W. H. H., Washington, D. C.

On the 14th and 15th, and before we had been able to embark all our sick men, two army corps were put in motion towards Fort Monroe. This was reported in the annexed despatch:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
Berkeley, Aug. 16, 1862, 11 P. M.

Movement has commenced by land and water. All sick will be away to-morrow night. Everything being done to carry out your orders. I can't like Jackson's movements, he will suddenly appear where least expected. Will telegraph fully and understandingly in the morning. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen.

Maj.-Gen. H., Washington, D. C.

The phrase "movement has commenced," it need not be remarked, referred obviously to the movement of the main army, after completing the necessary preliminary movements of the sick, &c., etc.

The perversion of the term to which the general-in-chief saw fit to give currency in a letter to the Secretary of War, should have been rendered impossible by the dispatches which precede this of the 14th, which show that the movement really began immediately after the receipt of the order of August 4th.

The progress made in the movement on the 15th was reported in the following dispatches:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
August 15, 1862, 12 M.

Maj.-Gen. H, W. H., Comd'g U. S. A.:—Col. Ingalls this moment reports that after embarking the remaining brigade of McCall's division, with the sick which are constantly accumulating, the transports now disposable will be consumed.

Two of my army corps marched last night and this morning en route for Yorktown, one via Jones's Bridge, and the other via Barrett's Ferry, where we have a pontoon bridge. The other corps will be pushed forward as fast as the roads are clear, and I hope before to-morrow morning to have the entire army in motion.

A report has just been received from my pickets that the enemy in force is advancing on us from the Chickahominy, but I do not credit it—we shall know soon. Should any more transports arrive here before my departure, and the enemy do not show such a force in our front as to require all the troops I have remaining to insure the safety of the land movement with its immense train, I shall send every man by water that the transports will carry. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen.

Berkeley, Aug. 15, 1862, 1.30 P. M.

The advance corps and the trains are fairly started. I learn nothing more in relation to reported advance of rebels via Jones's Bridge. Shall push the movement as rapidly as possible. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., Washington, D. C.

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Berkeley, August 15, 1862. 10 P.M.

Coggin's Point is abandoned. The whole of McCall's division, with its artillery, is now en route for Burnside. We have not yet transportation sufficient for our sick. I hope we will get it to-morrow. Porter is across the Chickahominy, near its mouth, with his wagons and the reserve artillery.

Heintzelman at Jones's Bridge, with a portion of his corps. They will all be up by morning.

Averell's cavalry on the other side. All quiet thus far. I cannot get the last of the wagons as far as Charles City Court-house before some time to-morrow afternoon. I am hurrying matters with the utmost rapidity possible. Wagons will move all night. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., Washington, D. C.

After the commencement of the movement, it was continued with the utmost rapidity, until all the troops and material were en route, both by land and water, on the morning of the 16th.

Late in the afternoon of that day, when the last man had disappeared from the deserted camps, I followed with my personal staff in the track of the grand army of the Potomac, bidding farewell to the scene still covered with the marks of its presence, and to be forever memorable in history as the vicinity of its most brilliant exploits.

THE RETURN TO THE POTOMAC.

Previous to the departure of the troops, I had directed Capt. Duane, of the Engineer Corps, to proceed to Barrett's Ferry, near the mouth of the Chickahominy, and throw across the river at that point a pontoon bridge. This was executed promptly and satisfactorily, under the cover of gun-boats, and an excellent bridge of about two thousand feet in length was ready for the first arrival of troops. The greater part of the army with its artillery, wagon trains, etc., crossed it rapidly, and in perfect order and safety, so that on the night of the 17th, everything was across the Chickahominy, except the rear-guard, which crossed early on the morning of the 18th, when the pontoon bridge was immediately removed.

Gen. Porter's corps, which was the first to march from Harrison's Landing, had been pushed forward rapidly, and on the 16th reached Williamsburg, where I had directed him to halt until the army was across the Chickahominy.

On his arrival at Williamsburg, however, he received an intercepted letter, which led to the belief that Gen. Pope would have to contend against a very heavy force then in his front. Gen Porter, therefore, very properly took the responsibility of continuing his march directly on to Newport News, which place he reached on the morning of the 18th of August, having marched his corps sixty miles in the short period of three days and one night, halting one day at the crossing of the Chickahominy.

The embarkation of this corps commenced as soon as transports were ready, and on the 20th it had all sailed for Acquia Creek. I made the following report from Barrett s Ferry:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
Barrett's Ferry, Chickahominy,
August 17, 1862, 11 A. M.

Everything is removed from our camp at Harrison's Bar—no property nor men left behind. The Fifth Corps is at Williamsburg, with all its wagons and the reserve artillery. The Third Corps is on the march from Jones's Bridge to Williamsburg, via Diascund Bridge, and has probably passed the latter before this hour. Averell's cavalry watches everything in that direction.

The mass of the wagons have passed the pontoon bridge here, and are parked on the other side. Peck's wagons are now crossing; his division will soon be over. Headquarters wagons follow Peck's. I hope to have everything over to-night, and the bridge removed by daylight. May be delayed beyond that time. Came here to see Burnside; otherwise should have remained with the rear-guard. Thus far all is quiet, and not a shot fired that I know of since we began the march. I shall not feel entirely secure until I have the whole army beyond the Chickahominy. I will then begin to forward troops by water as fast as transportation permits. G. B McC., Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

Maj.-Gen. W. H. H., Comd'g U. S. A., Washington, D. C.

On the 18th and 19th our march was continued to Williamsburg and Yorktown, and on the 20th the remainder of the army was ready to embark at Yorktown, Fort Monroe, and Newport News. The movement of the main body of the army on this march was covered by Gen. Pleasonton, with his cavalry and horse-artillery. That officer remained at Haxall's until the army had passed Charles City Court House, when he gradually fell back, picking up the stragglers as he proceeded, and crossed the bridge over the Chickahominy after the main body had marched towards Williamsburg. His troops were the last to cross the bridge, and he deserves great credit for the manner in which he performed his duty. Gen. Averell did a similar service in the same satisfactory way, in covering the march of the 3d Corps.

As the campaign on the Peninsula terminated here, I cannot close this part of my report without giving an expression of my sincere thanks and gratitude to the officers and men I had the honor to command.

From the commencement to the termination of this most arduous campaign, the army of the Potomac always evinced the most perfect subordination, zeal and alacrity in the performance of all the duties required of it.

The amount of severe labor accomplished by this army in the construction of intrenchments, roads, bridges, &c., was enormous; yet all the work was performed with the most gratifying cheerfulness and devotion to the interests of the service.

During the campaign ten severely contested and sanguinary battles had been fought, besides numerous small engagements, in which the troops exhibited the most determined enthusiasm a bravery. They submitted to exposure, sickne and even death without a murmur. Indeed th had become veterans in their country's cau and richly deserved the warm commendation the government.

It was in view of these facts that this seem to me an appropriate occasion for the general-chief to give, in general orders, some apprec tive expression of the services of the army wh upon the Peninsula. Accordingly, on the 18th sent him the following dispatch:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Augu 18, 1862, 11 P.M.—Please say a kind word to t army, that I can repeat to them in general orde in regard to their conduct at Yorktown, W liamsburg, West Point, Hanover Court Hou and on the Chickahominy, as well as in regard the seven days, and the recent retreat.

No one has ever said anything to cheer the but myself. Say nothing about me, merely gi my men and officers credit for what they ha done. It will do you much good, and strengthe you much with them if you issue a handson order to them in regard to what they have a complished. They deserve it.

G. B. McC., Major-Gen.

Major-Gen. H., Comd'g. U. S. Army,
Washington, D. C.

As no reply was received to this communic tion, and no order was issued by the general-i chief, I conclude that my suggestion did n meet with his approbation.

All the personnel and material of the army ha been transferred from Harrison's Landing to th different points of embarkation in the very bri period of five days, without the slightest loss damage. Porter's Corps sailed from Newpo News on the 19th and 20th; Heintzelman's corp sailed from Yorktown on the 21st. On that da I received the following telegram from the gen ral-in-chief:

Washington, Aug. 21, 1862, 6 P.M.

Gen. McC.:—Leave such garrisons in For Monroe, Yorktown, &c., as you may deem pro per. They will be replaced by new troops as soo as possible. The forces of Burnside and Pope ar hard pushed, and require aid as rapidly as yo can send it. Come yourself as soon as you can By all means see that the troops sent have plenty of ammunition. We have no time here to supply them. oreover they Mmay have to fight as soo as they land. H. W. H., M.-Gen Com.

To which the following are replies:

Headq's, Army of the Potomac, Fort Monroe
August 21, 1862, 7.30 P.M.

Your dispatch of 6 P.M. received. I have no lost an hour in sending troops, nor will I. Frank lin is here, and I will try to get some of his troops on board to-night. I had already ordered all the ammunition forward. I will put headquarters on board ship early to-morrow morning, so that I can leave at a moment's notice. I hope that I can get off to-morrow. Shall I go in person to Acquia, or do you wish to see me first in Washington? If you wish it, I can probably ship quite an amount of ammunition for other troops than this army.

G B. McC. to Maj -Gen. H., Washington.

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Fort Monroe, Aug. 21, 1862, 10.25 P.M.

I have ample supplies of ammunition for infantry and artillery, and will have it up in time. I can supply any deficieneies that may exist in General Pope's army. Quite a number of rifled field guns are on hand here. The forage is the only question for you to attend to. Please have vessels ready for me at Acquia. I want many more contraband for cavalry horses. They should have forage on board when they come here.

If you have leisure, and there is no objection, please communicate to me fully the state of affairs and your plans. I will then be enabled to arrange my plans understandingly.

G. B. McC. to Maj.-Gen. H., Washington.

Immediately on reaching Fort Monroe, I gave directions for strengthening the defenses of Yorktown, to resist an attack from the direction of Richmond, and left Gen. Keyes, with his corps, to perform the work, and temporarily garrison Yorktown. I telegraphed as follows on the 22d:

Headq's, Army of the Potomac, Fort Monroe, Aug. 22, 1862, 2.15 P.M.

Your dispatch of to-day received. Franklin's corps commencing disembarking as rapidly as possible. Sumner's corps is at Newport News, ready to embark as soon as transportation arrives. Keyes is still at Yorktown, putting it in a proper state of defense. I think that all of Franklin's corps will get off to-day, and hope to commence with Sumner to-morrow. I shall then push off the cavalry and artillery horses.

G. B. McC. to Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., Wash'n.

Headq's, Army of the Potomac, Fort Monroe, Aug. 22, 1862, 3.40 P.M.

Two good ordnance sergeants are needed immediately at Yorktown and Gloucester. The new defenses are arranged and commenced. I recommend that 5,000 new troops be sent immediately to garrison York and Gloucester. They should be commanded by an experienced general-officer, who can discipline and instruct them. About 90 should be artillery. I recommend that a new regiment, whose colonel is an artillery officer, or graduate, be designated as heavy artillery, and sent there. A similar regiment is absolutely necessary here.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., Com. U. S. A.

On the 23d Franklin's corps sailed. I reported this in the following despatch:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Fort Monroe, Aug. 23, 1862. 1.30 P. M.

Franklin's corps has started. I shall start for Acquia in about half an hour. No transports yet for Sumner's corps.

G. B. McC. Maj-Gen. Maj-Gen. H. W. H., Comd'g U. S. Army.

THE CAMPAIGN OF GENERAL POPE.

On that evening I sailed with my staff for Acquia Creek, where I arrived at daylight on the following morning, reporting as follows:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Acquia Creek, Aug. 24, 1861.

I have reached here, and respectfully report for orders,

G. B. McC. Maj-Gen. Maj-Gen. H. Comd'g U. S. Army.

I also telegraphed as follows:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Acquia Creek, August 24, 1862. 2 P. M.

Your telegram received. Morell's scouts report Rappahannock Station burned and abandoned by Pope, without any notice to Morell or Sykes: This was telegraphed you some hours ago. Reynolds, Reno, and Stevens, are supposed to be with Pope, as nothing can be heard of them to-day. Morell and Sykes are near Morrisville Post Office, watching the lower fords of Rappahannock, with no troops between them and Rappahannock Station, which is reported abandoned by Pope. Please inform me immediately exactly where Pope is, and what doing; until I know that, I cannot regulate Porter's movements; he is much exposed now, and decided measures should be taken at once. Until I know what my command and position are to be, and whether you still intend to place me in the command indicated in your first letter to me, and orally through Gen, Burnside at the Chickahominy, I cannot decide where I can be of most use. If your determination is unchanged, I ought to go to Alexandria at once. Please define my position and duties.

G. B. McC. Maj-Gen. to Maj-Gen. H. W. H., comd'g U. S. Army.

To which I received the following reply:

Washington, Aug. 24, 1862.

Maj-Gen. McC.—You ask me for information which I cannot give. I do not know either where General Pope is, or where the enemy in force is. These are matters which I have been all day most anxious to ascertain.

H. W. H., General-in-chief.

On the 26th, I received the following:

Washington, Aug. 26th, 1862. 11 A. M.

Maj-Gen. G. B. McC.—There is reason to believe that the enemy is moving a large force into the Shenandoah Valley. Reconnoissances will soon determine. Gen. Heintzelman's corps was ordered to report to Gen. Pope, and Kearney's will probably be sent to-day against the enemy's flank. Don't draw any troops down the Rappahannock at present. We shall probably want them all in the direction of the Shenandoah. Perhaps you had better leave Gen. Burnside in charge at Acquia Creek, and come to Alexandria, as very great irregularities are reported there Gen. Franklin's corps will march as soon as it receives transportation.

H. W. H., General-in-Chief.

On receipt of this I immediately sailed for Alexandria, and reported as follows:

Alexandria, August 27, 1862, 8 A.M.—I arrived here last night, and have taken measures to ascertain the state of affairs here, and that proper remedies may be applied. Just received a rumor that railway bridge over Bull Run was burnt last night. G. B. McC. Major-Gen

Major-Gen. H., Comd'g U. S. A.

Alexandria, August 27, 1862, 9.40 A.M.—The town is quiet, although quite full of soldiers who are said to be chiefly convalescents. The affairs of the quartermaster's department are reported as going on well. It is said that the Bull Run bridge will be repaired by to-morrow. The disembarkation of Sumner's corps commenced at Acquia yesterday afternoon. I found that he could reach Rappahannock Station earlier that way than from here. G. B. McC. Maj.-Gen.

Major-Gen. H. W. H., Comd'g U. S. A.

On the same day I received the following:

Washington, August 27, 1862.

Major-Gen. McC.—Telegrams from General Porter to General Burnside just received, says that Banks is at Fayetteville. McDowell, Sigel, and Ricketts near Warrenton, Reno on his right. Porter is marching on Warrenton Junction to reinforce Pope. Nothing said of Heintzelman. Porter reports a general battle imminent. Franklin's corps should move out by forced marches, carrying three or four days' provisions, and to be supplied as far as possible by railroad. Perhaps you may prefer some other road than to Centreville. Colonel Haupt has just telegraphed about sending out troops, &c. Please see him and give him your directions. There has been some serious neglect to guard the railroad, which should be immediately remedied.

H. W. H., General-in-Chief.

I replied as follows:

Alexandria, August 27, 1862, 10.20 A.M.—Telegram this moment received. I have sent orders to Franklin to prepare to march with his corps at once, and to repair here in person to inform me as to his means of transportation. Kearney was yesterday at Rappahannock Station. Porter at Bealton, Kelly's Darnell's, &c. Sumner will commence reaching Falmouth to day. Williams's Massachusetts Cavalry will be mostly at Falmouth to-day. I loaned Burnside my personal escort, 1st squadron Fourth Regulars, to scout down Rappahannock. I have sent for Couch's division to come at once. As fast as I gain any information I will forward it, although you may already have it. G. B. McC., Major-Gen.

Major-Gen. H. W. H., Washington, D. C.

I also received the following telegrams:

Washington, August 27, 1862.

Major-Gen. McC.—Direct General Casey to furnish you about five thousand of the new troops under his command. Take entire direction of the sending out of the troops from Alexandria. Determine questions of priority in transportation, and the places they shall occupy. Pope's headquarters are near Warrenton Junction, but I can not ascertain the present position of his troops.

Washington, Aug. 27, 1862.

Maj.-Gen. Mc.C.:—I can get no satisfactory information from the front, either of the enemy or our troops. There seems to have been great neglect and carelessness about Manassas. Franklin's corps should march in that direction as soon as possible. A competent officer should be sent out to take direction of affairs in that vicinity.

H. W. H., Gen.-in-Chief.

Upon the receipt of these I immediately sent the following telegram to Generals Heintzelman and Porter:

Alexandria, Aug. 27, 1862.

G. B. McC., Maj.-G

M.-G. Heintz'n, Warrenton, M.-G. Porter, Beal

P. S. If these general officers are not a places named, nearest operator will please message forwarded.

I also telegraphed the General-in-Chief as laws:

Alexandria, Aug. 27, '62, 10.50 I

I have sent all the information I posses Burnside, instructing him to look out well fo right flank between the Rappahannock and I mac, and to send no trains to Porter withou escort. I fear the cavalry who dashed at Run last night may trouble Burnside a little have sent to communicate with Porter and H zelman via Falmouth, and hope to give you s definite information in a few hours. I shall the next cavalry I get hold of here, and sen out to keep open the communication betw Pope and Porter, also to watch vicinity of M assas. Please send me a number of copies of best maps of present field of operations. I use 50 to advantage.

G. B. McC. to Maj.-Gen. H., Com

Alexandria, Aug. 27, '62, 11.20 A.

In view of Burnside's dispatch, just recei would it not be advisable to throw the mass Sumner's corps here, to move out with Fran to Centreville or vicinity? If a decisive ba fought at Warrenton, a disaster would leave troops on lower Rappahannock in a danger position. They would do better service in fr of Washington.

G. B. McC. to M.-Gen. H., Washingtor

Alexandria, Aug. 27, '62, 12.5 P.M

My aid has just returned from Gen. Frankl camp. Reports that Gen's. Franklin, Smith, Slocum are all in Washington. He gave the der to next in rank to place the corps in readin to move at once. I learn that heavy firing been heard this morning at Centreville, and ha sent to ascertain the truth. I can find no cava to send out on the roads. Are the works g risoned and ready for defense?

G. B. McC. to M.-Gen. H., Washington

Alexandria, August 27, 1862, 12.20 P. M.

What bridges exist over Bull Run? Ha steps been taken to construct bridges for the a vance of troops to reinforce Pope, or to enal him to retreat if in trouble? There should two gun-boats at Acquia Creek at once. Shall push the rest of Sumner's corps here, or is Po so strong as to be reasonably certain of succes I have sent to inspect the works near here, a their garrisons. As soon as I can find Gen. C sey, or some other commanding officer, I w see to the railway, etc. It would be well to ha them report to me, as I do not know where the are. I am trying to find them, and will lose t time in carrying out your orders. Would like t see Burnside. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen.

Maj.-Gen. W. H., Washington.

Alexandria, August 27, 1862, 1.15 P. M.

Alexandria, August 27, 1862, 2.30 P. M.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., Comd'g U. S. A.:—I have received the copy of a dispatch from Gen. e to you, dated 10 A. M. this morning, in which says: "All forces now sent forward should be to my right at Gainsville."

now have at my disposal here about ten thousand men of Franklin's corps, about twenty- ht hundred of Gen. Tyler's brigade and Col. er's 1st Connecticut artillery, which I recom- nd should be held in hand for the defense of Washington. If you wish me to order any part this force to the front, it is in readiness to ch at a moment's notice to any point you may icate.

In view of the existing state of things in our front, I have deemed it best to order Gen. Casey to hold his men for Yorktown in readiness to move: but not to send them off till further orders. G. B. McC., Maj-Gen.

On the 28th I telegraphed as follows:

Headquarters, Camp near Alexandria, Aug. 28, 1862. 4.10 P. M.

Gen. Franklin is with me here. I will know in a few minutes the condition of artillery and cavalry. We are not yet in condition to move, may be by to-morrow morning. Pope must cut through to-day, or adopt the plan I suggested. I have ordered troops to garrison the works at Upton's Hill. They must be held at any cost. As soon as I can see the way to spare them, I will send a corps of good troops there. It is the key to Washington, which cannot be seriously menaced as long as it is held.

G. B. McC. to Maj-Gen. H., Washington, D. C.

I received the following from the general-in chief.

Washington, Aug. 28, 1862.

Maj.-Gen. McC.—I think you had better place Snmner's corps, as it arrives, near the guns, and particularly at the Chain Bridge. The principal thing to be feared now is a cavalry raid into this city, especially in the night-time. Use Cox's and Tyler's brigade, and the new troops for the same object, if you need them. Porter writes to Burnside from Bristol, 9.30 A. M. yesterday, that Pope's forces were then moving on Manassas, and that Burnside would soon hear of them by way of Alexandria. Gen. Cullum has gone to Harper's Ferry, and I have only a single regular officer for duty in the office. Please send some of your officers to-day to see that every precaution is taken at the forts against a raid; also at the bridge. Please answer. H. W. H., General in Chief.

On the 29th the following dispatch was telegraphed:

Camp near Alexandria, Aug. 29, 1862. 10.20 A. M.—Franklin's corps is in motion. Started about 6 A. M. I can give him but two squadrons of cavalry. I propose moving Gen. Cox to Upton's Hill, to hold that important point, with its works, and to push cavalry scouts to Vienna via Freedom Hill and Hunter's Lane. Cox has two squadrons cavalry. Please answer at once whether this meets your approval. I have directed Woodbury, with the engineer brigade to hold Fort Lyon. Sumner detached last night two regiments to vicinity of Forts "Ethan Allen" and "Marcy." Meagher's brigade is still at Acquia. If he moves in support of Franklin, it leaves us without any reliable troops in and near Washington, yet Franklin is too weak alone. What shall be done? No more cavalry arrived have but three squadrons. Franklin has but forty rounds of ammunition, and no wagons to move more. I do not think Franklin is in condition to accomplish much if he meets with serious resistance.

I should not have moved him but for your pressing order of last night. What have you from Vienna and Drainesville?

Geo. B. McC. to Maj-Gen. H., Washington.

To which the following is a reply:

Washington, August 29, 1862, 12 M.

Major-Gen. McC.—Upton's Hill arrangement is all right. We must send wagons and ammunition to Franklin as fast as they arrive. Meagher's brigade ordered up yesterday. Fitzhugh Lee was, it is said on good authority, in Alexandria on Sunday last for three hours. I have nothing from Drainesville. H. W. H., Gen.-in Chief.

On the same day the following was received from his Excellency the President:

Washington, August 29, 1862, 2.30 P.M.

Maj.-Gen. McC.—What news from direction of Manassas Junction? What, generally? A. L.

To which I replied as follows:

Camp near Alexandria, August 29, 1862, 2.45 P.M.—The last news I received from the direction of Manassas was from stragglers. to the effect that the enemy were evacuating Centreville and retiring towards Thoro'fare Gap. This by no means reliable. I am clear that one of two courses should be adopted: 1st. To concentrate all our available forces to open communication with Pope. 2d. To leave Pope to get out of his scrape, and at once use all our means to make the capital perfectly safe. No middle ground will now answer.

Tell me what you wish me to do and I will do all in my power to accomplish it. I wish to know what my orders and authority are. I ask for nothing, but will obey whatever orders you give. I only ask a prompt decision, that I may at once give the necessary orders. It will not do to delay any longer. G. B. McC. Maj.-Gen.

A. L., President.

and copy to Gen. Halleck.

To which the following is a reply:

Washington. August 29, 1862, 4.10 P.M.

Major-Gen. McC.—Yours of to-day just received. I think your first alternative, to wit: "To concentrate all our available forces to open communication with Pope," is the right one, but I wish not to control. That I now leave to Gen. Halleck, aided by your counsels. A. L.

It had been officially reported to me from Washington, that the enemy in strong force was moving through Vienna, in the direction of the Chain Bridge, and had a large force at Vienna. This report, in connection with the dispatch of the general-in-chief on the 28th, before noted, induced me to direct Franklin to halt his command near Annadale, until it could be determined by reconnoissances to Vienna and towards Manassas, whether these reports were true. General Cox was ordered to send his small cavalry force from Upton's Hill towards Vienna and Drainesville in one direction, and towards Fairfax Court House in the other, and Franklin to push his two squadrons towards Lewinsville, it would have been very injudicious to have pushed Franklin's small force beyond Annadale. It must be remembered that at this time we were cut off from direct communication with General Pope; that the enemy was, by the last accounts, at Manassas in strong force; and that Franklin had only from 10,000 to 11,00 men, with an entirely insufficient force of cavalry and artillery.

In order to represent this condition of affairs in its proper light to the general-in-chief, and to obtain definite instructions from him, I telegra ed as follows:

Camp near Alexandria, August 29, 1862, 1 —Have ordered most of the 12th Pennsylva Cavalry to report to General Barnard for scou duty towards Rockville, Poolesville, etc. If apprehend a raid of cavalry on your side of river, I had better send a brigade or two of S ner's to near Tenallytown, where, with two three old regiments in Forts Allen and Ma they can watch Chain Bridge and Tenallyto Would it meet your views to post rest of S ner's corps between Arlington and Fort Co ran, whence they can either support Cox, Fra lin, or Chain Bridge, and even Tenallytov Franklin has only between 10,000 and 11,00 duty. How far do you wish this force to vance? G. B. McC

Major-Gen. H., Washington.

Camp near Alexandria, Aug. 29, 1862, 1 P.M

I anxiously await reply to my last dispatch regard to Sumner. Wish to give the order once. Please authorize me to attach new r ments permanently to my old brigades. I can much good to new and old troops in that way. shall endeavor to hold a line in advance of Fo Allen and Marcy, at least with strong advan guards. I wish to hold the line through Prosp Hill, Mackall's, Minor's, and Hall's Hills. T will give us timely warning. Shall I do as see best to me with all the troops in the vicinity, cluding Franklin, who, I really think, ought r under present circumstances, to advance beye Annandale? G. B. McC. to Gen. H

On the same day I received a dispatch fr the general-in-chief, in which he asks me wh halted Franklin at Annandale, to which I repli as follows:

Camp near Alexandria, Aug. 29, 1862, 8 P.M.

By referring to my telegrams of 10.30 A.M., M., and 1 P.M., together with your reply of 2 P.M., you will see why Franklin's corps halted Annandale. His small cavalry force—all I had give him—was ordered to push on as far as p sible towards Manassas. It was not safe t Franklin to move beyond Annandale under t circumstances, until we knew what was at Vien Gen. Franklin remained here until about 1 P. endeavoring to arrange for supplies for his co mand. I am responsible for both these circu stances, and do not see that either was in d obedience to your orders. Please give distin orders in reference to Franklin's movements t morrow. I have sent to Col. Haupt to push o construction and supply trains as soon as pc sible. General Tyler to furnish the necessa guards. I have directed Gen. Banks's supp trains to start out to-night at least as far as A nandale, with an escort from Gen. Tyler. In r gard to to-morrow's movements, I desire defini instructions, as it is not agreeable to me to be a cused of disobeying orders, when I have simp exercised the discretion you committed to me.

G. B. McC. to M-Gen. H., Wash'n., D. C.

On the same evening I sent the following di patches:

Camp near Alexandria, Aug. 29, '62, 10 P.M.

Not hearing from you, I have sent orders

Ge Franklin to place himself in communication wit Gen. Pope as soon as possible, and at the sam time cover the transit of Pope's supplies. Orders have been given for railway and wagon trans to move to Pope, with least possible delay. I a having inspections made of all the forts and city by members of my staff, with instructio to give all requisite orders. I inspected Wch and Ward myself this evening; found the in good order. Reports, so far as heard fro, are favorable as to condition of works.

G. B. McC. to Maj.-Gen. H., Washington.

Camp near Alexandria, Aug. 29, 1862, 10 P. M.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., General-in-Chief U. S. A., Washington, D. C.:—Your dispatch received. Franklin's corps has been ordered to march at 6 o'clock to-morrow morning. Sumner has about fourteen thousand infantry, without cavalry or artillery, here. Cox's brigade of four regiments here, with two batteries of artillery. Men of seven regiments, much fatigued, came in to-day. Morgan's brigade of three new regiments, but little armed, is also here. All these troops will be ordered to hold themselves ready to march to-morrow morning, and all, except Franklin's, to await further orders. If you wish any of them to move towards Manassas, please inform me.

Col. Wagner, 2d New York artillery, has just come in from the front. He reports strong infantry and cavalry force of rebels near Fairfax Court House; reports rumors, from various sources, that Lee and Stuart, with large forces, are at Manassas. That the enemy with one hundred and twenty thousand men, intend advancing on the forts near Arlington and Chain Bridge, with a view of attacking Washington and Baltimore. Gen. Barnard telegraphs me to-night that the length of the line of fortifications on this side the Potomac, requires two thousand additional artillery men, and additional troops to defend inlets, according to circumstances. At all events, he says an old regiment should be added to the force at Chain Bridge, and a few regiments distributed along the lines, to give confidence to the new troops. I agree with him fully, and think our fortifications along the upper part of the line, on this side the river, very unsafe with their present garrisons, and the movements of the enemy seem to indicate attack upon those works.

G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen.

Camp near Alexandria, Aug. 30, 1862, 11.30 A. M.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., General-in-Chief:—Your telegram of 9 A. M. received. Ever since Gen. Franklin received notice that he was to march from Alexandria, he has been endeavoring to get transportation from the quartermaster at Alexandria, but he has uniformly been told that there was none disposable, and his command marched without wagons. After the departure of his troops, he procured twenty wagons to carry some extra ammunition, by unloading Banks's supply train. Gen. Sumner endeavored, by application on the quartermaster's department, to get wagons to carry his reserve ammunition, but without success, and was obliged to march with what could carry in his cartridge-boxes. I have this morning directed that all my headquarters wagons that are landed, be at once loaded with ammunition for Sumner and Franklin, but they will not go far towards supplying the deficiency.

Eighty-five wagons were got together by the quartermasters last night, loaded with subsistence, and sent forward at 1 a. m., with an escort, via Annandale. Every effort has been made to carry out your orders promptly. The great difficulty seems to consist in the fact, that the greater part of the transportation on hand at Alexandria and Washington, has been needed for current supplies at the garrisons. Such is the state of the case, as represented to me by the quartermasters, and it appears to be true. I take it for granted that this has not been properly explained to you. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen.

On the morning of the 30th, heavy artillery firing was heard in the direction of Fairfax Court House, which I reported to the general-in-chief. At 11 a. m. the following telegram was sent:

Camp near Alexadria, Aug. 30, 1862, 11 A. M.

Have ordered Sumner to leave one brigade in vicinity of Chain Bridge, and to move the rest via Columbia pike on Annandale and Fairfax Court House. Is this the route you wish them to take? He and Franklin are both instructed to join Pope as promptly as possible. Shall Couch move out also when he arrives? G. B. Mc., Maj.-Gen.

Maj.-Gen. H., Washington.

On the same day I received the following:

Washington, Aug. 30, 1862, 1.45 A. M.

Maj-Gen. McC,—Ammunition, and particularly for artillery, must be immediately sent forward to Centreville for Gen. Pope. It must be done with all possible dispatch.

H. W. H., General in Chief.

To which the following reply was made:

Camp near Alexandria, Aug 30, 1662. 2.10 P M.

I know nothing of the calibres of Pope's artillery. All I can do is to direct my ordnance officer, to load up all the wagons sent to him. I have already sent all my headquarters wagons. You will have to see that wagons are sent from Washington. I can do nothing more than give the order that every available wagon in Alexandria shall be loaded at once. The order to the brigade of Sumner that I directed to remain near Chain Bridge and Tenallytown should go from your headquarters, to save time. I understand you to intend it also to move. I have no sharpshooters except the guard around my camp. I have sent off every man but those, and will now send them with the train as you direct. I will also send my only remaining squadron of cavalry with Gen. Sumner. I can do no more. You now have every man of the army of the Potomac who is within my reach.

G. B. McC. to Maj.Gen. H. W. H.

At 10.30 P. M. the following telegram was sent:

Camp near Alexandria, Aug. 30, 1862. 10.30 P. M.—I have sent to the front all my troops, with the exception of Couch's division, and have given the orders necessary to insure its being disposed of as you directed. I hourly expect the return of one of my aides, who will give authentic news from the field of battle.

I cannot express to you the pain and mortification I have experienced to-day in listening to the distant sound of the firing of my men. As I can be of no further use here, I respectfully ask that if there is a probability of the conflict being renewed to-morrow, I may be permitted to go to the scene of battle with my staff merely to be with my own men; they will fight none the worse for my being with them. If it is not deemed best to intrust me with the command even of my own army, I simply ask to be permitted to share their fate on the field of battle. Please reply to this to-night.

I have been engaged for the last few hours in doing what I can to make arrangements tor the wounded. I have started out all the ambulances now landed.

As I have sent my escort to the front, I would be glad to take some or Gregg's cavalry with me if allowed to go.

G. B. McC. to Maj-Gen. H. W. H. Comd'g U. S. A., Washington, D. C.

To which on the following day I received this answer:

Washington, Aug. 31, 1862. 9,18 A. M.

Maj-Gen. McC.—I have just seen your telegram of 11.5 last night. The substance was stated to me when received, but I did not know that you asked for a reply immediately, I cannot answer without seeing the President, as General Pope is in command, by his orders, of the department.

I think Couch's division should go forward as rapidly as possible, and find the battle-field.

H. W. H., General in Chief.

On the same day the following was received:

Washington Aug. 31, 1862. 12.45 P. M.

Maj-Gen. McC.—The subsistence department are making Fairfax Station their principal depot. It should be well guarded. The officer in charge should be directed to secure the depot by abattis against cavalry. As many as possible of the new regiments should be prepared to take the field. Perhaps some more should be sent in the vicinity of Chain Bridge.

H. W. H., General in Chief.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC REMOVED FROM GEN. McCLELLAN'S COMMAND.

At 2.30 P.M. the following dispatch was telegraphed.

Camp near Alexandria, Aug. 31, 1862, 2.30 P.M. —Major Haller is at Fairfax Station, with my provost and headquarters guard and other troops. I have requested four more companies to be sent at once, and the precautions you direct to be taken.

I have no control over the new regiments; do not know where they are or anything about them, except those near here. Their commanding officers and those of the works are not under me. Where I have seen evils existing under my own eye I have corrected them. I think it is the business of General Casey to prepare the new regiments for the field, and a matter between him and General Barnard to order others to vicinity of Chain Bridge. Neither of them is under my command, and by the War Department order I have no right to give them orders.

Gen. H., Washington. G. B. McC.

To which the following is an answer:

Washington, August 31, 1862, 10.7 P.M.

Major-Gen. McC.—Since receiving your dispatch, relating to command, I have not been to answer any not of absolute necessity. I not seen the order as published, but will to you in the morning. You will retain the mand of everything in this vicinity not temp rily to be Pope's army in the field.

I beg of you to assist me in this crisis your ability and experience. I am entirely t out. H. W. H., Gen.-in-Chie

The order referred to in the preceding patches was as follows:

War Department, August 30, 1862.—The lowing are the commanders of the armies ope ing in Virginia:

General Burnside commands his own co except those that have been temporarily detac and assigned to General Pope.

General McClellan commands that portion the Army of the Potomac that has not been s forward to Gen. Pope's command.

General Pope commands the Army of Virgi and all the forces temporarily attached to it.

All the forces are under command of Ma Gen. Halleck, General-in-Chief.

I was informed by Col. Townsend that a oove was published by order of the Secret of War.

At 11.30 P.M I telegraphed the following:

FOURTH PERIOD.

n the 1st of September I went into Washing- where I had an interview with the general- hief, who instructed me verbally to take mand of its defences, expressly limiting my sdiction to the works and their garrisons, and hibiting me from exercising any control over troops actively engaged in front under Gen. e. During this interview, I suggested to the eral-in-chief the necessity of his going in son, or sending one of his personal staff, to army under Gen. Pope, for the purpose of ertaining the exact condition of affairs. He t Col. Kelton, his assistant adjutant-general.

During the afternoon of the same day, I re- ved a message from the general-in-chief, to effect that he desired me to go at once to his se to see the President The President in- med me that he had reason to believe that the y of the Potomac was not cheerfully co-ope- rating with and supporting Gen. Pope, that he had "always been a friend of mine," and now asked me, as a special favor, to use my influence in correcting this state of things. I replied, substantially, that I was confident that he was misinformed, that I was sure, whatever sentiment the army of the Potomac might entertain towards Gen. Pope, that they would obey his orders, support him to the fullest extent, and do their whole duty. The President, who was much moved, again asked me to telegraph to "Fitz John Porter or some other of my friends," and try to do away with any feeling that might exist, adding that I could rectify the evil, and that no one else could. I thereupon told him that I would cheerfully telegraph to Gen. Porter, or do anything else in my power, to gratify his wishes and relieve his anxiety, upon which he thanked me very warmly, assured me that he could never forget my action in the matter, etc., and left.

I then wrote the following telegram to Gen. Porter, which was sent to him by the general-in-chief:

Washington, Sept. 1, 1862.

Maj.-Gen. Porter:—I ask of you for my sake, and that of the country, and the old army of the Potomac, that you and all my friends, will lend the fullest and most cordial co-operation to Gen. Pope, in all the operations now going on. The destinies of our country, the honor of our army, are at stake, and all depends now upon the cheerful co-operation of all in the field. This week is the crisis of our fate. Say the same thing to my friends in the army of the Potomac, and that the last request I have to make of them is, that for their country's sake they will extend to Gen. Pope the same support they ever have to me.

I am in charge of the defenses of Washington, and am doing all I can to render your retreat safe, should that become necessary. G. B. McC.

To which he sent the following reply:

Fairfax Court House, 10 A. M., Sept. 3, 1862.

"You may rest assured that all your friends, as well as every lover of his country, will ever give, as they have given, to Gen. Pope their cordial co-operation and constant support, in the execution of all orders and plans. Our killed, wounded, and enfeebled troops attest our devoted duty." F. J. Porter, Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

Gen. G. B. McC., Washington.

Neither at the time I wrote the telegram, nor at any other time, did I think for one moment that Gen. Porter had been, or would be in any manner, derelict in the performance of his duty to the nation and its cause. Such an impression never entered my mind. The dispatch in question was written purely at the request of the President.

On the morning of the 2d, the President and Gen. Halleck came to my house, when the President informed me that Colonel Kelton had returned from the front; that our affairs were in bad condition; that the army was in full retreat upon the defenses of Washington; the roads filled with stragglers, &c. He instruoted me to take steps at once to stop and collect the stragglers, to place the works in a proper state of defense, and to go out to meet and take command of the army when it approached the victnity of the works; then to put the troops in the best position for defense; committing everything to my hands.*

I immediately took steps to carry out these orders, and I sent an aide to General Pope with the following letter:

Headquarters, Washington, Sept 2, 1862.
Maj.-Gen. J. Pope, Com'g. A. V.:

General,—Gen. Halleck instructed me to repeat to you the order he sent this morning to Washington without unnecessary delay. He feared that his messenger might miss you, and desired to take this double precaution.

In order to bring troops upon ground with which they are already familiar, it would be best to move Porter's corps upon Upton's Hill, that it may occupy Hall's Hill, etc.; McDowell's to Upton's Hill; Franklin's to the works in front of Alexandria; Heintzelman's to the same vicinity; Couch to Fort Corcoran, or, if practicable, to the Chain Bridge; Sumner either to Fort Albany or to Alexandria, as may be most convenient.

In haste, General, very truly yours,

G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. U. S. A.

In the afternoon I crossed the Potomac and rode to the front, and at Upton's Hill met the advance of McDowell's corps, and with it Generals Pope and McDowell. After getting what information I could from them, I sent the few aids at my disposal to the left, to give instructions to the troops approaching in the direction of Alexandria; and hearing artillery firing in the direction of the Vienna and Langley road, by which the corps of Sumner, Porter and Sigel were returning, and learning from Gen. Pope that Sumner was probably engaged, I went with a singe aide and three orderlies by the shortest line to meet that column. I reached the column after dark, and proceeded as far as Lewinsville, where I became satisfied that the rear corps (Sumner's) would be able to reach its intended position without any serious molestation. I therefore indicated to Generals Porter and Sigel the positions they were to occupy, sent instructions to Gen. Sumner, and at a late hour of the night returned to Washington.

Next day I rode to the front of Alexandria, and was engaged in rectifying the positions of the troops, and giving orders necessary to secure the issuing of the necessary supplies, etc. I felt sure on this day that we could repulse any attack made by the enemy on the south side of the Potomac.

THE MARYLAND CAMPAIGN.

On the 3d the enemy had disappeared from the front of Washington, and the information which I received induced me to believe that he intended to cross the upper Potomac into Maryland. This materially changed the aspect of affairs and enlarged the sphere of operations, for a crossing in force, an active campaign would necessary to cover Baltimore, prevent the i sion of Pennsylvania, and clear Maryland.

I therefore on the 3d ordered the 2d and Corps to Tennallytown, and the 9th Corps point on the 7th Street Road near Washing and sent such cavalry as was available to fords near Poolesville, to watch and impede enemy in any attempt to cross in that vicinit

On the 5th the 2d and 12th Corps were mc to Rockville, and Couch's division (the only of the 4th Corps that had been brought from Peninsula) to Offut's Cross Roads.

On the 6th the 1st and 9th Corps were ord to Leesboro, the 6th Corps and Syke's divisic the 5th Corps to Tennallytown.

On the 7th the 6th Corps was advance Rockville, to which place my headquarters v moved on the same day.

All the necessary arrangements for the defe of the city, under the new condition of thi had been made, and General Banks was lef command, having received his instructions f me.

I left Washington on the 7th of Septem At this time it was known that the mass of rebel army had passed up to the south side the Potomac in the direction of Leesburg, and that a portion of that army had crossed Maryland; but whether it was their intentio cross their whole force, with a view to Washington by a flank movement down the n bank of the Potomac, to move on Baltimore to invade Pennsylvania, were questions wl at that time we had no means of determin This uncertainty as to the intentions of the en obliged me, up to the 13th of September, to ma cautiously, and to advance the army in s order as to continually keep Washington Baltimore covered, and at the same time to l the troops well in hand, so as to be able to centrate and follow rapidly if the enemy t the direction of Pennsylvania, or to return to defence of Washington, if, as was greatly fea by the authorities, the enemy should be mei making a feint with a small force to draw off army, while with their main forces they st ready to seize the first favorable opportunity attack the capital.

In the meantime the process of reorganiza rendered necessary after the demoralizing eff of the disastrous campaign upon the other s of the Potomac, was rapidly progressing, troops were regaining confidence, and their mer soldierly appearance and discipline was returning. My cavalry was pushed out conti ally in all directions, and all possible steps ta to learn the positions and movements of enemy.

under the command of General Sumner, moved on Frederick; the former via Clarksburg and Urbana, and the 12th Corps on a lateral road between Urbana and New Market, thus maintaining the communication with the right wing, and covering the direct road from Frederick to Washington.

The 6th Corps under the command of General Franklin, moved to Buckeystown via Darnestown, Dawsonville, and Barnville, covering the road from the mouth of the Monocacy to Rockville, and being in a position to connect with and support the centre should it have been necessary (as supposed) to force the line of the Monocacy. Couch's division moved by the "River Road," covering that approach, watching the fords of the Potomac, and ultimately following and supporting the 6th Corps.

The following extracts from telegrams received by me after my departure from Washington will show how little was known there about the enemy's movements, and the fears which were entertained for the safety of the capital.

"On the 9th of September, General Halleck telegraphed me as follows:

"Until we can get better advices about the numbers of the enemy at Drainsville, I think we must be very cautious about stripping too much our forces on the Virginia side. It may be the enemy's object to draw off the mass of our forces, and then attempt to attack from the Virginia side of the Potomac. Think of this."

"Again on the 11th of Sept., Gen. Halleck telegraphed me as follows:

"Why not order forward Keyes or Sigel? I think the main force of the enemy is in your front; more troops can be spared from here."

"This dispatch, as published by the Committee on the Conduct of the War, and furnished by the General-in-chief, reads as follows: "Why not order forward Porter's or Sigel's? If the main force of the enemy is in your front, more troops can be spared from here."

I remark that the original dispatch as received by me from the telegraph operator, is in the words quoted above: "I think the main force of the enemy, &c."

"In accordance with this suggestion, I asked, on the same day, that all the troops that could be spared should at once be sent to reinforce me; but none came.

"On the the 12th I received the following telegram from his Excellency the President:

"'Governor Curtin telegraphs me: 'I have advices that Jackson is crossing the Potomac at Williamsport, and probably the whole rebel army will be drawn from Maryland.'" The President adds: "Receiving nothing from Harper's Ferry or Martinsburg to-day, and positive information from Wheeling, that the line is cut, corroborates the idea that the enemy is recrossing the Potomac. Please do not let him get off without being hurt."

"On the 13th Gen. Halleck telegraphed as follows;

"Until you know more certainly the enemy's force south of the Potomac, you are wrong in thus uncovering the capital. I am of the opinion that the enemy will send a small column towards Pennsylvania to draw your forces in that direction, then suddenly move on Washington with the forces south of the Potomac, and those he may cross over."

Again, on the 14th, Gen. Halleck telegraphed me that "scouts report a large force still on the Virginia side of the Potomac. If so, I fear you are exposing your left and rear."

Again, as late as the 16th, after we had the most positive evidence that Lee's army was in front of us, I received the following:

War Department, Sept. 16, 1862, 12.30 P. M.

Maj.-Gen. McC.:—Yours of 7 a. m. is this moment received. As you give me no information in regard to the position of your forces, except those at Sharpsburg, of course I cannot advise. I think, however, you will find that the whole force of the enemy in your front has crossed the river. I fear now more than ever that they will recross at Harper's Ferry or below, and turn your left, thus cutting you off from Washington. This has appeared to me to be a part of their plan, and hence my anxiety on the subject. A heavy rain might prevent it. H. W. H., General-in-Chief.

The importance of moving with all due caution, so as not to uncover the national capital, until the enemy's position and plans were developed, was, I believe, fully appreciated by me; and as my troops extended from the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to the Potomac, with the extreme left flank moving along that stream, and with strong pickets left in rear to watch and guard all the available fords, I did not regard my left or rear as in any degree exposed. But it appears from the foregoing telegrams that the general-in-chief was of a different opinion, and that my movements were, in his judgment, too precipitate, not only for the safety of Washington, but also for the security of my left and rear.

The precise nature of these daily injunctions against a precipitate advance may now be perceived. The general-in-chief, in his testimony before the "Committee on the Conduct of the War," says: "In respect to Gen. McClellan's going too fast, or too far from Washington, there can be found no such telegram from me to him; he has mistaken the meaning of the telegrams I sent him. I telegraphed him that he was going too far, not from Washington, but from the Potomac, leaving Gen. Lee the opportunity to come down the Potomac and get between him and Washington. I thought Gen. McClellan should keep more on the Potomac, and press forward his left rather than his right, so as the more readily to relieve Harper's Ferry."

As I can find no telegram from the general-in-chief recommending me to keep my left flank nearer the Potomac, I am compelled to believe that when he gave this testimony he had forgotten the purport of the telegrams above quoted; and had also ceased to remember the fact, well known to him at the time, that my left. from the time I left Washington, always rested on the Potomac, and that my centre was continually in position to reinforce the left or right as occasion might require. Had I advanced my left flank along the Potomac more rapidly than the o columns marched upon the roads to the rig should have thrown that flank out of suppor distance of the other troops, and greatly exp it. And if I had marched the entire army in column along the banks of the river, instea upon five different parallel roads, the colu with its trains, would have extended about miles, and the enemy might have defeated advance before the rear could have reached scene of action. Moreover, such a moven would have uncovered the communications Baltimore and Washington on our right, and posed our left and rear.

I presume it will be admitted by every mil ry man that it was necessary to move the a in such order that it could at any time be c centrated for battle, and I am of opinion that object could not have been accomplished in other way than the one employed. Any ot disposition of our forces would have subjec them to defeat in detached fragments.

On the 10th of December, I received from scouts information which rendered it quite p bable that Gen. Lee's army was in the vicinity Frederick, b t whether his intention was to m towards Baltimore or Pennsylvania was not t known.

On the 11th I ordered Gen. Burnside to push strong reconnoissance across the National Ro and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad towa New Market, and if he learned that the ene had moved towards Hagerstown, to press rapidly to Frederick, keeping his troops consta ly ready to meet the enemy in force. A corr ponding movement of all the troops in the cen and on the left was ordered in the direction Urbana and Poolesville.

On the 12th a portion of the right wing enter Frederick, after a brisk skirmish at the outski of the city and in the streets. On the 13th t main bodies of the right wing and centre pass through Frederick.

It was soon ascertained that the main body the enemy's forces had marched out of the ci on the two previous days, taking the roads Boonsboro' and Harper's Ferry, thereby renderi it necessary to force the passes through the Cat tin and South Mountain ridges, and gain posse sion of Boonsboro' and Rohrersville before a relief could be extended to Col. Miles at Harpe Ferry.

On the 13th an order fell into my hands issu by Gen. Lee, which fully disclosed his plans, a I immediately gave orders for a rapid and vigo ous forward movement.

The following is a copy of the order referr to:

HARPER'S FERRY.

the report of a military commission, of Maj.-Gen. D. Hunter was President, which ened at Washington, for the purpose of in- gating the conduct of certain officers in con- on with the surrender of Harper's Ferry, I he following:

he commission has remarked freely on Col. , an old officer, who has been killed in the ce of his country, and it can not, from any ves of delicacy, refrain from censuring those igh command, when it thinks such censnre rved.

The general-in-chief has testified that Gen. , after having received orders to repel the ay invading the State of Maryland, marched six miles per day, on an average, when pur- g this invading enemy.

The general-in chief also testifies that, in his ion, he could and should have relieved and rected Harper's Ferry; and in this opinion commission fully concur."

have been greatly surprised that this com- sion, in its investigations, never called upon nor upon any officer of my staff, nor, so far as I know, upon any officer of the army of the Potomac, able to give an intelligent statement of the movements of that army. But another paragraph in the same report makes testimony from such sources quite superfluous. It is as follows:

"By a reference to the evidence, it will be seen that at the very moment Col. Ford abandoned Maryland Heights, his little army was in reality relieved by Gen. Franklin's and Sumner's corps at Crampton's Gap, within seven miles of his position."

The corps of Gens. Franklin and Sumner were a part of the army which I at that time had the honor to command, and they were acting under my orders at Crampton's Gap, and elsewhere, and if, as the commission states, Col. Ford's "little army was in reality relieved" by those officers, it was relieved by me.

I had, on the morning of the 10th, sent the following dispatch in relation to the command at Harper's Ferry:

Camp near Rockville, Sept. 10, 1862, 9.45 A M.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., Washington, D. C.:—Col. Miles is at or near Harper's Ferry, as I understand, with nine thousand troops. He can do nothing where he is, but could be of great service if ordered to join me. I suggest that he be ordered to join me by the most practicable route. G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen.

To this I received the following reply:

"There is no way for Col. Miles to join you at present; his only chance is to defend his works till you can open communication with him. H. W. H."

It seems necessary for a distinct understanding of this matter, to state that I was directed on the 12th to assume command of the garrison of Harper's Ferry, as soon as I should open communication with that place, and that when I received this order all communication from the direction in which I was approaching was cut off. Up to that time, however, Col. Miles could, in my judgment, have marched his command into Pennsylvania, by crossing the Potomac at Williamsport or above, and this opinion was confirmed by the fact that Col. Davis marched the cavalry part of Col. Miles' command from Harper's Ferry on the 14th, taking the main road to Hagerstown, and he encountered no enemy excepting a small picket near the mouth of the Antietam.

Before I left Washington, and when there, there certainly could have been no enemy to prevent the withdrawal of the forces of Col. Miles. I recommended to the proper authorities that the garrison of Harper's Ferry should be withdrawn via Hagerstown, to aid in covering the Cumberland Valley, or that, taking up the pontoon bridge and obstructing the railroad bridge, it should fall back to the Maryland Heights, and there hold out to the last. In this position it ought to have maintained itself many days. It was not deemed proper to adopt either of these suggestions, and when the matter was left to my discretion it was too late for me to do anything but endeavor to relieve the garrison. I accordingly directed artillery to be fired by our advance, at frequent intervals, as a signal that relief was at hand. This was done, and as I afterwards learned, the reports of the cannon were distinctly heard at Harper's Ferry. It was confidently expected that Col. Miles would hold out until we had carried the mountain passes, and were in condition to send a detachment to his relief. The left was therefore ordered to move through Crampton's Pass in front of Burkettsville, while the centre and right marched upon Turner's Pass in front of Middletown.

It may be asked by those who are not acquainted with the topography of the country in the vicinity of Harper's Ferry, why Franklin, instead of marching his column over the circuitous road from Jefferson via Burkettsville and Brownsville, and thence up the river to Harper's Ferry. It was for the reason that I had received information that the enemy were anticipating our approach in that direction, and had established batteries on the south side of the Potomac which commanded all the approaches to Knoxville; moreover the road from that point winds directly along the river bank at the foot of a precipitous mountain, where there was no opportunity of forming in line of battle, and where the enemy could have placed batteries on both sides of the river to enfilade our narrow approaching columns. The approach through Crampton's Pass which debouches into Pleasant Valley in rear of Maryland Heights, was the only one which offered any reasonable prospect of carrying that formidable position. At the same time the troops upon the road were in better relation to the main body of our forces.

On the morning of the 14th a verbal message reached me from Col. Miles, which was the first authentic intelligence I had received as to the condition of things at Harper's Ferry. The messenger informed me that on the preceding afternoon Maryland Heights had been abandoned by our troops after repelling an attack of the rebels and that Col. Miles's entire force was concentrated at Harper's Ferry: the Maryland, Loudon, and Bolivar Heights having been abandoned by him, and occupied by the enemy. The messenger also stated that there was no apparent reason for the abandonment of the Maryland Heights, and that Col. Miles instructed him to say that he could hold out with certainty two days longer. I directed him to make his way back, if possible, with the information, that I was approaching rapidly, and felt confident I could relieve the place.

On the same afternoon I wrote the following letter to Col. Miles, and dispatched three copies by three different couriers, on different routes. I did not, however, learn that any of these men succeeded in reaching Harper's Ferry.

Middletown, Sept. 14, 1862.

Col. D. S. Miles.—Colonel . The army is being rapidly concentrated here. We are now attacking the pass on the Hagerstown road, over the Blue Ridge, A column is about attacking the Burkestsville and Boonsboro' Pass. You may count on our making every effort to relieve you · you may rely upon my speedily accomplishing that object. Hold out to the last extremity. If it is possible, reoccupy the Maryland Heights with your whole force. If you can do that, I will certainly be able to relieve you. As the Catoctin Valley is in our possession you can neral Franklin pushed his corps rapidly for- towards Crampton's Pass. and at about 12 k on the 14th arrived at Burkettsville, im- tely in rear of which he found the enemy's try posted in force on both sides of the road, artillery in strong positions to defend the aches to the pass.

On the night of the 14th the following dispatch was sent to Gen. Franklin :

Bolivar, Sept. 15, 1 A.M.

General,—. . . . The commanding general directs that you occupy with your command the road from Rohrersville to Harper's Ferry, placing a sufficient force at Rohrersville to hold that position, in case it should be attacked by the enemy from Boonsboro'. Endeavor to open communication with Col. Miles at Harper's Ferry, attacking and destroying such of the enemy as you may find in Pleasant Valley. Should you succeed in opening communication with Col. Miles, direct him to join you with his whole command, with all the guns and public property he can carry with him. The remainder of the guns will be destroyed ; the rest of the public property will also be destroyed. You will then proceed to Boonsboro', which place the commanding general intends to attack to-morrow, and join the main body of the army at that place. Should you find, however, that the enemy has retreated from Boonsboro' towards Sharpsburgh, you will endeavor to fall upon him and cut off his retreat.

By command of Maj.-Gen. McClellan.

G. D. R., Col. & A. D. C., to Gen. F.

On the 15th the following were received from Gen. Franklin :

At the foot of the Mountain in Pleasant Valley, 3 m's. from Rohrersville, Sept. 15, 8.50 A.M.

General,—My command started at daylight this morning, and I am waiting to have it closed up here. Gen. Couch arrived about 10 o'clock last night. I have ordered one of his brigades and one battery to Rohrersville, or to the strongest points in its vicinity. The enemy is drawn up in line of battle about two miles to our front, —one brigade in sight. As soon as I am sure that Rohrersville is occupied, I shall move forward to attack the enemy. This may be two hours from now. If Harper's Ferry is fallen, and the cessation of firing makes me fear that it has, it is my opinion that I should be strongly reinforced. . . .

W. B. F., M.-Gen. Com. 6th C., to Gen. G. B. McC.
Sept. 15, 11 A. M.

General :—I have received your despatch by Capt. O'Keefe. The enemy is in large force in my front, in two lines of battle stretching across the valley, and a large column of artillery and infantry on the right of the valley, looking towards Harper's Ferry. They outnumber me two to one. It of course will not answer to pursue the enemy under these circumstances. I shall communicate with Burnside as soon as possible. In the meantime I shall wait here until I learn what is the prospect of reinforcement. I have not the force to justify an attack on the force I see in front. I have had a very close view of it, and its position is very strong. Respectfully, W. B. Franklin, Maj.-Gen.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC., Comd'g.

Col. Miles surrendered Harper's Ferry at 8 a. m. on the 15th, as the cessation of the firing indicated, and Gen. Franklin was ordered to remain where he was, to watch the large force in front of him, and protect our left and rear until the night of the 16th, when he was ordered to join the main body of the army at Keedysville, after sending Couch's division to Maryland Heights.

While the events which have just been described were taking place at Crampton's Gap, the troops of the centre and right wing, which had united at Frederick on the 13th, were engaged in the contest for the possession of Turner's Gap.

On the morning of the 13th, Gen. Pleasonton was ordered to send McReynolds's brigade and a section of artillery in the direction of Gettysburg, and Rush's regiment towards Jefferson, to communicate with Franklin, to whom the 6th U. S. Cavalry and a section of artillery had previously been sent, and to proceed with the remainder of the force in the direction of Middletown in pursuit of the enemy.

After skirmishing with the enemy all the morning and driving them from several strong positions, he reached Turner's Gap of the South Mountain in the afternoon, and found the enemy in force, and apparently determined to defend the pass. He sent back for infantry to General Burnside, who had been directed to support him, and proceeded to make reconnoissance of the position.

The South Mountain is at this point about 1000 feet in height, and its general direction is from north-east to south-west. The National Road from Frederick to Hagerstown crosses it nearly at right angles from Turner's Gap, a depression which is some 400 feet in depth. The mountain on the north side of the turnpike is divided into two crests or ridges by a narrow valley, which, though deep at the pass, becomes a slight depression at about a mile to the north. There are two country roads, one to the right of the turnpike, and the other to the left, which give access to the crests overlooking the main road. The one to the left, called the "old Sharpsburg road," is nearly parallel to, and about half a mile distant from the turnpike, until it reaches the crest of the mountain, when it bends off to the left.

The other road, called the "old Hagerstown road," passes up a ravine in the mountain, about a mile from the turnpike, and, bending to the left over and along the first crest, enters the turnpike at the Mountain House, near the summit of the pass.

On the night of the 13th the positions of the different corps were as follows:

Reno's corps, at Middletown, except Rodman's division at Frederick.

Hooker's corps, on the Monocacy, two miles from Frederick.

Sumner's Corps, near Frederick; Banks' Corps, ditto; Sykes's Division, ditto; Franklin's Corps, at Buckeystown; Couch's Division, at Licksville.

The orders from headquarters, for the march on the 14th, were as follows:

13th, 11.20 P M.—Hooker to march at daylight to Middletown.

13th, 11.30 P. M.—Sykes to move at 6 A. M., after Hooker, on the Middletown and Hagerstown roae.

14th, 1 A. M.,—Artillery Reserve to follow Sykes closely.

13th, 8.45 P. M—Sumner to move at 7 A. M.

14th, 9 A. M.—Sumner ordered to take Shookstown road to Middletown.

13th, 6.46 P. M.—Couch ordered to mov Jefferson with his whole division.

On the 14th, Gen. Pleasanton continued hi connoissance. Gibson's battery, and afterw Benjamin's battery, (of Reno's corps), were pl on high ground io the left of the turnpike, obtained a direct fire on the enemy's positio the gap.

General Cox's division, which had been dered up to support Gen. Pleasonton, left its onac near Middletown, at 6 A. M. The first ade reached the scene of action at 9 A. M., was sent up the old Sharpsburg road by Pleasonton, to feel the enemy and ascertain i held the crest on that side in strong force. was soon found to be the case, and Gen. Cox ing arrived with the other brigade, and in mation having been received from Gen. R that the column would be supporfed by whole corps, the division was ordered to ass the position.

Two 20-pound Parrotts of Simmons's batt and two sections of McMullin's battery were in the rear, in position near the turnpike, wh they did good service during the day against enemy's batteries in the gap.

Col. Scammon's brigade was deployed, a well covered by skirmishers, moved up the sl to the left of the road, with the object of turn the enemy's right, if possible. It snceeeded gaining the crest and establishing itself there spite of the vigorous resistance of the ene who was posted behind stone walls and in edges of timber, and the fire of a battery wh poured in canister and case-shot on the regim on the right of the brigade.

Col. Crooke's brigade marched in column, supporting distance. A section of McMulli battery, under Lieutenant Croome (killed wh serving one of his guns), was moved up w great difficulty, and opened with canister at ve short range on the enemy's infantry, by wh (after having done considerable execution) was soon silenced and forced to withdraw.

One regiment of Crooke's brigade was now ployed on Scammon's left, and the other two his rear, and they several times entered the fi line and relieved the regiment in front of the when hard pressed. A section of Simmon's b tery was brought up and placed in an open spa in the woods, where it did good service duri the rest of the day. The enemy several tim attempted to retake the crest, advancing wi boldness, but were each time repulsed. Th then withdrew their battery to a point more the right, and formed columns on both our flank

It was now about noon, and a lull occurred the contest, which lasted about two hours, du ing which the rest of the corps was coming u Gen. Wilcox's division was the first to arriv When he reached the base of the mountain, Ge Cox advised him to consult Gen. Pleasonton as a position. order to move the whole line forward, and or silence the enemy's batteries in front was ted with enthusiasm. The enemy made a rate resistance, charging our advancing with fierceness, but they were everywhere d, and fled. Our chief loss fell on Wilcox's on. The enemy's battery was found to be s a gorge and beyond the reach of our in- , but its position was untenable, and it was y removed and not again put in position us. But the batteries across the gap still a fire of shot and shell.

n. Wilcox praises very highly the conduct e 17th Michigan in this advance—a regiment h had been organized scarcely a month, but h charged the advancing enemy in flank in a manner worthy of veteran troops; and also that of the 45th Pennsylvania, which bravely met them in front.

Cook's battery now reopened fire; Sturgis's division was moved to the flank of Wilcox's, occupying the new ground gained on the further side of the slope, and his artillery opened on the batteries across the gap. The enemy made an effort to turn our left about dark, but were repulsed by Fairchild's brigade and Clark's battery.

At about 7 o'clock the enemy made another effort to regain the best ground, attacking along Sturgis's front and part of Cox's. A lively fire was kept up until nearly nine o'clock, several charges being made by the enemy and repulsed with slaughter, and we finally occupied the highest part of the mountain. Gen. Reno was killed just before sunset, while making a reconnoissance to the front, and the command of the corps devolved upon Gen. Cox.

In Gen. Reno the nation lost one of its best general officers. He was a skillful soldier, a brave and honest man.

There was no firing after ten o'clock, and the troops slept on their arms, ready to renew the fight at daylight; but the enemy quietly retired from the front during the night, abandoning their wounded and leaving their dead in large numbers scattered on the field.

While these operations were progressing on the left of the main column, the right, under Gen. Hooker, was actively engaged. His corps left the Monocacy early in the morning, and its advance reached the Catoctin Creek about 1 P. M. Gen. Hooker then went forward to examine the ground.

At about 1 o'clock Gen. Meade's division was ordered to make a diversion in favor of Reno. The following is the order sent:

September 14. 1 P. M.

Maj.-Gen. Hooker,

General,—General Reno requests that a division of yours may move up on the right (north) of the main road. General McClellan desires you to comply with this request, holding your whole corps in readiness to support the movement, and taking charge of it yourself. Sumner's and Banks's corps have commenced arriving. Let General McClellan be informed as soon as you commence your movement.

Geo. D. Ruggles, Col., A.-A.-G & A.-D.-C.

Meade's division left Catoctin Creek about 2 o'clock, and turned off to the right from the main road on the old Hagerstown road to Mount Taber Church, where Gen Hooker was, and deployed a short distance in advance, its right resting about one and a half miles from the turnpike. The enemy fired a few shots from a battery on the mountain side, but did no considerable damage. Cooper's Battery "B," 1st Pennsylvania Artillery, was placed in position on high ground at about half-past three o'clock, and fired at the enemy on the slope, but soon ceased by order of Gen. Hooker, and the position of our lines prevented any further use of artillery by us on this part of the field. The 1st Massachusetts Cavalry was sent up the valley to the right to observe the movements, if any, of the enemy in that direction, and one regiment of Meade's Division, posted to watch a road coming in in the same direction. The other divisions were deployed as they came up. General Hatch's on the left, and General Ricketts', which arrived about 5 P. M., in the rear.

General Gibbon's brigade was detached from Hatch's division by General Burnside for the purpose of making a demonstration on the enemy's centre up the main road, as soon as the movements on the right and left had sufficiently progressed.

The 1st Pennsylvania Rifles, of General Seymour's brigade, were sent forward as skirmishers to feel the enemy, and it was found that he was in force. Meade was then directed to advance his division to the right of the road, so as to outflank them if possible, and then to move forward and attack, while Hatch was directed to take, with his division, the crest on the left of the old Hagerstown road, Rickett's division being held in reserve.

Seymour's brigade was sent up to the top of the slope on the right of the ravine, through which the road runs, and then move along the summit parallel to the road, while Col. Gallagher's and Col. Magilton's brigades moved in the same direction along the slope and in the ravine. The ground was of the most difficult character for the movements of troops, the hillside being very steep and rocky, and obstructed by stone walls, fences, and timber. The enemy was soon encountered, and in a short time the action became general along the whole front of the division. The line advanced steadily up the mountain side, where the enemy was posted behind trees and rocks, from which he was gradually dislodged. During this advance Col. Gallagher, commanding 3d brigade, was severely wounded, and the command devolved upon Lieut.-Col. Robt. Anderson.

General Meade, having reason to believe that the enemy were attempting to outflank him on his right, applied to Gen. Hooker for reinforcements. General Duryea's brigade, of Rickett's division, was ordered up, but it did not arrive until the close of the action. It was advanced on Seymour's left, but only one regiment could open fire before the enemy retired, and darkness intervened. General Meade speaks highly of General Seymour's skill in handling his brigade on the extreme right, securing by his manœuvres the great object of the movement, the outflanking of the enemy.

While Gen. Meade was gallantly driving the enemy on the right, General Hatch's division was engaged in a severe contest for the possession of the crest on the left of the ravine. It moved up the mountain in the following order: two regiments of General Patrick's brigade deployed as skirmishers, with the other two regiments of the same brigade supporting them: Col. Phelps's brigade in line of battalions in mass at deploying distance: General Doubleday's brigade, in the same order, bringing up the rear. The 21st New York having gone straight up the slope, instead of around to the right, as directed, the 2d United States Sharpshooters was sent out in its place.

Phelps's and Doubleday's brigades were deployed in turn as they reached the woods, v began about half way up the mountain; Patrick, with his skirmishers, soon drew th of the enemy, and found him strongly poste hind a fence which bounded the cleared spa the top of the ridge, having in his front woods, through which our line was advan and in his rear a cornfield, full of rocky le which afforded good cover to fall back if lodged.

Phelps's brigade gallantly advanced under fire, to close quarters, and after ten or fi minutes of heavy firing on both sides, (in w Gen. Hatch was wounded while urging on men), the fence was carried by a charge, and line advanced a few yards beyond it, somev sheltered by the slope of the hill. Doublec brigade, now under the command of Lieut.
Hoffman, (Col. Wainwright having been wo ed), relieved Phelps's, and continued firing fo hour and-a-half, the enemy, behind ledges of r some thirty or forty paces in our front, maki stubborn resistance, and attempttng to charg the least cessation of our fire. About dusk onel Christian's brigade, of Rickett's divis came up and relieved Doubleday's brigade, wl fell back into line behind Phelps. Christi brigade continued the action for thirty or f minutes, when the enemy retired, after ha made an attempt to flank us on the left, wl was repulsed by the 76th New York, and Indiana.

The remaining brigade of Rickett's divis (General Hartsuff's), was moved up in the cer and connected Meade's left with Doubled right. We now had possession of the summi the first ridge, which commanded the turnp on both sides of the mountain, and the tro were ordered to hold their positions until furt orders, and slept on their arms. Late in the ternoon, General Gibbon, with his brigade, one section of Gibbon's battery, (B, 4th U. S. tillery), was ordered to move up the main r ment, and endeavor to relieve Harper's

's. Burnside and Porter, upon reaching the rom Boonsboro' to Rohrersville, were to ree Franklin or to move on Sharpsburg, ac-g to circumstances.

Franklin moved towards Brownsville, and there a force of the enemy much superior nbers to his own, drawn up in a strong po-to receive him.

At this time the cessation of firing at Harper's indicated the surrender of that place.

The cavalry overtook the enemy's cavalry in sboro, made a dashing charge, killing and nding a number, and capturing 250 prisoners two guns.

Gen. Richardson's division, of the 2d Corps, ing the rear guard of the enemy with vigor, passed Boonsboro and Keadysville, and came up on the main body of the enemy, occupying in large force a strong position a few miles beyond the latter place.

It had been hoped to engage the enemy on the 15th, accordingly instructions were given that if the enemy were overtaken on the march, they should be attacked at once; if found in heavy force and in position, the corps in advance should be placed in position for attack, and await my arrival. On reaching the advance position of our troops, I found but two divisions, Richardson's and Sykes's, in position, the other troops were halted in the road, the head of the column some distance in rear of Richardson.

The enemy occupied a strong position on the heights, on the West side of Antietam Creek, dis playing a large force of infantry and cavalry, with numerous batteries of artillery, which opened on our columns as they appeared in sight on the Keadysville and Sharpsburg turnpike, which fire was returned by Captain Tidball's light battery, 2d United States Artillery, and Pettit's battery, 1st New York Artillery.

The division of General Richardson, following close on the heels of the retreating foe, halted and deployed near Antietam River, on the right of the Sharpsburg road. Gen. Sykes, leading on the division of regulars on the old Sharpsburg road, came up and deployed to the left of Gen.
Richardson, on the left of the road.

Antietam Creek, in this vicinity, is crossed by four stone bridges, the upper one on the Keadys-ville and Williamsport road; the 2d on the Keadysville and Sharpsburg turnpike, some two and a half miles below; the third about a mile below the second, on the Rohrersville and Sharps-burg road; and the fourth near the mouth of Antietam Creek, on the road leading from Harper's Ferry to Sharpsburg, some three miles below the third. The stream is sluggish, with few and difficult fords.

After a rapid examination of the position, I found that it was too late to attack that day, and at once directed the placing of the batteries of position of the centre, and indicated the bivouacs for the different corps, massing them near and on both sides of the Sharpsburg turnpike. The corps were not all in their positions until the next morning after sunrise

On the morning of the 16th it was discovered that the enemy had changed the position of his batteries. The masses of his troops were, however, still concealed behind the opposite heights.
Their left and centre were upon and in front of the Sharpsburg and Hagerstown turnpike, hidden by woods and irregularities of the ground; their extreme left resting upon a wooded eminence near the cross roads to the north of J. Miller's farm, their left resting upon the Potomac. Their line extended south, the right resting upon the hills to the south of Sharpsburg, near Snavcley's farm.

The bridge over the Antietam, described as
No. 3, near this point, was strongly covered by riflemen protected by rifle-pits, stone fences, &c., and enfiladed by artillery. The ground in front of this line consisted of undulating hills, their crests in turn commanded by others in their rear. On all favorable points the enemy's artillery was posted, and their reserves, hidden from view by the hills on which their line of battle was formed, could manœuvre unobserved by our army, and from the shortness of their line, could rapidly reinforce any point threatened by our attack. Their position stretching across the angle formed by the Potomac and Antietam, their flanks and rear proteced by these streams, was one of the strongest to be found in this region of country, which is well adapted to defensive warfare.

On the right near Keadysville, on both sides of the Sharpsburg turnpike were Sumner's and Hooker's corps. In advance, on the right of the turnpike, and near the Antietam river, Gen. Richardson's division of Gen. Sumner's corps was posted. Gen. Sykes' division of Gen. Porter's corps was on the left of the turnpike, and in line with Gen. Richardson, protecting the bridge, No. 2, over the Antietam. The left of the line opposite to, and some distance from bridge No. 3, was occupied by Gen. Burnside's corps. Before giving Gen. Hooker his orders to make the movement which will presently be described, I rode to the left of the line to satisfy myself that the troops were properly posted there to secure our left flank from any attack made along the left bank of the Antietam, as well as to enable us to carry bridge No. 3.

I found it necessary to make considerable changes in the position of Gen. Burnside's corps, and directed him to advance to a strong position in the immediate vicinity of the bridge, and to reconnoitre the approaches to the bridge carefully.

In rear of Gens. Sumner's and Hooker's corps, near Keadysville, Gen. Mansfield's corps was massed; the cavalry on the turnpike in rear of Keadysville. On the ridge of the first line of hills overlooking the Antietam, and between the turnpike and Fry's house, on the right of the road, were placed Capts. Taft's, Languer's, Von Kleizer's, and Lieut. Weaver's batteries of 20-pounder Parrot guns. On the crest of the hill, in the rear and right of bridge No. 3. Capt. Weed's 3-inch and Lieutenant Benjamin's 20-pounder batteries. Gen. Franklin's corps, and Gen. Couch's division held a position in Pleasant Valley, in front of Brownsville, with a strong force of the enemy in their front. Gen. Morell's division of Porter's corps was en route from Boonsboro', and Gen. Humphrey's division of new troops, en route from Frederick, Md. About daylight on the 16th the enemy opened a heavy fire of artillery on our guns in position which was promptly returned. Their fire was silenced for the time, but was frequently renewed during the day. In the heavy fire of the morning, Major Arndt, commanding 1st battalion 1st New York Artillery was mortally wounded, while directing the operations of his batteries.

It was afternoon before I could move the troops to their positions for attack, being compelled to spend the morning in reconnoitering the new position taken up by the enemy, examining the ground, finding fords and clearing their approaches, and hurrying up the ammunition and supply trains, which had been delayed by the rapid march of the troops over the few practicable approaches from Frederick. These had become crowded by the masses of infantry, cavalry and artillery, pressing on with the hope of overtaking the enemy before he could form to resist an attack; many of the troops were out of rations from the previous day, and a good deal of their ammunition had been expended in the severe actions of the 14th.

My plan for the impending general engagement was to attack the enemy's left with the corps of Hooker and Mansfield, supported by Sumner's, and if necessary, Franklin's, and as soon as the latter looked favorably there to move the corps of Gen. Burnside against the enemy's extreme right upon the ridges running to the south and rear of Sharpsburg, and having carried their position, press along the crest towards our right; for whenever either of these flank movements should be successful to advance our centre with all the forces then disposable.

About 2 P.M. Gen. Hooker, with his corps assisting of Gen. Rickett's, Meade's and Doubleday's divisions, was ordered to cross the Antietam at a ford, and at bridge No. 1 a short distance above, to attack, and if possible turn the enemy's left. Gen. Sumner was ordered to follow the corps of Gen. Mansfield (the 12th) during the night, and hold his own (the 2d) corps ready to cross early the next morning. On reaching the vicinity of the enemy's left, a sharp contest commenced with the Pennsylvania Reserves, the advance of Gen. Hooker's corps, near the house of Dr Miller. The enemy was driven from the edge of woods where he was first met, the firing lasting until after dark, when Gen. Hooker's corps rested on their arms, on ground won from the enemy.

During the night Gen. Mansfield's corps, assisting of Gen's. Williams's and Green's divisions crossed the Antietam at the same ford and bridge that Gen. Hooker's corps had passed, and bivouacked on the farm of J. Poffenberger, about a mile in rear of Gen. Hooker's position. At early light, on the 17th, the action was commenced by the skirmishers of the Pennsylvania Reserves. The whole of Gen. Hooker's corps was soon engaged, and drove the enemy from the open field in front of the first line of woods, into a second line of woods beyond, which runs to the eastward of and nearly parallel to the Sharpsburg and Hagerstown turnpike.

This contest was obstinate, and as the troops advanced the opposition became more determined, and the numbers of the enemy greater. General Hooker then ordered up the corps of Gen. Mansfield, which moved promptly towards the scene of action. The 1st division, Gen. Williams, was deployed to the right on approaching the enemy, Gen. Crawford's brigade on the right, its right resting on the Hagerstown turnpike, on his left Gen. Gordon's brigade. The 2d division, Gen. Green's, joining the left of Gordon's, extended as far as the burnt buildings to the north and east of the white church on the turnpike. During the deployment that gallant veteran, General Mansfield, fell mortally wounded while examining the ground in front of his troops. General Hartsuff about 9 o'clock A.M., Gen. Sedgwick's diviof Gen. Sumner's corps arrived. Crossing the previously mentioned, this division marched ree columns to the support of the attack on enemy's left. On nearing the scene of action columns were halted, faced to the front, and olished by Gen. Sumner in three parallel lines rigade, facing towards the south and west; Gorman's brigade in front, Gen. Dana's sel, and Gen. Howard's third, with a distance ween the lines of some seventy paces.

he division was then put in motion, and ed upon the field of battle under fire from enemy's concealed batteries on the hill bed the woods, passing diagonally to the front ss the open space, and to the front of the division of Gen. William's corps—this latter ision withdrew.
Entering the woods on the west of the turn-e, and driving the enemy before them, the t line was met by a heavy fire of musketry and ll from the enemy's breastworks and the batteries on the hill commanding the exit from the woods. Meantime a heavy column of the enemy had succeeded in crowding back the troops of Gen. Green's division, and appeared in rear of the left of Sedgwick's division. By command of Gen. Sumner, Gen. Howard faced the third line to the rear, preparatory to a change of front, to meet the column advancing on the left, but this line now suffering from a destructive fire both in front and on its left, which it was unable to return, gave way towards the right and rear in considerable confusion, and was soon followed by the first and second lines.

Gen. Gorman's brigade, and one regiment of Gen. Dana's, soon rallied and checked the advance of the enemy on the right. The second and third lines now formed on the left of Gen. Gorman's brigade, and poured a destructive fire upon the enemy.

During Gen. Sumner's attack, he ordered Gen. Williams to support him. Brig.-Gen. Gordon, with a portion of his brigade, moved forward, but when he reached the woods the left of Gen. Sedgwick's division had given way, and finding himself, as the smoke cleared up, opposed to the enemy in force, with his small command, he withdrew to the rear of the batteries at the second line of woods. As Gen. Gordon's troops unmasked our batteries on the left, they opened with canister, the batteries of Capt. Cothran, 1st New York, and "I," 1st U. S. Artillery, commanded by Lieut. Woodruff, doing good service. Unable to stand this deadly fire in front and the musketry fire from the right, the enemy again sought shelter in the woods and rocks beyond the turnpike.

During this assault Gen's. Sedgwick and Dana were seriously wounded and taken from the field. Gen. Sedgwick, though twice wounded and faint from loss of blood, retained command of his division for more than an hour after his first wound, animating his command by his presence. Gen. Howard assumed command after Gen. Sedgwick retired.

At the time of Gen. Sedgwick's advance, Gen. Hooker, while urging on his command, was seriously wounded in the foot and taken from the field. The repulse of the enemy offered opportunity to re-arrange the lines and re-organize the commands on the right, now more or less in confusion. The batteries of the Pennsylvania Reserve, on high ground near I. Poffenburger's house, opened fire and checked several attempts of the enemy to establish batteries in front of our right, to turn that flank and enfilade the lines.

While this conflict was so obstinately raging on the right, Gen. French was pushing his division against the enemy still further to the left. This division crossed the Antietam at the same ford as Gen. Sedgwick, and immediately in his rear. Passing over the stream in three columns, the division marched about a mile from the ford, then facing to the left, moved in three lines towards the enemy, Gen. Max Weber's brigade in front, Col. Dwight Morris's brigade of raw troops, undrilled and moving for the first time under fire, in the second, and Gen. Kimball's brigade in the third. The division was first assailed by a fire of artillery, but steadily advanced, driving the enemy's skirmishers, and encountered the infantry in some force at the group of houses on Roulette's farm. Gen. Weber's brigade gallantly advanced with an unwavering front, and drove the enemy from their position about the houses.

While Gen. Weber was hotly engaged with the first line of the enemy, Gen. French received orders from Gen. Sumner, his corps commander, to push on with renewed vigor to make a diversion in favor of the attack on the right. Leaving the new troops who had been thrown into some confusion from their march through corn-fiels, over fences, &c., to form as a reserve, he ordered the brigade of Gen. Kimball to the front, passing to the left of Gen. Weber. The enemy was pressed back to near the crest of the hill, where he was encountered in greater strength, posted in a sunken road running in a north-westerly direction and forming a natural rifle-pit. In a corn-field in rear of this road were also strong bodies of the enemy. As the line reached the crest of the hill, a gallant fire was opened on it from the sunken road and corn-field. Here a terrific fire of musketry burst from both lines, and the battle raged along the whole line with great slaughter. The enemy attempted to turn the left of the line, but were met by the 7th Virginia and 132d Pennsylvania Volunteers, and repulsed.

Foiled in this, the enemy made a dermined assault on the front, but was met by a charge from our lines, which drove him back with severe loss, leaving in our hands some 300 prisoners, and several stands of colors. The enemy having been repulsed by the terrible execution of the batteries and the musketry fire on the extreme right, now attempted to assist the attack on Gen. French's division, by assaultiug him on his right, and endeavoring to turn his flank, but this attack was met and checked by the 14th Indiana and 8th Ohio volunteers, and by canister from Capt. Tomkins's battery, 1st Rhode Island artillery. Having been under an almost continuous fire for nearly four hours, and their ammunition being nearly exhausted, the division now took position immediately below the crest of the heights on which they had so gallantly fought, the enmy making no attempt to regain their lost ground.

On the left of Gen. French, Gen Richardson's division was hotly engaged. Having crossed the Antietam about 9.30 A.M., at the ford crossed by the other divisions of Sumner's corps, it moved on a line nearly parallel to the Antietam, and formed in a ravine behind the high grounds overlooking Roulette's house. The 3d (Irish) brigade, commanded by Gen. Meagher, on the right, the 2d brigade, commanded by Gen. Caldwell, on his left, and the brigade commanded by Col. Brooks, 53d Pennsylvania Volunteers, in support. As the division moved forward to take its position on the field, the enemy directed a fire of artillery against it, but owing to the irregularities of the ground, did but little damage.

Meagher's brigade advancing steadily, soon became engaged with the enemy posted to the left and in front of Roulette's house. It continued to advance under a heavy fire nearly to the crest of the hill overlooking Piper's house, the enemy being posted in the continuation of sunken road and corn-field, before referr Here the brave Irish brigade opened upo enemy a terrific musketry fire. The whole of the brigade, with the 57th 66th New York regiments of Col. Brooks's gade, who had moved these regiments into first line, now advanced with gallantry, driv the enemy before them in confusion into corn-field beyond the sunken road. The left the division was now well advanced, when enemy, concealed by an intervening ridge, deavored to turn its left and rear. Col. Cr 5th N. Up to this e this division was without artillery, and in new position suffered severely from artillery , which could not be replied to. A section Robertson's horse battery, commanded by ut. Vincent, 2d U. S. Artillery, now arrived the ground, and did excellent service. Subuently a battery of brass guns, commanded by t. Graham, 1st U. S. Artillery, arrived, and s posted on the crest of the hill, and soon nced the two guns in the orchard. A heavy soon ensued between the battery further to ht and our own. Captain Graham's battery s bravely and skillfully served, but, unable to ch the enemy, who had rifled guns of greater ge than our smooth bores, retired by order of n. Richardson, to save it from useless sacrifice men and horses. The brave general was himself mortally wounded while personally directing fire.

Gen. Hancock was placed in command of the ision after the fall of General Richardson. n. Meagher's brigade, now commanded by Col. rke of the 63d New York, having refilled their rtridge boxes, was again ordered forward, and k position in the centre of the line. The diion now occupied one line in close proximity the enemy, who had taken up a position in the ar of Piper's house.

Col. Dwight Morris, with the 14th Connecticut d a detachment of the 108th New York, of Gen. ench's division, was sent by Gen. French to e support of Richardson's division. This comand was now placed in an interval in the line etween Gen. Caldwell's and the Irish Brigade. he requirements of the extended line of battle d so engaged the artillery that the application General Hancock for artillery for his division could not be complied with immediately by the chief of artillery, or the corps commanders in his vicinity. Knowing the tried courage of the troops, Gen. Hancock felt confident that he could hold his position, although suffering from the enemy's artillery, but was too weak to attack, as the great length of the line he was obliged to hold prevented him from forming more than one line of battle; and, from his advanced position, this line was already partly enfiladed by the batteries of the enemy on the right, which were protected from our batteries opposite them by the woods at the Dunker church.

Seeing a body of the enemy advancing on some of our troops to the left of his position, General Hancock obtained Hexamer's battery from Gen. Franklin's corps, which assisted materially in frustrating this attack. It also assisted the attack of the 7th Maine of Franklin's corps, which, without other aid, made an attack against the enemy's line and drove in skirmishers who were annoying our artillery and troops on the right. Lieut. Woodruff, with battery "I," 2d U. S. Artillery, relieved Capt. Hexamer, whose ammunition was expended. The enemy seemed at one time to be about making an attack in force upon this part of the line, and advancing a long column of infantry towards this division, but, on nearing the position, Gen. Pleasonton opening on them with sixteen guns, they halted, gave a desultory fire, and retreated, closing the operations on this portion of the field.

To return to the incidents occurring still further to the right.

Between 12 and 1 P. M., Gen. Franklin's corps arrived on the field of battle, having left their camp near Crampton's Pass at 6 A. M., leaving Gen. Couch with orders to move with his division to occupy Maryland heights.

Gen. Smith's division led the column, followed by General Slocum's.

It was first intended to keep this corps in reserve on the east side of the Antietam, to operate on either flank or on the centre, as circumstances might require. But, on nearing Keadysville, the strong opposition on the right, developed by the attacks of Hooker and Sumner, rendered it necessary to send this corps at once to the assistance of the right wing. On nearing the field, hearing that one of our batteries ("A," 4th U. S. Artillery), commanded by Lieut. Thomas, who occupied the same position as Lieut. Woodruff's battery in the morning, was hotly engaged, without supports, Gen. Smith sent two regiments to its relief from Gen. Hancock's brigade. On inspecting the ground, General Smith ordered the other regiment of Hancock's brigade, with Frank's and Cowen's batteries, 1st New York Artillery, to the threatened position; Lieut. Thomas and Capt. Cothran, commanding batteries, bravely held their positions against the advancing enemy, handling their batteries with skill.

Finding the enemy still advancing, the 3d brigade of Smith's division, commanded by Colonel Irwin, 49th Pennsylvania Volunteers, was ordered up, and, passing through Lieut. Thomas's battery, charged upon the enemy and drove back the advance until abreast of the Dunker Church. As the right of the brigade came opposite the woods, it received a destructive fire which checked the advance and threw the brigade somewhat into confusion. It formed again behind a rise of ground in the open space in advance of the batteries. General French having reported to General Franklin that his ammunition was nearly expended, that officer ordered General Brooks, with his brigade, to reinforce him. Gen. Brooks formed his brigade on the right of General French, where they remained during the remainder of the day and night, frequently under the fire of the enemy's artillery. It was soon after the brigade of Col. Irwin had fallen behind the rise of ground that the 7th Maine, by order of Col. Irwin, made the gallant attack already referred to.

The advance of General Franklin's corps was opportune. The attack of the enemy on the position, but for the timely arrival of his corps, must have been disastrous, had it succeeded in piercing the line between Gen. Sedgwick's and French's divisions.

Gen. Franklin ordered two brigades of Gen. Slocum's division, Gen. Newton's and Col. Torbert's, to form in column to assault the woods that had been so hotly contested before, by Gen's. Sumner and Hooker; Bartlett's brigade was ordered to form as a reserve; at this time Gen. Sumner having command on the right, directed further offensive operations to be postponed, as the repulse of this, the only remaining corps available for attack, would peril the safety of the whole army.

Gen. Porter's corps, consisting of Gen. Sykes's division of regulars and volunteers, occupied a position on the east side of Antietam Creek, upon the main turnpike leading to Sharpsburg, and directly opposite the centre of the enemy's line. This corps filled the interval between the right wing and Gen. Burnside's command, and guarded the main approach from the enemy's position to our trains of supplies.

It was necessary to watch this part of our line with the utmost vigilance, lest the enemy should take advantage of the first exhibition of weakness here to push upon us a vigorous assault for the purpose of piercing our centre and turning our rear, as well as to capture or destroy our supply trains. Once having penetrated this line, the enemy's passage to our rear could have met with but feeble resistance, as there were no reserves to reinforce or close up the gap.

Towards the middle of the afternoon, proceeding to the right, I found that Sumner's, Hooker's, and Mansfield's corps had met with serious losses. Several general officers had been carried from the field severely wounded, and the aspect of affairs was anything but promising. At the risk of greatly exposing our centre, I ordered two brigades from Porter's corps, the only available troops, to reinforce the right. Six battalions of Sykes's regulars had been thrown across toe Antietam bridge on the main road, to attack and drive back the enemy's sharpshooters, who were annoying Pleasonton's horse batteries in advance of the bridge. Warren's brigade of Porter's corps was detached to hold a position on Burnside's right and rear, so that Porter was left at one time with only a portion of Sykes's divi and one small brigade of Morell's division little over three thousand men) to hold his portant position.

Gen. Sumner expressed the most decided o ion against another attempt during that da assault the enemy's position in front, as porti of our troops were so much scattered and de ralized. In view of these circumstances, a making changes in the positions of some of troops, I directed the different commanders hold their positions, and, being satisfied that could be done without the assistance of the brigades from the centre, I countermanded order which was in course of execution.

Gen. Slocum's division replaced a portion Gen. Sumner's troops, and positions were selec for batteries in front of the woods. The ene opened several heavy fires of artillery on the sition of our troops after this, but our batte soon silenced them.

On the morning of the 17th Gen. Pleasont with his cavalry division, and the horse batteri under Captains Robertson, Tidball, and Lie Haines, of the 2d U. S. artillery, was ordered advance on the turnpike towards Sharpsbu across bridge No. 2, and support the left of Su ner's line. The bridge being covered by a fire artillery and sharpshooters, cavalry skirmish were thrown out, and Capt. Tidball's battery vanced by piece, and drove off the sharpshoot with canister sufficiently to establish the batt ies above mentioned, which opened on the ener with effect. The firing was kept up for abo two hours, when, the enemy's fire slackening, t batteries were relieved by Randall's and V Reed's batteries, U. S. Artillery. About 3 o'clo Tidball, Robertson and Haines returned to the positions on the west of Antietam, Capt. Gibs having been placed in position on the east side guard the approaches to the bridge. These b teries did good service, concentrating their fi on the column about to attack Gen. Hancock position, and compelling it to find shelter behin the hills in rear.

Gen. Sykes's division had been in position sinc the 16th, exposed to the enemy's artillery an sharpshooters.

Gen. Morell had come up on the 16th, and r lieved Gen. Richardson on the right of Ge Sykes, and, continually under the vigilant watc of the enemy, this corps guarded a vital poin

The position of the batteries under Gen. Pleas anton being one of great exposure, the battalio of the 2d and 10th United States Infantry, unde Capt. Dwyer, 4th U. S. Infantry were sent acros to assist in driving off the sharpshooters of th enemy.

The battalion of the 2d and 10th U. S. Infantr advancing far beyond the batteries, compelled th cannoneers of a battery of the enemy to abando their guns. Few in number and unsupported they were unable to bring them off. The heav loss of this small body of men attests their gal lantry.

The troops of Gen. Burnside held the left o the line opposite bridge No. 3. The attack of the right was to have been supported by an at on the left. Preparatory to this attack, on evening of the 16th, Gen. Burnside's corps moved forward and to the left, and took up position nearer the bridge.

I visited Gen. Burnside's position on the 16th, after pointing out to him the proper disposition to be made of his troops during the day night, informed him that he would probably required to attack the enemy's right on the following morning, and directed him to make careful reconnoissances.

Gen. Burnside's corps, consisting of the divisions of Gens. Cox, Wilcox, Rodman, and Sturgis, was posted as follows: Col. Brooks's brigade, 3 division, on the right, Gen. Sturgis's division immediately in rear. On the left was Gen. Scammon's division, with Gen. Scammon's brigade, 's division in support.

Gen. Wilcox's division was held in reserve.

The corps bivouacked in position on the right the 16th.

Early on the morning of the 17th, I ordered Burnside to form his troops, and hold them readiness to assault the bridge in his front, to await further orders.

At eight o'clock an order was sent to him by Lieutenant Wilson, Topographical Eengineers to the bridge, then to gain possession of the hts beyond, and to advance along their crest Sharpsburg and its rear.

After some time had elapsed, not hearing from I despatched an aid to ascertain what had done. The aid returned with the information that but little progress had been made. I sent him back with an order to Gen. Burnside, to assault the bridge at once, and carry it at hazards. The aide returned to me a second e, with the report that the bridge was still the possession of the enemy. Whereupon I ected Col. Sackett, Inspector General, to deliver to Gen. Burnside my positive order to push ward his troops without a moment's delay, if necessary, to carry the bridge at the point the bayonet, and I ordered Col. Sackett to remain with Gen. Burnside and see that the order executed promptly.

After these three hours' delay, the bridge was ried at 1 o'clock by a brilliant charge of the t New York and 51st Pennsylvania Volunteers. er troops were then thrown over and the opite bank occupied, the enemy retreating to the ghts beyond.

A halt was then made by Gen. Burnside's adnce until 3 P.M., upon hearing which I directed of my aides—Col. Key—to inform Gen. Burnside that I desired him to push forward his troops th the utmost vigor and carry the enemy's poion on the heights; that the movement was al to our success; that this was a time when must not stop for loss of life if a great object uld be thereby accomplished. That if, in his lgment, his attack would fail, to inform me so once, that his troops might be withdrawn and ed elsewhere on the field. He replied that he uld soon advance, and would go up the hill as as a battery of the enemy on the left would rmit. Upon this report I again immediately nt Col. Key to Gen. Burnside, with orders to advance at once, if possible, to flank the battery or storm it and carry the heights, repeating that if he considered the movement impracticable to inform me so, that his troops might be recalled. The advance was then gallantly resumed, the enemy driven from their guns, the heights handsomely carried, and a portion of the troops even reached the outskirts of Sharpsburg. By this time it was nearly dark, and strong reinforcements just then reaching the enemy from Harper's Ferry, attacked Gen. Burnside's troops on their left flank, and forced them to retire to a lower line of hills nearer the bridge.

If this important movement had been consummated two hours earlier, a position would have been secured upon the heights from which our batteries might have enfiladed the greater part of the enemy s line, and turned their right and rear. Our victory might have been much more decisive.

The following is the substance of Gen. Burnside's operations, as given in his report:

Col. Crook's brigade was ordered to storm the bridge. This bridge, No. 3, is a stone structure of three arches, with stone parapets. The banks of the stream on the opposite side are precipitous, and command the eastern approaches to the bridge. On the hill side immediately by the bridge was a stone fence running parallel to the stream, the turns of the roadway as it wound up the hill were covered by rifle pits and breastworks of rails, &c. These works and the woods that covered the slopes were filled with the enemy's riflemen, and batteries were in position to enfilade the bridge and its approaches.

Gen. Rodman was ordered to cross the ford below the bridge. From Col. Crook's position it was found impossible to carry the bridge.

Gen. Sturgis was ordered to make a detail from his division for that purpose. He sent forward the 2d Maryland and 6th New Hampshire. These regiments made several successive attacks in the most gallant style, but were driven back.

The artillery of the left were ordered to concentrate their fire on the woods above the bridge. Col. Crook brought a section of Capt. Simmon's battery to a position to command the bridge. The 51st New York, and 51st Pennsylvania, were then ordered to assault the bridge. Taking advantage of a small spur of the hills which ran parallel to the river, they moved towards the bridge. From the crest of this spur they rushed, with bayonet fixed, and cleared the bridge.

The division followed the storming party, also the brigade of Col. Crook, as support. The enemy withdrew to still higher ground, some five or six hundred yards beyond, and opened a fire of artillery on the troops in the new positions on the crest of the hill above the bridge.

Gen. Rodman's division succeeded in crossing the ford, after a sharp fire of musketry and artillery, and joined on the left of Sturgis; Scammon's brigade crossing as support. Gen. Wilcox's division was ordered across to take position on Gen. Sturgis's right.

These dispositions being completed about 3 o'clock, the command moved forward, except Sturgis's division left in reserve. Clark's and Darrell's batteries accompanied Rodman's division; Cook's battery with Wilcox's division, and a section of Simmons's battery with Crook's brigade. A section of Simmon's battery, and Mullenburgh's and McMullin's batteries were in position. The order for the advance was obeyed by the troops with alacrity. Gen. Wilcox's division, with Crook in support, moved up on both sides of the turnpike leading from the bridge to Sharpsburg. Gen. Rodman's division, supported by Scammon's brigade, on the left of Gen. Wilcox. The enemy retreated before the advance of the troops. The 9th New York, of Gen. Rodman's division, captured one of the enemy's batteries, and held it for some time. As the command was driving the enemy to the main heights on the left of the town, the light division of Gen. A. P. Hill arrived upon the field of battle, from Harper's Ferry, and with a heavy artillery fire made a strong attack on the extreme left. To meet this attack, the left division diverged from the line of march intended, and opened a gap between it and the right. To fill up this, it was necessary to order the troops from the second line. During these movements, Gen. Rodman was mortally wounded. Col. Harland's brigade, of Gen. Rodman's division, was driven back. Col. Scammon's brigade, by a change of front to rear on his right flank, saved the left from being driven completely in. The fresh troops of the enemy pouring in, and the accumulation of artillery against this command, destroyed all hope of its being able to accomplish any thing more.

It was now nearly dark. Gen. Sturgis was ordered forward to support the left. Notwithstanding the hard work in the early part of the day, his division moved forward with spirit. With its assistance, the enemy were checked and held at bay.

The command was ordered to fall back by Gen. Cox, who commanded, on the field, the troops engaged in this attack beyond the Antietam. The artillery had been well served during the day. Night closed the long and desperately contested battle of the 17th. Nearly 209,000 men, and 500 pieces of artillery, were for fourteen hours engaged in this memorable battle. We had attacked the enemy in a position selected by the experienced engineer then in person directing their operations. We had driven them from their line on one flank, and secured a footing within it on the other. The army of the Potomac, notwithstanding the moral effect incident to previous reverses, had achieved a victory over an adversary invested with the prestige of recent success. Our soldiers slept that night, conquerors, on a field won by their valor, and covered with the dead and wounded of the enemy.

CONDITION OF THE ARMY AFTER ANTIETAM.

The night, however, brought with it grave responsibilities. Whether to renew the attack on the 18th, or to defer it, even with the risk of the enemy's retirement, was the question befors me. After a night of anxious deliberation, and a full and careful survey of the situation and condition of our army, and the strength and position of the enemy, I concluded that the success of an attack on the 18th was not certain. I am aware of the fact, that under ordinary circumstances, a general is expected to risk a battle if he has a reasonable prospect of success; but at this critical juncture I should have had a narrow view of the condition of the country, had I been willing to hazard another battle with less than an absolute assurance of success. At that moment—Virginia and Washington menaced, Maryland invaded—the national cause could afford no risks of defeat. One battle lost, and almost all would have been lost. Lee's army might then have marched and pleased on Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia or New York. It could have levied its supplies from a fertile and undevastated country; exacted tribute from wealthy and populous cities; and was nowhere east of the Alleghanies, was there any other organized force able to arrest its march.

The following are among the considerations which led me to doubt the certainty of success in attacking before the 19th.

The troops were greatly overcome by the fatigue and exhaustion attendant upon the long continued and severely contested battle of the 17th, together with the long day and night marches to which they had been subjected during the previous three days.

The supply trains were in the rear, and many of the troops had suffered from hunger. They required rest and refreshment.

One division of Sumner's, and all of Hooker's corps, on the right, had, after fighting most valiantly for several hours, been overpowered by numbers, driven back in great disorder, and much scattered; so that they were for the time somewhat demoralized.

In Hooker's corps, according to the return made by Gen. Meade, commanding, there were but 6729 men present on the 18th: whereas, on the morning of the 22d, there were 13,093 men present for duty in the same corps, showing that previous to, and during the battle, 6364 men were separated from their command.

Gen. Meade, in an official communication upon this subject, dated Sept. 18, 1862, says: "I enclose a field return of the corps made this afternoon which I desire you will lay before the commanding-general. I am satisfied the great reduction in the corps since the recent engagements, is not due solely to the casualties of battle, and that a considerable number of men are still in the rear some having dropped out on the march, and many dispersing and leaving yesterday during the fight. I think the efficiency of the corps, so far as it goes good. To resist an attack in our present strong position, I think they may be depended on; and I hope they will perform duty in case we make an attack, though I do not think their morale is as good for an offensive as a defensive movement."

One division of Sumner's Corps had also been overpowered, and was a good deal scattered and demoralized. It was not deemed by its corps commander, in proper condition to attack the enemy vigorously the next day.

Some of the new troops on the left, although many of them fought well during a part of the battle, and are entitled to great credit, were, at ose of the action, driven back, and their ord impaired.

Of he morning of the 18th, Gen. Burnside re- osed me to send him another division to assist olding his position on the other side of the ntiam, and to enable him to withdraw his rp if he should be attacked by a superior force. e gve me the impression that if he were at- ck again that morning, he would not be able ke a very vigorous resistance. I visited his sion early, determined to send General Mo- ll's division to his aid, and directed that it should pced on this side of the Antietam, in order ht might cover the retreat of his own corps m the other side of the Antietam, should that cce necessary, at the same time it was in po- to reinforce our centre or right, if that were ed. Late in the afternoon, I found that al- ou he had not been attacked, General Burn- de ad withdrawn his own corps to this side of e Antietam, and sent over Morell's division alone ld the opposite side.

A rge number of our heaviest and most effi- batteries had consumed all their ammuni- n h the 16th and 17th, and it was impossible supply them until late on the following day. Supplies of provision and forage had to be un up and issued, and infantry ammunition buted.

Fully, reinforcements to the number of 14,000 o say nothing of troops from Pennsylvania, ot arrived, but were expected during the

The 18th was therefore spent in collecting the p sed, giving rest to the fatigued, removing ounded, burying the dead, and the necessary rations for a renewal of the battle.

The reinforcements, Couch's division, march- ith commendable rapidity, came up into position at a late hour in the morning. Hnmphrey's division of new troops, in their anxiety to participate in the battle, which was raging when they received the order to march from Frederick, at about half past 3 P. M. on the 17th, pressed forward during the entire night, and the mass of the diviston reached the army on the following morning. Having marched more than twenty-three miles after 4 1-2 o'clock on the preceding afternoon, they were of course greatly exhausted, and needed rest and refreshment. Large reinforcements expected from Pennsylvania never arrived.

During the 18th, orders were given for a renewal of the attack at daylight on the 19th.

On the night of the 18th, the enemy, after passing troops in the latter part of the day from the Virginia shore, to their position behind Sharpsburg, as seen by our officers, suddenly formed the design of abandoning their position aud retreating across the river.

As their line was but a short distance from the river, the evacuation presented but little difficulty, and was effected before daylight.

About 2,700 of the enemy's dead were, under the direction of Major Davis, assistant-inspector-general, counted and buried upon the battle-field of Antietam. A portion of their dead had been previously buried by the enemy. This is conclusive evidence that the enemy sustained much greater loss than we.

Thirteen guns, thirty-nine colors, upwards of fifteen thousand stand of small arms, and more than six thousand prisoners, were the trophies which attest the success of our arms in the battles of South Mountain, Crampton's Gap, and Antietam.

Not a single gun or color was lost by our army during these battles.

Head-Quarters Army of the Potomac,
Camp near Sharpsburg, Sept. 29, 1862.

Special. S. W., Assistant Adj't Gen.

Estimate of the forces under the confederate General Lee, made up by direction of Gen. from information obtained by the examination of prisoners, deserters, spies, &c., previous to the battle of Antietam, is as follows:

T. J. Jackson's Corps,	24,778 Men
James Longstreeet's Corps,	23,342 "
D. H. Hill's 2 Divisions,	15,525 "
J. E. B. Stuart's Cavalry,	6,400 "
Ransom's and Jenkins's Brigades,	3,000 "
Forty-six Reg'ts not includ'd in above,	18,400 "
Artillery, estimated at 400 guns,	6,000 "
Total,	97,445 "

These estimates give the actual numbers of present and fit for duty.

Our own forces at the battle of Antietam were as follows:

1st Corps,	14,856 Men
2d Corps,	18,813 "
3d Corps, (one division not ar'd,)	12,930 "
5th Corps,	12,300 "
6th Corps,	13,819 "
9th Corps,	10,126 "
Cavalry Division,	4,320 "
Total in action,	87,164 "

OPERATIONS AFTER ANTIETAM.

When our cavalry advance reached the river on the morning of the 19th, it was discovered that nearly all the enemy's forces had crossed into Virginia during the night, their rear escaping under the cover of eight batteries, placed in strong positions upon the elevated bluffs on the opposite bank.

General Porter, commanding the 5th Corps, ordered a detachment from Griffin's and Barnes's brigades, under General Griffin, to cross the river and clark and carry the enemy's batteries. This was gallantly done under the fire of the enemy. Several guns, caissons, etc., were taken, and their supports driven back half a mile.

The information obtained during the progress of this affair, indicated that the mass of the enemy had retreated on the Charlestown and Martinsburg roads towards Winchester. To verify this, and to ascertain how far the enemy had retreated, General Porter was authorized to detach from his corps. on the morning of the 20th, a reconnoitering party in greater force. This detachment crossed the river, and advanced about a mile, when it was attacked by a large body of the enemy lying in ambush in the woods, and driven back across the river with considerable loss. This reconnoisance showed that the enemy was still in force on the Virginia bank of the Potomac, prepared to resist our further advance.

It was reported to me on the 19th that General Stuart had made his appearance at Williamsport with some four thousand cavalry and six pieces of artillery, and that ten thousand infantry were marching on the same point from the direction of Winchester. I ordered General Couch to march at once with his division, and a part of Pleasanton's cavalry, with Frankiin's corps within supporting distance, for the purpose of endeavoring to capture this force. General Couch made a prompt and rapid march to Williamsport, and attacked the enemy vigorously, but they made their escape across the river.

I dispatched the following telegraphic report to the general-in-chief:

Headq's, Army of the Potomac, Sharpsburg, Sept. 19, 1862.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. Halleck, Comd'g. U. S. Army,—. have the honor to report that Maryland is entirely freed from the presence of the enemy, who has been driven across the Potomac. No fears need now be entertained for the safety of Pennsylvania. I shall at once occupy Harper's Ferry.

G. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

On the following day I received this telegram:

Washington, Sept. 20, 1862. 2 P.M.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC,—We are still left entirely in the dark in regard to your own movements and those of the enemy. This should not be so. You should keep me advised of both, so far as you know them. H. W. Halleck, Gen.-in-Chief.

To which I answered as follows:

Headq's, Army of the Potomac, near Sharpsburg, Sept. 20, 1862. 8 P.M.

Maj.-Gen. Halleck, Gen.-in-Chief, Washington. Your telegram of to-day is received. I telegraphed you yesterday all I knew, and had nothing more to inform you of until this evening. Williams's corps (Banks's) occupied Maryland Heights at 1 P.M. to-day. The rest of the army is near here, except Couch's division, which is at this moment engaged with the enemy in front of Williamsport. The enemy is retiring via Charlestown and Martinsburg on Winchester. He last night re-occupied Williamsport by a small force, but will be out of it by morning. I think he has a force of infantry near Sharpstown.

I regret that you find it necessary to couch every dispatch I have the honor to receive from you, in a spirit of fault-finding, and that you have not yet found leisure to say one word in commendation of the recent achievements of this army, or even to allude to them.

I have abstained from giving the number of guns, colors, small arms, prisoners, &c., captured, until I could do so with some accuracy. I hope by to-morrow evening to be able to give at least an approximate statement.

G. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

On the same day I telegraphed as follows:

Headq's, Army of the Potomac, Sept. 20, 1862.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. Halleck, Comd'g U. S. Army. As the rebel army, now on the Virginia side of the Potomac, must in a great measure be dependent for supplies of ammunition and provisions upon Richmond, I would respectfully suggest that General Banks be directed to send out a cavalry force to cut their supply communications opposite Washington. This would seriously embarass their operations, and will aid this army materially.

G. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

Maryland Heights were occupied by Gen. Williams's corps on this day, and on the 22d Gen. Sumner took possession of Harper's Ferry.

It will be remembered that at the time I was assigned to the command of the forces for the defense of the national capital, on the 2d day of September, 1862, the greater part of all the available troops were suffering under the disheartening influences of the serious defeat they had encountered during the brief and unfortunate campaign of General Pope. Their numbers were greatly reduced by casualities—their confidence was much shaken, and they had lost something of that esprit-du-corps which is indispensable to the efficiency of an army. Moreover they had left behind, lost, or worn out the greater part of their clothing and camp equipage, which required renewal before they could be in proper condition to take the field again.

The intelligence that the enemy was crossing the Potomac into Maryland, was received in Washington on the 4th of September, and the Army of the Potomac was again put in motion, under my direction, on the following day—so that but a very brief interval of time was allowed to reorganize, or procure supplies.

The sanguinary battles of South Mountain and Antietam, fought by this Army a few days afterwards, with the reconnoissances immediately following, resulted in a loss to us of ten general officers, many regimental and company officers, and a large number of enlisted men; amounting in the aggregate to 15,220. Two army corps had been badly cut up, scattered and somewhat demoralized in the action of the 17th.

In Gen. Sumner's corps alone, 41 commissioned officers and 819 enlisted men had been killed; 4 general officers, 89 other commissioned officers, and 3,708 enlisted men had been wounded; besides 548 missing; making the aggregate loss of this splendid veteran corps, in this one battle, 5,209.

In Gen. Hooker's corps the casualities of the same engagement amounted to 2619.

The entire army had been greatly exhausted by unavoidable overwork, fatiguing marches, hunger, and want of sleep and rest, previous to the last battle.

When the enemy recrossed the Potomac into Virginia, the means of transportation at my disposal were inadequate to furnish a single day's supply of subsistence in advance.

Many of the troops were new levies, some of whom had fought like veterans, but the morale of others had been a good deal impaired in those severely contested actions, and they required time to recover, as well as to acquire the necessary drill and discipline.

Under these circumstances, I did not feel authorized to cross the river with the main army, over a very deep and difficult ford in pursuit of the retreating enemy, known to be in strong force on the south bank, and thereby place that stream, which was liable at any time to rise above a fording stage, between my army and its base of supply.

I teleg aphed on the 22d to the General-in-chief as follows:

"As soon as the exigencies of the service will admit of it, this army should be reorganized. It is absolutely necessary to secure its efficiency, that the old skeleton regiments should be filled up at once, and officers appointed to supply the numerous existing vacancies. There are instances where captains are commanding regiments, companies are without a single commissioned cer."

On the 23d, the following was telegraphed the General-in-chief:

Headq's, Army of the Potomac, Near Shepher town, Sept. 23, 1862. 9.30 A.M.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. Halleck, Gen.-in-Chief, Wasl

From several different sources, I learn that G R. E. Lee is still opposite to my position at Le town, between Shepherdstown and Martinsbu and that Gen. Jackson is on the Opequan Cre about three miles from its mouth, both with la force. There are also indications of heavy re forcements moving towards them from Winch ter and Charlestown. I have therefore orde Gen. Franklin to take position with his corps the cross roads, about one mile northwest of kersville, on the Bakersville and Williamport ro and Gen. Couch to establish his division n Downsville, leaving sufficient force at Willian port to watch and guard the ford at that pla The fact of the enemy remaining so long in o front, and the indications of an advance of re forcements, seem to indicate that he will give another battle with all his available force.

As I mentioned to you before, our army h been very much reduced by casualities in the cent battles, and in my judgment all the reinforc ments of old troops that can possibly be dispens with around Washington and other places, shou be instantly pushed forward by rail to this arm A defeat at this juncture would be ruinous to o cause. I cannot think it possible that the enem will bring any forces to bear upon Washingt till after the question is decided here, but if th should, troops can soon be sent back from th army by rail to reinforce the garrison there.

The evidence that I have that reinforcemen are coming to the rebel army, consists in the fact that long columns of dust extending from Wi chester to Charlestown, and from Charlestown i this direction, and also troops moving this wa were seen last evening. This is corroborated b citizens. Gen. Sumner, with his corps and Wi liams's (Banks's), occupies Harper's Ferry, and th surrounding heights. I think he will be able t hold his position until reinforcements arrive.

G. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen.

On the 27th I made the following report:

Headq's, Army of the Potomac, Sept. 27, 1862 10 A.M.

Maj.-Gen. Halleck, Gen.-in-Chief, Washington—

All the information in my possession, goes t prove that the main body of the enemy is concen trated not far from Martinsburg, with some troop at Charlestown, not many in Winchester. Thei movements of late, have been an extension toward our right, and beyond it. They are receiving re inforcements in Winchester, mainly, I think, o conscripts, perhaps entirely so.

This army is not now in condition to undertak another campaign, nor to bring on another battle unless great advantages are offered by some mis take of the enemy, or pressing military exigencie render it necessary. We are greatly deficient i officers. Many of the old regiments are reduce to mere skeletons; the new regiments need uct n. Not a day should be lost in filling the re ments—our main dependence; and in sup-ing vacancies among the officers by promotion.

My present purpose is to hold the army about it now, rendering Harper's Ferry secure, and to g the river closely, intending to attack the my should he attempt to cross to this side.
Do possession of Harper's Ferry gives us the ad vantage of a secure debouche, but we ma avail ourselves of it until the railroad dg is finished, because we cannot otherwise pp a greater number of troops than we now ve the Virginia side at that point. When r rises so that the enemy cannot cross in co purpose concentrating the army some-ne near Harper's Ferry and there acting ac-di te oircumstances, viz; moving on Wines, if from the position and attitude of the en we are likely to gain a great advantage by ng o, or else devoting a reasonable time to o anization of the army instruetion of the v oops, preparatory to an advance on what-r e may be determined. In any event I red as absoluteiy necessary to send new regiit t once to the old corps, for purposes of inon, and that the old regiments be filled at
e. I have no fears as to an attack on Wash-

REORGANIZATION AND SUPPLIES.

The work of reorganizing, drilling, and sup-ing the army I began at the earliest moment.
The different corps were stationed aloug the river in the best positions to cover and guard the fords. The great extent of the river front, from near Washington to Cumberland, (some one hundred and fifty miles), together with the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was to be carefully watched and guarded, to prevent, if possible, tho enemy's raids. Reconnoissances upon the Virginia side of the river, for the purpose of learning the enemy's positions and movements, were made frequently, so that our cavalry, which,
from the time we left Washington, had performed the most laborious service, and had from the commencement been deficient in numbers, was found totally fnadequate to tne requirements of the army.

This overwork had broken down the greater part of the horses, disease had appeared among them, and but a very small portion of our original cavalry force was fit for service.

To such an extent had this arm become reduced that when Gsn. Stuart made his raid into Pennsylvania, on the 12th of October with 2,000 men, I could only mount 800 men to follow him.

Harper's Ferry was occupied on the 22d, and in order to prevent a catastrophe similar to the one which had happened to Col. Miles, I immediately ordered Maryland, Bolivar, and London Heights to be strongly fortified. This was done as far as the time and means at our disposal permitted.

The main army of the enemy during this time remained in the vicinity of Martinsburg and Bunker Hill, and occupied itself in drafting and coercing every able-bodied citizen into the ranks, forcibly taking their property where it was not voluntarily offered, burning bridges, and destroying railroads.

On the first day of October, His Excellency the President, honored the army of the Potomac with a visit, and remained several days, during which he went through the different encampments, reviewed the troops, and went over the battle-fields of South Mountaiu and Antietam. I had the opportunity during this visit to describe to him the operations of the army since the time it left Washington, and gave him my reasons for not following the enemy after he crossed the Potomac.

On the 5th of October the division of General Cox (about 5,000 men,) was ordered from my command to Western Virginia.

On the 7th of October I received the following telegram:

Washington, D. C., Oct. 6, 1862.

Maj.-Gen. McClellan:—I am instructed to telegraph you as follows: The President directs that you cross the Potomac and give battle to the enemy, or drive him south. Your army must move now, while the roads are good. If you cross the river between the enemy and Washington, and cover the latter by your operations, you can be reinforced with 30,000 men. If you move up the valley of the Shenandoah, not more than 12,000 or 15,000 can be sent to you. The President advises the interior line between Washington and the enemy, but does not order it. He is very desirous that your army move as soon as possible.
You will immediately report what line you adopt, and when you intend to cross the river. Also, to what point the reinforcements are to be sent. It is necessary that the plan of your operations be positively determined on before orders are given for building bridges and repairing railroads. I am directed to add, that the Secretary of War and the General-in-chief fully concur with the President in these instructions.

H. W. H., General-in-Chief.

At this time Gen. Averell, with the greater part of our efficient cavalry, was in the vicinity of Cumberland, and Gen. Kelly, the commanding officer, had that day reported that a large force of the enemy was advancing on Col. Campbell at St. John's Run. This obliged me to order Gen. Averill to proceed with his force to the support of Col. Campbell, which delayed his return to the army for several days.

On the 10th of October Stuart crossed the river at McCoy's Ferry, with 2,000 cavalry and a battery of horse artillery, on his raid into Maryland and Pennsylvania, making it necessary to use all our cavalry against him. This exhausting service completely broke down nearly all of our cavalry horses, and rendered a remount absolutely indispensable, before we conld advance on the enemy.

The following were the dispositions of troops made by me to defeat the purposes of this raid.

Gen. Averell, then at Green Spring, on the Upper Potomac, was ordered to move rapidly down upon the north side of the river, with all his disposable cavalry, using every exertion to get upon the trail of the enemy and follow it up vigorously.

Gen. Pleasonton, with the remaining cavalry force, was ordered to take the road by Cavetown, Harmon's Gap, and Mechanicsville, and cut off the retreat of the enemy, should he make for any of the fords below the position of the main army. His orders were to pursue them with the utmost rapidity, not to spare his men or horses, and to destroy or capture them if possible.

Gen. Crook, at that time commanding Cox's division at Hancock, en route for Western Virginia, was ordered to halt, place his men in cars, and remain in readiness to move to any point above, should the enemy return in that direction, keeping his scouts well out on all the roads leading from the direction of Chambersburg to the Upper Potomac.

The other commanders between Hancock and Harper's Ferry were instructed to keep a vigilant watch upon all the roads and fords, so as to prevent the escape of the rebels within these limits.

Gen. Burnside was ordered to send two brigades to the Monocacy crossing, there to remain in cars, with steam up, ready to move to any point on the railroad to which Stuart might be aiming. While Col. Rush, at Frederick, was directed to keep his lancers scouting on the approaches from Chambersburg, so as to give timely notice to the commander of the two brigades at the Monocacy crossing.

Gen. Soneman, whose head-quarters were then at Poolesville, occupying with his division the different fords on the river below the mouth of the Monocacy was directed to keep his cavalry well out on the approaches from the direction of Frederick, so as to give him time to mass his troops at any point where the enemy might attempt to cross the Potomac in his vicinity. He was informed of Gen. Pleasonton's movements.

After the orders were given for covering the fords upon the river, I did not think it possible for Stuart to recross, and I believed that the capture or destruction of his entire force was perfectly certain, but owing to the fact that my orders were not in all cases carried out as I expected, he effected his escape into Virginia without much loss.

The troops sent by Gen. Burnside to the Monocacy, owing to some neglect in not giving the necessary orders to the commander, instead of remaining at the railroad crossing as I directed marched four miles into Frederick, and there remained until after Stuart had passed the railroad only six miles below, near which point it is said he halted for breakfast.

Gen. Pleasonton ascertained, after his arrival at Mechanicstown, that the enemy were then about an hour ahead of him, beating a hasty retreat towards the mouth of the Monocacy, and pushed on vigorously, and near to its mouth overtook them with a part of his force, having marched seventy-eight miles in twenty-four hours, having left many of his horses broken down upon the road. He at once attacked with his artillery and the firing continued for several hours, during which time, he states that he received the support of a small portion of Gen. Stoneman's command, not sufficient to inflict any material damage upon the enemy.

Gen. Stoneman reports, that in accordance with his instructions, he gave all necessary orders for intercepting the return of the rebels, and that Staples, commanding one of the brigades, stated that he sent two regiments of infantry to the mouth of the Monocacy, and one regiment to White's Ford. That on the morning of the 12th about 10 o'clock he, by Gen. Stoneman's order, marched the remaining three regiments of his command from Poolesville towards the mouth of the Monocacy; that before getting into action he was relieved by Gen. Ward, who states that he reported to Gen. Pleasonton with his command while the enemy was crossing the river, and was informed by him (Gen. Pleasonton) that he was too late, and that nothing could be done then.

Gen. Pleasonton, in his report of this affair says:

"It was at this time that Col. Ward reported to me from Gen. Stoneman's division, with a brigade of infantry, a regiment of cavalry, and a section of artillery. I told him that his command could be of no use, as the enemy had then crossed the river. These are the only troops that I know of, that were in that vicinity, and this was the first intimation that I received that any troops were endeavoring to assist me in capturing the rebels. I succeeded in preventing the enemy from crossing at the mouth of the Monocacy, and drove him to White's Ford, three miles below. Had White's Ford been occupied by any force of ours previous to the time of the occupation by the enemy, the capture of Stuart's whole force would ve been certain and inevitable; but with my all force, which did not exceed one-fourth of e emy's it was not practicable for me to ci that ford, while the enemy was in front." It ould seem from the report of Gen. Stone- an at the disposition he made of his troops e vis to the arrival of Stuart, was a good one. e tioned two regiments at the mouth of the on acy, and two regiments at White's Ford, e ter in the very place where the crossing e ade, and the former only three miles off, th reserve of three regiments at Poolesville, me x miles distant. Gen. Pleasonton's report ow that from the time the firing commened, th e enemy were across the river, was about n d a-half hours. Gen. Stoneman states, that ted the reserve from Poolesville at about 'l k; but it appears from the report of Gen. n ton, that it did not reach him till half-past

A e time I received the order of October 6th c s the river and attack the enemy, the ar- s wholly deficient in cavalry, and a large t our troops were in want of shoes, blank- l other indispensable articles of clothing, w standing all the efforts that had been made s e battle of Antietam, and even prior to t te, to refit the army with clothing as well e es. I at once consulted with Col. Ingalls, ef quartermaster, who believed that the a ry articles could be supplied in about e ays. Orders were immediately issued to f erent commanders who had not already t their requisitions, to do so at once, and all n essary steps were forthwith taken by me r e a prompt delivery of the supplies. The u tions were forwarded to the proper de- t nt at Washington, and I expected that the s would reach our depots during the three p ecified; but day after day elapsed, and on- l all portion of the clothing arrived. Corps n nders, upon receiving notice from the r masters that they might expect to receive r upplies at certain dates. sent their trains t m, which after waiting, were compelled to u empty. Several instances occurred where t rains went back and forth, from the camp h depots, as often as four or five different e without receiving their supplies; and I i formed by one corps commander, that his t train had travelled over 150 miles, to and h he depots, before he succeeded in obtain- s clothing.

I corps of Gen. Franklin did not get its l g until after it had crossed the Potomac, a as moving into Virginia.

a de every exertion in my power, and my q rmaster did the same, to have these sup- h urried forward rapidly, and I was repeat- t old that they had filled the requisitions at i ington, and that the supplies had been for- w d. But they did not come to us, and of e were inaccessible to the army. I did not make frequent representations of this condition of things to the General-in chief, and it appears that he referred the matter to the quartermaster-general, who constantly replied that the supplies had been promptly ordered: notwithstanding this they did not reach our depots.

The following extracts are from telegrams upon this subject.

Maj-Gen. Halleck, General-in-Chief, Washington:

. . . "We have been making every effort to get supplies of clothing for this army, and Col. Ingalls has received advices that it has been forwarded by railroad, but owing to bad management on the roads, or from some other cause, it comes in very slowly, and it will take a much longer time than was anticipated, to get articles that are absolutely indispensable to the army, unless the railroad managers forward supplies more rapidly." Maj-Gen. H. W. H.—"I am compelled again to call your attention to the great deficiency of shoes and other indispensable articles of clothing that still exist in some of the corps of this army. Upon the assurances of the chief quartermaster, who based his calculations upon information received from Washington, that clothing would be forwarded at certain times, corps commanders sent their wagons to Hagerstown and Harper's Ferry for it. It did not arrive as promised, and has not yet arrived. Unless some measures are taken to insure the prompt forwarding of these supplies, there will necessarily be a corresponding delay in getting the army ready to move, as the men cannot march without shoes.

Headquarters Army of the Potomac,
October 14, 1862. 7 P. M.

Major.-Gen. H. W. H., Commander-in-Chief: With my small cavalry force it is impossible for me to watch the line of the Potomac properly, or even make the reconnoissances that are necessary for our movements. This makes it necessary for me to weaken my line very much, by extending the infantry to guard the innumerable fords. This will continue until the river rises, and it will be next to impossible to prevent the rebel cavalry raids. My cavalry force, as I urged this morning, should be largely and immediately increased under any hypothesis, whether to guard the river or advance on the enemy, or both.

Geo. B. McC., Major-General.

The following is an extract from the official report of Col. Ingalls:

"Immediately after the battle of Antietam, efforts were made to supply deficiencies in clothing and horses.

"Large requisitions were prepared and sent in. The artillery and cavalry required large numbers to cover losses sustained in battle, on the march, and by diseases. Both of these arms were deficient when they left Washington.

"A most violent and destuctive disease made its appearance at this time, which put nearly 4,000 animals out of service. Horses reported perfectly well one day, would be dead lame the next, and it was difficult to foresee where it would end or what number would cover the loss. They were attacked in the hoof and tongue. No one seemed able to account for the appearance of this disease. Animals kept at rest would recover in time, but could not be worked. I made application to send West and purchase horses at once, but it was refused on the ground that the outstanding contracts provided for enough; but they were not delivered sufficiently fast, nor in sufficient numbers, until late in October and early in November. I was authorised to buy 2,500 late in October but the delivery was not completed until late in November, after we had reached Warrenton."

In a letter from Gen. Meigs, written on the 14th of October, and addressed to the general-in-chief, it is stated, "There have been issued, therefore, to the army of the Potomac, since the battles in front of Washington, to replace losses, 9,254."

What number of horses were sent to General Pope before his return to Washington, I have no means of determining, but the following statements, made upon my order by the chief quartermaster with the army, and who had means for gaining accurate information, forces upon my mind the conclusion that the quarter-master-general was in error:

About 3,000 horses have been turned over to the quarter-master department by officers, as unfit for service. Nearly 1,500 should now be turned over also, being worn out and diseased.

Respectfully submitted,

F. M., Lt.-Col. & Quarter-master.

This official statement made up from the reports of the quarter-masters who received and distributed the horses, exhibits the true state of the case, and gives the total number of horses received by the army of the Potomac and the troops around Washington, during a period of eight weeks, as 7,176, or 2,078 less than the number stated by the quarter-master-general.

Supposing that (1,500) fifteen hundred were issued to the army under Gen. Pope previous to its return to Washington, as Gen. Meigs states, there would still remain (578) five hundred and seventy-eight horses which he does not account for.

The letter of the general-in-chief to the Secretary of War, on the 28th of October, and the letter of Gen. Meigs to the general-in-chief, on the 14th of October, convey the impression that, upon my urgent and repeated applications for cavalry and artillery horses for the army of the Potomac, I had received a much greater number than was really the case.

It will be seen, from Col. Myers' report, that all of the horses alluded to by Gen. Meigs, only (3,813) three thousand eight hundred and thirteen came to the army, with which I was ordered to follow and attack the enemy. Of course the remainder did not in the slightest degree contribute to the efficiency of the cavalry or artillery of this army, with which I was to cross the river, neither did they in the least facilitate any preparations for carrying out the order to advance upon the enemy, as the general-in-chief's letter might seem to imply.

During the same period that we were receiving the horses alluded to, about (3,000) three thousand of our old stock were turned into the quarter-master's department, and 1,500 more reported as in such condition that they ought to be turned in as unfit for service, thus leaving the active army some 700 short of the number required to make good existing deficiencies, to say nothing of providing remounts for men whose horses had died or been killed during the campaign, and those previously dismounted.

Notwithstanding all the efforts made to ob a remount, there were, after deducting the f engaged in picketing the river, but about a t sand serviceable cavalry horses on the 21st of October.

In a letter, dated October 14th, 1862, the g ral-in-chief says: "It is also reported to me the number of animals with your army in the is about 31,000. It is believed that your pre proportion of cavalry and of animals is m larger than that of any other of our armies."

What number of animals our other armies I am not prepared to say, but military me European armies have been of the opinion an army to be efficient, while carrying on ac operations in the field, should have a cav force equal in numbers to from one-sixth to fourth of the infantry force. My cavalry did amount to one-twentieth part of the army, hence the necessity of giving every one of cavalry soldiers a serviceable horse.

Cavalry may be said to constitute the ante of an army. It scouts all the roads in fron the flanks, and in the rear of the advan columns, and constantly feels the enemy. amount of labor falling upon this arm during Maryland campaign was excessive. To per not familiar with the movements of troops, the amount of transportation required for a l army marching away from water or railroad munications, the number of animals menti by the general-in-chief may have appeared u cessarily large, but to a military man who t the trouble to enter into an accurate and det computation of the number of pounds of sub ance and forage required for such an arm that of the Potomac, it will be seen that the 31 animals were considerably less than was a lutely necessary to an advance. As we wer quired to move through a country which c not be depended upon for any of our supplie became necessary to transport every thin wagons, and to be prepared for all emergen I did not consider it safe to leave the river w out subsistence and forage for ten days.

The official returns of that date show the ag gate strength of the army for duty to have about 110,000 men of all arms. This did no clude teamsters, citizen employees, officers' vants, &c., amounting to some 12,000 men, w gives a total of 122,000 men. The subsist alone of this army, for ten days, required fo transportation 1,830 wagons at 2,000 pound the wagon, and 10,980 animals.

Our cavalry horses, at that time, amounte 5,046, and our artillery horses to 6,836.

To transport full forage for these 22 862 mals for ten days required 17,832 additional mals, and this forage would only supply the tire number, (40,694) of animals with a s fraction over half allowance for the time sp fied.

It will be observed that this estimate does embrace the animals necessary to transport q termaster's supplies, baggage, camp-equip ambulances, reserve ammunition, forage for cer's horses, etc. etc., which would grearly ment the necessary transportation.

may very truly be said that we did make the h with the means at our disposal, but it will membered that we met with no serious op- ion from the enemy, neither did we encoun- elays from any other cause. The roads were cellent condition, and the troops marched the most commendable order and celerity. we had met with a determined resistance the enemy, and our progress had been very a retarded thereby, we would have consumed supplies before they could have been renewed. roper estimate of my responsibilities as the nander of that army did not justify me in g my preparations for the exhibition upon supposition that I was to have an uninterrupt- arch. On the contrary it was my duty to repared for all emergencies, and not the least ortant of my responsibilities was the duty of ing ample provision for supplying men and als with rations and forage.

nowing the solicitude of the President for an movement, and sharing with him fully his ety for prompt action, on the 21st of Octo- telegraphed to the General-in-chief as fol- :

eadquarters, Army of the Potomac, October 862.

aj-Gen. H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief, shington.—Since the receipt of the President's r to move on the enemy, I have been making y exertion to get this army supplied with hing absolutely necessary for marching. This happy to say, is now nearly accomplished; ve also, during the same time repeatedly urged n you the importance of supplying cavalry artillery horses, to replace those broken down hard service, and steps have been taken to in- a prompt delivery. Our cavalry, even when l supplied with horses, is much inferior in bers to that of the enemy; but in efficiency proved itself superior. So forcibly has this impressed upon our old regiments by repeat- successes, that the men are fully persuaded they are equal to twice their number of reb- avalry.

Exclusive of the cavalry force now engaged in keting the river, I have not at present over ut one thousand horses for service. Officers e been sent in various directions to purchase rses, and I expect them soon. Without more valry horses our communications, from the mo- nt we march, would be at the mercy of the ge cavalry forces of the enemy, and it would t be possible for us to cover our flanks proper- or to obtain the necessary information of the sition and movements of the enemy in such a y as to insure success. My experience has own the necessity of a large and efficient cav- y force. Under the foregoing circumstances I g leave to ask whether the President desires to march on the enemy at once, or to await e reception of the new horses, every possible ep having been taken to insure their prompt rival. G. B. McClellan, Maj-Gen. Comd'g.

On the same day Gen. Halleck replied as fol- ws :

Washington, Oct. 21, 1862. 3 P. M.

Your telegraph of 12 M. has been submitted to the President. He directs me to say, that he has no change to make in his order of the 6th inst. If you have not been, and are not now in condition to obey it, you will be able to show such want of ability. The President does not expect impossibilities; but he is very anxious that all this good weather should not be wasted in inactivity.

Telegraph when you will move, and on what lines you propose to march.

H. W. H., Gen.-in-Chief.

Maj-Gen. G. B. McClellan.

From the tenor of this dispatch I conceived that it was left for my judgment to decide whether or not it was possible to move with safety to the army at that time, and this responsibility I exercised with the more confidence in view of the strong assurances of his trust in me as commander of that army, with which the President had seen fit to honor me during his last visit.

The cavalry requirements without which an advance would have been in the highest degree injudicious and unsafe, were still wanting.

The country before us was an enemy's country, where the inhabitants furnished to the enemy every possible assistance, providing food for men and forage for animals, giving all information concerning our movements, and rendering every aid in their power to the enemy's cause.

It was manifest that we should find it, as we subsequently did, a hostile district, where we could derive no aid from the inhabitants that would justify dispensing with the active co-operation of an efficient cavalry force. Accordingly, I fixed upon the 1st of November as the earliest date at which the forward movement could well be commenced.

The general-in-chief, in a letter to the Secretary of War on the 28th of October, says: "In my opinion there has been no such want of supplies in the army under Gen. McClellan, as to prevent his compliance with the orders to advance against the enemy."

Notwithstanding this opinion expressed by such high authority, I am compelled to say again that the delay in the reception of necessary supplies up to that date, had left the army in a condition totally unfit to advance against the enemy; that an advance under the existing circumstances would, in my judgment, have been attended with the highest degree of peril, with great suffering and sickness among the men, and with imminent danger of being cut off from our supplies by the superior cavalry force of the enemy, and with no reasonable prospect of gaining any advantage over him.

I dismiss this subject with the remark, that I have found it impossible to resist the force of my own convictions, that the commander of an army, who, from the time of its organization, has for eighteen months been in constant communication with its officers and men, the greater part of the time engaged in active service in the field, and who has exercised this command in many battles, must certainly be considered competent to determine whether his army is in proper condition to advance on the enemy or not; and he must necessarily possess greater facilities for forming a correct judgment in regard to the wants of his men, and the condition of his supplies, than the general-in-chief in his office at Washington City.

ADVANCE INTO VIRGINIA.

The movement from Washington into Maryland, which culminated in the battles of South Mountain and Antietam, was not a part of an offensive campaign, with the object of the invasion of the enemy's territory, and an attack upon his capital, but was defensive in its purposes, although offensive in its character, and would be technically called a "defensive-offensive campaign."

It was undertaken at a time when our army had experienced severe defeats, and its object was to preserve the national capital and Baltimore, to protect Pennsylvania from invasion, and to drive the enemy out of Maryland. These purposes were fully and finally accomplished by the battle of Antietam, which brought the army of the Potomac into what might be termed an accidental position on the upper Potomac.

Having gained the immediate object of the campaign, the first thing to be done was to insure Maryland from a return of the enemy; the second, to prepare our own army, exhausted by a series of severe battles, destitute to a great extent of supplies, and very deficient in artillery and cavalry horses, for a definite offensive movement, and to determine upon the line of operations for a further advance.

At the time of the battle of Antietam the Potomac was very low, and presented a comparatively weak line of defense, unless watched by large masses of troops. The re-occupation of Harper's Ferry, and the disposition of troops above that point, rendered the line of the Potomac secure against everything except cavalry raids. No time was lost in placing the army in proper condition for an advance, and the circumstances which caused the delay after the battle of Antietam have been fully enumerated elsewhere.

I never regarded Harper's Ferry or its vicinity as a proper base of operations for a movement upon Richmond. I still considered the line of the Peninsula as the true approach, but, for obvious reasons, did not make any proposal to return to it.

On the 6th of October, as stated above, I was ordered by the President, through the general-in-chief, to cross the Potomac and give battle to the enemy, or drive him south. Two lines were presented for my choice: 1st. Up the valley of the Shenandoah, in which case I was to have 12,000 to 15,000 additional troops: 2d. To cross between the enemy and Washington, that is, east of the Blue Ridge, in which event I was to be reinforced with 30,000 men.

At first I determined to adopt the line of the Shenandoah, for these reasons: The Harper's Ferry and Winchester Railroad, and the various turnpikes converging upon Winchester, afforded superior facilities for supplies.

Our cavalry being weak, this line of communication could be more easily protected. There was no advantage in interposing, at that time, the Blue Ridge and the Shenandoah between the enemy and myself.

At the period in question the Potomac wa very low, and I apprehended that if I crosse river below Harper's Ferry, the enemy promptly check the movement by recrossing Maryland, at the same time covering his rear cupying in strong force the passes leading thr the Blue Ridge from the southest into the nandoah Valley.

I anticipated, as the result of the first co that Lee would fight me near Winchester, could do so under favorable circumstance else that he would abandon the lower Sh doah and leave the army of the Potomac fr act upon some other line of operations. abandoned the Shenandoah, he would nat fall back upon his railway communicatio have since been confirmed in the belief, tha had crossed the Potomac below Harper's Fe the early part of October, General Lee would recrossed into Maryland.

As above explained, the army was not in c tion to move until late in October, and in the t time circumstances had changed.

The period had arrived when a sudden great rise of the Potomac might be looked f any time; the season of bad roads and dil movements was approaching, which would rally deter the enemy from exposing himself far from his base, and his movements all app to indicate a falling back from the river tow his supplies. Under these circumstances I f liberty to disregard the posibility of the en recrossing the Potomac, and determined to s the line east of the Blue Ridge, feeling convi that it would secure me the largest accessio force, and the most cordial support of the I dent, whose views from the beginning we favor of that line.

The subject of the defense of the line o upper Potomac, after the advance of the army, had long occupied my attention; I de to place Harper's Ferry and its dependencies strong state of defense, and frequently addre the general-in-chief upon the subject of the tion of field-works and permanent bridges t asking for the funds necessary to accomplish purpose. Although I did my best to explai clearly as I was able that I did not wish to permanent works of masonry, and that neithe works nor the permanent bridges had any r ence to the advance of the army, but solely to permanent occupation of Harper's Ferry, I c never make the General-in-chief understand wishes, but was refused the funds necessar erect the field-works, on the ground that t was no appropriation for the erection of pe nent fortifications; and was not allowed to b the permanent bridge on the ground that the r army could not be delayed in its movements u its completion. Of course I never thought of laying the advance of the army for that purp end so stated repeatedly.

On the 25th of October I sent the Genera chief the following telegram;

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac, Octo 25, 1862. 10.45 P. M.

Maj-Gen. Halleck, General in chief, Wash ton,—As the moment is at hand for the adva

e army, a question arises for the decision of neral in chief; which although perhaps im- y decided by the President in his letter of th, should be clearly presented by me, as I t regard it as in my province to determine his question is the extent to which the line Potomac should be guarded, after the ar- ves, in order to cover Maryland and Penn- ia, from invasion by large or small parties enemy. It will always be somewhat difficult rd the immediate line of the river, owing great extent and the numerous passages exist. It has long appeared to me that the ay of covering this line would be by occu- Front Royal, Strasburg, Wardensville and elds, at the debouches of the several val- which they are situated. These points, able places in their vicinity, should be ly intrenched and permanently held; and advantage of this arrangement would be overing the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, essential part of the system would be the uction of the link of railway from Win- r to Strasburg, and the rebuilding of the sas Gap Railway bridge over the Shenanintrenchment of Manassas Junction would ete the system for the defense of the ap- nes to Washington and the Upper Potomac. months ago I recommended this arrange- n fact gave orders for it to be carried into I still regard it as essential under all cir- ances.

only troops under my command outside of ganization of the army of the Potomac, are aryland Brigade, under Gen. Kenly, the ennsylvania, Col. Voss; 12th Illinois Cav- nd Col. Davis's 8th New York cavalry; to- 94 infantry, one battery, and about 900 y men. There are also two of my regi- of cavalry, (about 650 men) guarding the ore and Ohio Railroad, between Hancock mberland.

have no department, and command simply ve army in the field, my responsibility for fety of the line of the Potomac and the north of it, must terminate the moment I e so far beyond that line as to adopt anoth- my base of operations. The question for neral in chief to decide, and which I re- s beyond my province, is this:

Shall the safety of Harper's Ferry, and the the Potomac, be regarded as assured by vance of the army south of the Blue Ridge e line left to take care of itself?

If it is deemed necessary to hold the line t hereinbefore indicated in advance of it, any troops shall be p aced there, at what , and in what numbers, and of what compo- at each, and whence shall they be supplied, om this aamy or from other sources?

itting the detached troops mentioned above, e small garrisons of Boonsboro and Fred- the last returns show the strength of this army for duty, to be about one hundred and six- teen thousand officers and men. This includes the divisions of Stoneman and Whipple, but does not include Heintzelman, Sigel and Bayard.

If Harper's Ferry and the river above are ren- dered fully secure, it is possible that the active army, if it spplies the garrisons, may be reduced so much as to be inadequate to the purposes con- templated; if is is preserved intact, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and the Baltimore and Ohio Rail- road may be unduly exposed.

I leave the decision of these grave questions to the general in chief. I know notning of the num- ber of troops in Baltimore, &c.

An important element in the solution of this problem, is the fact that a great portion of Bragg's army is probably now at liberty to unite itself with Lee's command.

I commence crossing the river at Berlin in the morning, and must ask a prompt decision of the questions proposed herein.

G. B. McC., Maj.-Gen. Com.

To which I received the following reply:

Washington, Oct. 26, '62, 1.35 P.M.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McC.:

In addition to the command which you had when I came here, you also have the greater part of that of Maj.-Gen. Pope. Moreover, you have been authorized to use any troops within your reach in Gen. Wool's department, and in Western Virginia. Gen. Banks's command is also under your direction, with the single restriction, that he is not to remove troops from Washington, un- til he has notified me of his orders. Since you left Washington, I have advised and suggested in relation to your movements, but I have given you no orders. I do not give you any now. The government has intrusted you with defeating and driving back the rebel army in your front. I shall not attempt to control you in the measures you may adopt for that purpose; you are inform- ed of my views, but the President has left you at liberty to adopt them or not, as you may deem best. You will also exercise your own discretion in regard to what points on the Potomac, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad are to be occupied or fortified. I will only add that there is no ap propriation for permanent intrenchments on that line. Moreover, I think it will be time enough to decide upon fortifying Front Royal, Strasburg, Wardenville and Morefield, when the enemy is driven south of them, and they come into our possession. I do not think that we need have any immediate fear of Bragg's army. You are within 20 miles of Lee's, while Bragg is distant about 400 miles.

H. W. H., Gen.-in-Chief.

And on the 29th I sent the following:

Headquarters, Army of the Potomac,
Oct. 29, '62, 1.15 P.M.

Maj.-Gen. H. W. H., Washington:

On the 25th instant, I sent you a dispatch, re- questing you to decide what steps should be taken to guard the line of the Potomac, when the army leaves here. To this I received your reply, that I had been intrusted by the President, with defeating and driving away the rebel army, that you had given me no orders heretofore, did not give me any then, etc. Under these circumstances, I have only to make such arrangements for guarding this extended line as the means at my disposal will permit, at the same time keeping in view the extreme necessity of maintaining the moving army in adequate force to meet the rebel army before us.

The dispositions I have ordered are as follows, viz.: 10,000 men to be left at Harper's Ferry, one brigade of infantry in front of Sharpsburg; Kenly's brigade of infantry at Williamsport; Kelly's brigade, including Col. Cambell's 54th Pennsylvania Infantry, at Cumberland; and between that point and Hancock I have also left four small cavalry regiments, to patrol and watch the river and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from Cumberland down to Harper's Ferry.

I do not regard this force as sufficient to cover securely this great extent of line, but I do not feel justified in detaching any more troops from my moving columns. I would therefore recommend that some new regiments of infantry and cavalry be sent to strengthen the forces left by me.

There should be a brigade of infantry and section of artillery in the vicinity of Cherry Run; another brigade at Hancock, an additional brigade at Williamsport, one regiment at Hagerstown, and one at Chambersburg, with a section of artillery at each place if possible. This is on the supposition that the enemy retain a considerable cavalry force west of the Blue Ridge. If they go east of it, the occupation of the points named in my dispatch of the 25th inst., will obviate the necessity of of keeping many of these troops on the river.

There are now several hundred of our wounded, including Gen. Richardson, in the vicinity of Sharpsburg, that cannot possibly be moved at present.

I repeat that I do not look upon the forces I have been able to leave from this army, as sufficient to prevent cavalry raids into Maryland and Pennsylvania, as cavalry is the only description of troops adequate to this service, and I am, as you are aware, deficient in this arm.

Geo. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen. Comd'g.

To which I received, on the 30th, this reply:

Washington, Oct. 30, 1862. 11.30 A.M.

Maj.-Gen. G. B. McClellan,—Your telegram of yesterday was received late last evening. The troops proposed for Thoroughfare Gap will be sent to that place whenever you are in position for their coperation, as previously stated; but no new regiments can be sent from here to the Upper Potomac. The guarding of that line is left to your own discretion, with the troops now under your command.

H. W. H. Gen.-in-Chief

I accordingly left the 12th Corps at Harper's Ferry, detatching one brigade to the vicinity of Sharpsburg. Gen. Morell was placed in command of the line from the mouth of the Antietam to Cumberland, Gen. Slocum in command of Harper's Ferry and the line east of the mouth of the Antietam.

plan of campaign I adopted during the e, was to move the army well in hand to the Blue Ridge, taking Warrenton as nt of direction for the main body seizing ss in the Blue Ridge by detachments, as roached it, and guarding them after we ssed, as long as they would enable the to trouble our communications with the c. It was expected that we would unite e 11th Corps and Sickles's division near ghfare Gap. We depended upon Harper's nd Berlin for supplies, until the Manassas ilway was reached; when that occurred ses in our rear were to be abandoned, and ay massed ready for actfon or movement direction.

On the 31st the 2d Corps moved to the vicinity of Hillsborough; the 6th Corps reached Boonsboro'; the 5th Corps reached Harper's Ferry, one division crossing the Shenandoah.

On the 1st of November the 1st Corps moved to Purcellville and Hamilton; the 2d Corps to Woodgrove; the 5th Corps to Hillsborough; the 6th Corps reached Berlin, one division crossing. Pleasonton's cavalry occupied Philemont, having a sharp skirmish there, and at Bloomfield.

On November 2d the 2d Corps occupied Snicker's Gap; the 5th Corps Snickersville; the 6th Corps crossed the Potomac, and encamped near Wheatland; the 9th Corps advanced to Bloomfield, Union, and Philemont. Pleasonton drove the enemy out of Union; Averell was ordered to join Pleasonton. The enemy offered no serious resistance to the occupation of Snicker's Gap, but advanced to gain possession of it with a column of some 5,000 to 6,000 infantry, who were driven back by a few rounds from our rifled guns.

On the 3d the 1st Corps moved to Philemont-Union, Blomfield, &c.; the 2d Corps to the vicinity of Upperville; the 5th Corps remained at Snicker's Gap; the 6th Corps moved to Purcellville; the 9th Corps moved towards Upperville, Pleasonton drove the enemy out of Upperville after a severe fight.

On the 4th the 2d Corps took possession of Ashley's Gap; the 6th Corps reached Union; the 9th Corps Upperville; the cavalry occupied Piedmont.

On the 5th the 1st Corps moved to Rectortown and White Plains; one division of the 2d Corps to the intersection of the Paris and Piedmont with the Upperville and Barber's road; the 6th Corps to the Aldie turnpike, east of Upperville; the 9th Corps beyond the Manassas Road, between Piedmont and Salem, with a bridge at Manassas Gap; the cavalry under Averell had a skirmish at Manassas Gap, and the brigade of Pleasonton gained a handsome victory over superior numbers at Barber's cross-roads; Bayard's cavalry had some sharp skirmishing in front of Salem.

On the 6th the 1st Corps advanced to Warrenton; the 2d to Rectortown; the 5th Corps commenced its movement from Snicker's Gap to White Plains; the 9th Corps to Waterloo and vicinity, on the Rappahannock; the 11th Corps was at New Baltimore, Thoroughfare, and Hopewell's Gaps; Sickles' division guarding the Orange and Alexandria railroad from Manassas Junction, towards Warrenton Junction; the cavalry near Flint Hill; Bayard to cut off what there might be in Warrenton, and to proceed to the Rappahannock Station.

November 7, Gen. Pleasonton was ordered to move towards Little Washington and Sperryville, and thence towards Culpepper Court House.

November 8th, the 2d Corps moved half way to Warrenton; the 5th Corps to New Baltimore.

November 9th, the 2d and 5th Corps reached Warrenton; the 6th Corps New Baltimore.

Late on the night of the 7th, I received an order relieving me from my command of the army of the Potomac, and directing me to turn it over to Gen. Burnside, which I at once did.

I had already given the orders for the movements of the 8th and 9th; these orders were carried into effect without change.

The position in which I left the army, as the result of the orders I had given, was as follows:

The 1st, 2d and 5th Corps, reserve artillery and general head-quarters at Warrenton; the 9th Corps on the line of the Rappahannock, in the vicinity of Waterloo; the 6th Corps at New Baltimore; the 11th Corps at New Baltimore, Gainesville and Thoroughfare Gap; Sickles's division of the 3d Corps on the Orange and Alexandria railroad, from Manassas Junction to Warrenton Junction; Pleasonton across the Rappahannock, at Amissville, Jefferson, &c., with his pickets on Hazel River, facing Longstreet's, six miles from Culpepper Court House; Bayard near Rappahannock Station.

The army was thus massed near Warrenton, ready to act in any required direction, perfectly in hand, and in admirable condition and spirits. I doubt whether during the whole period that I had the honor to command the army of the Potomac, it was in such excellent condition to fight a great battle.

When I gave up the command to Gen. Burnside, the best information in our possession indicated that Longstreet was immediately in our front near Culpepper; Jackson with one, perhaps both, of the Hills near Chester and Thornton's Gaps, with the mass of their forces west of the Blue Ridge. The reports from General Pleasonton in the advance, indicated the possibility of separating the two wings of the enemy's forces, and either beating Longstreet separately, or forcing him to fall back, at least, upon Gordonsville, to effect his junction with the rest of the army.

The following is from the report of General Pleasonton:

"At this time, and from the 7th inst., my advance pickets were on Hazel river, within six miles of Culpepper, besides having my flank pickets towards Chester and Thornton's Gaps, extended to Gaines's Cross Roads, and Newby's Cross Roads, with numerous patrols in the directions of Woodville, Little Washington, and Sperryville. The information gained by these parties, and also from deserters, prisoners, contrabands, as well as citizens, established the fact of Longstreet with his command being at Culpepper, while Jackson with D. H. Hill, with their respective commands, were in the Shenandoah Valley, on the Western side of the Blue Ridge, covering Chester and Thornton's Gaps, and expecting us to attempt to pass through and attack them. As late as the 17th of November, a contraband just from Strasburg came into my camp and reported that D. H. Hill's corps was two miles beyond that place, on the railroad to Mount Jackson. Hill was tearing up the road and destroying the bridges, under the impression that we intended to follow into that valley, and was en route for Staunton. Jackson's corps was between Strasburg and Winchester. Ewell and A. P. Hill were with Jackson.

Had I remained in command, I should have made the attempt to divide the enemy, as suggested, and could he have been brough battle within reach of my supplies, I cannot that the result would have been a brilliant cy for our army.

On the 10th of November Gen. Pleasonto attacked by Longstreet, with one division infantry, and Stuart's cavalry, but repulsed tack.

This indicates the relative position of o my and that of the enemy at the time I w lieved from the command.

ORGANIZATION AND GENERAL CON OF MILITARY OPERATIONS.

It would be impossible to participate in rations such as those described in the fore pages, without forming fixed opinions upon jects connected with the organization of o mies and the general conduct of military tions.

This report would be incomplete with brief allusion to some general considerations have been firmly impressed upon me by the which have occurred.

To my mind the most glaring defect in ou mies is the absence of system in the ap ment and promotion of general and other o and the want of means for the theoretical in tion of the mass of officers.

The expansion of the army was so great a rapid at the commencement of the existing that it was perhaps impossible, in the great city of instructed officers, to have adopte other course than that which was pursued the time has arrived when measures may l itiated to remedy existing defects and pr against their recurrence.

CONCLUSION.

this report I have confined myself to a plain ative of such facts as are necessary for the oses of history. Where it was possible I preferred to give these facts in the lange of dispatches, written at the time of their occurrence, rather than to attempt a new relation.

The reports of the subordinate commanders, hereto annexed, recite what time and space would fail me to mention here, those individual instances of conspicuous bravery and skill by which every battle was marked. To them I must especially refer, for without them, this narrative would be incomplete, and justice fail to be done. But I omit to tender to my corps commanders and to the general officers under them, such ample recognition of their cordial co-operation and their devoted services, as those reports abundantly vouch.

I have not sought to defend the army which I had the honor to command, nor myself, against the hostile criticisms once so rife.

It has seemed to me that nothing more was required than such a plain and truthful narrative, to enable those whose right it is to form a correct judgment on the important matters involved.

This report is, in fact, the history of the army of the Potomac. During the period occupied in the organization of that army, it served as a barrier against the advance of a lately victorious enemy, while the fortification of the capital was in progress, and under the discipline which it then received it acquired strength, education, and some of that experience which is necessary to success in active operations, and which enabled it afterward to sustain itself under circumstances trying to the most heroic men. Frequent skirmishes occurred along the lines, conducted with great gallantry, which inured our troops to the realities of war.

The army grew into shape but slowly, and the delays which attended on the obtaining of arms, continued late into the winter of 1861-2, were no less trying to the soldiers than to the people of the country. Even at the time of the organization of the Peninsular campaign, some of the finest regiments were without rifles, nor were the utmost exertions on the part of the military authorities adequate to overcome the obstacles to active service.

When at length the army was in condition to take the field, the Peninsular campaign was planned, and entered upon with enthusiasm by officers and men. Had this campaign been followed up as it was designed, I cannot doubt that it would have resulted in a glorious triumph to our arms, and the permanent restoration of the power of the government in Virginia and North Carolina, if not throughout the revolting States. It was, however, otherwise ordered, and instead of reporting a victorious campaign, it has been my duty to relate the heroism of a reduced army, sent upon an expedition into an enemy's country, there to abandon one, and originate another new campaign, which might and would have been successful if supported with appreciation of its necessities, but which failed because of the repeated failure of promised support, at the most critical, and, as it proved, the most fatal moments.

That heroism surpasses ordinary description. Its illustration must be left for the pen of the historian in times of calm reflection, when the nation shall be looking back to the past from the midst of peaceful days.

For me, now, it is sufficient to say, that my comrades were victors on every field save one, and there the endurance of a single corps accomplished the object of its fighting, and by securing to the army its transit to the James, left to the enemy a ruinous and barren victory.

The army of the Potomac was first reduced by the withdrawal from my command of the division of Gen. Blenker, which was ordered to the Mountain Department, under Gen. Fremont. We had scarcely landed on the Peninsula, when it was further reduced by a dispatch, revoking a previous order giving me command of Fortress Monroe, and under which I had expected to take ten thousand men from that point, to aid in our operations. Then, when under fire before the defences of Yorktown, we received the news of the withdrawal of Gen. McDowell's corps, of about 35,000 men. This completed the overthrow of the original plan of the campaign. About one-third of my entire army, (five divisions of out of fourteen, one of the nine remaining being little larger than a brigade), was thus taken from me. Instead of a rapid advance which I had planned, aided by a flank movement up the York River, it was only left to besiege Yorktown. That siege was successfully conducted by the army, and when these strong works at length yielded to our approaches, the troops rushed forward to the sanguinary but successful battle of Williamsburg, and thus opened an almost unresisted advance to the banks of the Chickahominy. Richmond lay before them, surrounded with fortifications and guarded by an army larger than our own; but the prospect did not shake the courage of the brave men who composed my command. Relying still on the support which the vastness of our undertaking, and the grand results depending on our success seemed to insure us, we pressed forward. The weather was stormy beyond precedent, the deep soil of the Peninsula was at times one vast morass. The Chickahominy rose to a higher stage than had been known for years before. Pursuing the advance, the crossings were seized, and the right wing extended to effect a junction with reinforcements now promised and earnestly desired, and upon the arrival of which the complete success of the campaign seemed clear. The brilliant battle of Hanover Court House was fought, which opened the way for the first corps, with the aid of which, had it come, we should then have gone into the enemy's capital. It never came. The bravest army could not do more, under such overwhelming disappointment, than the army of the Potomac then did. Fair Oaks attests their courage and endurance, when they hurled back again and again the vastly superior forces of the enemy. But mortal men could not accomplish the miracles that seem to have been expected of them. But one course was left; a flank march in the face of a powerful enemy, to another and better base, one of the most hzardous movements in war. The army of the Potomac holding its own safety, and almost the safety of our cause, in its hands, was equal to the occasion. The Seven Days are classical in American history; those days in w the noble soldiers of the Union and the Cons tion fought an overwhelming enemy by day, retreated from successive victories by ni through a week of battle, closing the ter scenes of conflict with the ever memorable tory at Malvern, where they drove back, be and shattered, the entire eastern army of the federacy, and thus secured for themselves a p of rest, and a point for a new advance upon capital from the banks of the James.

Richmond was still within our grasp, had army of the Potomac been reinforced and per ted to advance. But counsels, which I ca but think subsequent events proved unwise, vailed in Washington, and we were ordere abandon the campaign. Never did soldiers ter deserve the thanks of a nation than the a of the Potomac for the deeds of the Penins campaign, and although that meed was withl from them by the authorities, I am persua they have received the applause of the Amer people. The army of the Potomac was reca from within sight of Richmond, and incorpor with the army of Virginia. The disappointm of the campaign on the Peninsula, had not da ened their ardor or diminished their patriot They fought well, faithfully, gallantly under Pope; yet were compelled to fall back on W ington, defeated and almost demoralized enemy no longer occupied in guarding his capital, poured his troops northward, entered ryland, threatened Pennsylvania, and even W ington itself. Elated by his recent victories, assured that our troops were disorganized dispirited, he was confident that the seat of was now permanently transferred to the l States, and that his own exhausted soil was t relieved from the burden of supporting two tile armies. But he did not understand the s it which animated the soldiers of the Union shall not, nor can I living forget that, when I ordered to the command of the troops for the fense of the capital, the soldiers with whom I shared so much of the anxiery and pain and fering of the war, had not lost their confidenc me as their commander. They sprang to my with all their ancient vigor, discipline and c age. I led them into Maryland. Fifteen d after they had fallen back defeated, before W ington, they vanquished the enemy on the rug heights of South Mountain, pursued him to hard fought field of Antietam, and drove l broken and disappointed, across the Potomac i Virginia.

The army had need of rest. After the terri experiences of battles and marches, with scarc an interval of repose, which they had g through from the time of leaving for the Pe sula, the return to Washington, the defeat in ginia, the victory at South Mountain, and ag at Antietam, it was not surprising that they w in a large degree, destitute of the absolute cessaries to effective duty. Shoes were worn blankets were lost, clothing was in rags; in sh the army was unfit for active service, and an terval for rest and equipment was necessary.

When the slowly forwarded supplies c

led the army across the river renovated and shed, in good order and discipline, and fol- l the retreating foe to a position where I onfident of decisive victory, when in the t of the movement, while my advanced guard actually in contact with the enemy, I was ved from the command.

m devoutly grateful to God that my last cam- n with this brave army was crowned with a ry which saved the nation from the greatest it had then undergone.

have not accomplished my purpose, if, by report, the army of the Potomac is not placed on the roll of the historic armies of the d.

s deeds ennoble the nation to which it be- s. Always ready for battle, always firm, lfast and trustworthy, I never called on it in vain; nor will the nation ever have cause to attribute its want of success, as under other commanders, to any failure of patriotism or bravery in that noble body of American soldiers.

No man can justly charge upon any portion of that army, from the commanding general to the private, any lack of devotion to the service of the United States government, and to the cause of the Constitution and the Union. They have proved their fealty in much sorrow, suffering, danger, and through the very shadow of death. Their comrades dead on all the fields where we fought, have scarcely more claim to the honor of a nation's reverence than the survivors to the justice of a nation's gratitude.

I am sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN, Maj-Gen. U. S. A.

WATCHWORDS FOR PATRIOTS.

MOTTOES FOR THE CAMPAIGN, SELECTED FROM GENERAL McCLELLAN'S WRITINGS.

Our cause must never be abandoned; it is the cause of free institutions and self-government. — Harrison's Landing Letter.

We are fighting solely for the integrity of the Union, to uphold the power of national government, and to restore to the nation the blessings of peace and order. — Instructions to General Halleck, November 11, 1861.

You will please constantly to bear in mind the precise issue for which we are fighting; that issue is the preservation of the Union and the restoration of the full authority of the general government over all portions of our territory. — Instructions to General Buell, November 7, 1861.

We shall most readily suppress this rebellion and restore the authority of the government by religiously respecting the constitutional rights of all. — Instructions to General Buell, November 7, 1861.

Be careful so to treat the unarmed inhabitants as to contract, not widen, the breach existing between us and the rebels. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

I have always found that it is the tendency of subordinates to make vexatious arrests on mere suspicion. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

Say as little as possible about politics or the negro. — Instructions to General Burnside, January 7, 1862.

The unity of this nation, the preservation of our institutions, are so dear to me that I have willingly sacrificed my private happiness with the single object of doing my duty to my country. — Letter to Secretary Cameron, October, 1861.

The Constitution and the Union must be preserved, whatever may be the cost in time, treasure, or blood. — Harrison's Bar Letter.

Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organization of States, nor forcible abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a moment. — Letter to President Lincoln, July 7, 1862.

In prosecuting this war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject to the necessity of miltary operations. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist; and oaths, not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

It should not be a war looking to the subjugation of the people of any State in any event. It should not be at all a war upon populations, but against armed forces and political organizations. — Harrison's Bar Letter.

If it is not deemed best to entrust me with the command even of my own army, I simply ask to be permitted to share their fate on the field of battle. — Despatch to General Halleck, August 30, 1862.

By pursuing the political course I have always advised, it is possible to bring about a permanent restoration of the Union — a re-union by which the rights of both sections shall be preserved, and by which both parties shall preserve their self-respect, while they respect each other. — General McClellan's Report.

I am devoutly grateful to God that my last campaign was crowned with a victory which saved the nation from the greatest peril it had then undergone. — General McClellan's Report.

At such a time as this, and in such a struggle, political partisanship should be merged in a true and brave patriotism, which thinks only of the good of the whole country. — General McClellan's West Point Oration.

A system of policy thus constitutional and conservative, and pervaded by the influences of Christianity and freedom, would receive the support of almost all truly loyal men, would deeply impress the rebel masses and all foreign nations, and it might be humbly hoped that it would commend itself to the favor of the Almighty. — Harrison's Bar Letter.

FULL AND COMPLETE EDITION OF HIS REPORT.

While going through the press, this edition was corrected by Gen. McCLELL It has none of the remarkable errors which have crept into the Government editi and all the other editions that have followed the Government edition.

It also has the

"CAMPAIGN IN WESTERN VIRGINIA,"

prepared by Gen. McCLELLAN expressly for this edition. Illustrated with Ma and Plans of Battles, &c., prepared by Gen. McCLELLAN. One volume, 8 Price, $3.00.

12mo edition of the same, bound in cloth, with all the Maps, Price, $1.75. Bou in boards, $1.25.

From the Journal of Commerce.

"We regret that the Congressional edition, and other cheap editions of the Report are incomplete inaccurate, omitting entirely some portions which present the most interesting and important views of relations of General McClellan to the Cabinet, the army and the country. The edition published Sheldon & Company, under General McClellan's authority, is accurate."

From the Post, Chicago.

"Sheldon & Co. have issued their edition of General McClellan's Report on the Organization Campaigns of the Army of the Potomac, to which is added an account of the Campaign in West Virgi from the General's own pen. This edition is the only one which gives the main report in full; import parts of it, relating to very critical periods in the history of the Army of the Potomac, being omitted fr the Congressional edition, and, by consequence, from all other editions, without exception, which are m reprints of that. The edition published by Sheldon & Co., is complete and authentic, and is the only co plete and authentic edition."

From the Boston Post.

"No man can feel that he has a copy of McClellan's Report, without a copy of this edition."

LIFE AND SERVICES

GEN. GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

Campaign Document, No. 4.

George Brinton McClellan was born in the city of Philadelphia, the birthplace of American Independence and of American Union, on the 3d day of December, 1826.

His father was a physician, eminent among the eminent, "praised by the praised," conspicuous by his abilities and his character even in that galaxy of accomplished men by whom the fame of Philadelphia, as the metropolis of physical science and the healing art in America, was made respectable in Edinburgh and in Paris, in London and in Leyden. No man's ancestry is a matter of indifference when we desire to study his nature and ascertain the true measure of his worth. In monarchical countries, where the voice of the people has little or no weight in determining the selection of those who are to administer the government, it matters little to the masses of mankind whether those by whom they are ruled come of a sound or an unsound stock, of an honest and vigorous, or of a corrupt and weakly race. The will or the whim of a prince makes such inquiries superfluous. Once invested by his sovereign with the insignia of office, the vilest caitiff silences all questions into his origin with the splendors of his rank and the terrors of his authority. But in a republic which rests for its permanence and its power upon the virtue of the people and of their public servants, it can never be an insignificant recommendation of a public man to that confidence of his fellow-citizens in which alone his hope of distinction and of influence lies, that his fathers in their time were citizens of credit, men who knew their rights and maintained them, knew their duties and fulfilled them.

The ancestors of George Brinton McClellan were men of this stamp, coming of that pure and hardy Scottish blood which has so long been a trouble to tyrants, which has throbbed in the veins of so many sturdy champions of justice and order, and which has been poured out so freely on the most heroic battle-fields of history. Through one of those mysterious affiliations which the Scotch, like all other Celtic tribes, delight to trace out, and hold above all things sacred, a kinsmanship has been established for the American McClellans with that noble old soldier, Sir Colin Campbell, who fought his way honestly up from a shepherd's plaid on the Caledonian moors to a Field Marshal's baton in the army of England, and a baron's coronet among her peers.

Into these refinements of consanguinity, however, it is scarcely worth while to enter. Had Colin Campbell lived and died, the just and God-fearing man he was, as a shepherd on banks of Clyde, no man in whose veins blood ran would have been the less e bled by its wholesome life; and so far as antecedents go of George Brinton McC lan's birth, it is enough for us to know he comes of a people renowned the world for justice, fidelity, valor, and truth.

As a boy of thirteen, his father sent into the Freshman Class at the Universit Pennsylvania. He pursued the Univer course, for nearly two years, patiently and cessfully; but, like Washington, he had "inward longing" for the life of an engi and a soldier, and, in 1842, a Cadet war having been obtained for him, he was remo to the Military Academy at West Point.

In the congenial atmosphere of the e studies to which he here found himself call the young Cadet very soon distinguished h self, and rewarded the judicious confidenc his friends. He was graduated, with h honors, in the Class of 1846; assigned duty with a company of the engineers, ordered, before the close of the year, into ac service on the line of the Rio Grande Riv The war with Mexico was then fairly beg and Lieutenant McClellan reached his just after the battle of Monterey.

After some time spend in active service the Rio Grande, Lieutenant McClellan ordered to Tampico in January, 1847, take part in the concentration of troops t going on for the grand expedition which preparing, under Gen. Scott, to end the war, a dictate terms of peace in the capital of Mexi What jealousies and intrigues; and, to the veteran's own well-known phrase, what "fire in the rear" attended the organizati of this expedition no one familiar with t recent history of the country can need to reminded.

The young Lieutenant was thus made witness, at the very beginning of his caree of the political difficulties and the person spites which so often confound and hamp the action of the most earnest and devot military leaders.

In the beginning of the month of Mar the assembled army disembarked from i transports to the west of the island of Sac ficios, and the memorable siege of Vera Cr and San Juan de Ulloa began.

It is not our purpose minutely to pursu the fortunes of Lieutenant McClellan throug the wonderful campaign of which this sie was the initial chapter.

Who, indeed, can now find the heart to r write or even to re-peruse the annals of th ign in which, as the lamentable history last four years too sternly bids us fear, ican soldiers of the North and of the

, of the East and of the West, for the me, marched side by side to death and y?
e Executive Documents of the Thir-Congress, in which the story of that us campaign lies embalmed and awaits storian's skilful hand, can be read now ut overmastering emotion only by the c or the fool, by him who is indifferent country's fate, or by him who rejoices ruin.
those formal and official pages the course bsequent events has given the painful inof a tragedy. In them we read how, ng with an equal zeal to serve one com-cause, Lieutenants Beauregard and ellan earned the commendation of their ander in the trenches before Vera ; in them we read how the escort of in Robert E. Lee, engaging the skirrs of Valencia in the Pedregal, opened stern unswerving march which led the and Stripes, through storm and stress of and victory, up to their station of tri-on the heights of Chapultepec and the s of the city of Montezuma. Heintzeland Magruder, Kearney and Pillow, us here, marching, manœuvring, fighting ully together for the one old flag. One Lieutenant T. J. Jackson — "the horses s guns nearly all killed or disabled, his rs and cannoneers cut up" — gets one of ieces from under the direct fire of Cha-pec, opens upon the enemy, and holds attle till the Castle is carried. Another Lieutenant Reno, "in the advance with ountain howitzers," maintains, against the rior artillery of the enemy, so fierce a fire aves the bold advance of "Lieutenant nel Albert Sidney Johnstone" with his geurs. Now we have "Captain Hooker" g gallantly down alone to reconnoitre the nd for Lieutenant Colonel Hébert, of isiana; anon, "Lieutenant Grant," of Fourth Infantry, "pushed forward with a y" to aid in securing advantages won by troops of Tennessee and South Carolina.
Between these once fraternal names how a gulf has since been dug by passion, by ness, and by folly, — a gulf which, in the idence of God, nothing surely but reason justice can ever bridge again!
he peculiar importance of that arm of the ice to which, in virtue of his distinction at the academy, Lieutenant McClellan attached naturally, gave him a prominence in the operations of General Scott's advance, to which his years and his rank would not otherwise have entitled him. He won his promotion to the rank of 2d Lieutenant early in the campaign, and received his brevet as 1st Lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Contreras, on the 19th of August of the same year. The service of the engineers and the staff officers at Contreras was of the most arduous kind, testing in the highest degree the coolness, the personal bravery, and the powers of physical endurance, as well as the professional skill, of those engaged in it. General Valencia's position was infinitely more formidable from the broken, rough, and impracticable character of the country, than from the skill with which that pompous and wordy personage had selected and entrenched his camp; and the reconnoissance which determined the route taken by our troops to assault and overwhelm their enemy had to be executed on a moonless night, over rocky and precipitous mule paths, through a region of wild ravines and tangled forests.

Deserted in disgust by Santa Anna, whose advice he had scorned and whom he hoped, by a decisive victory over the American invaders, to oust from power, Valencia was utterly bewildered by the attack to which this dangerous night reconnoissance opened the way; his troops, finding themselves inextricably involved, were stricken with a panic, and one of the most complete victories of the war rewarded the skill of our commanders and the valor of our troops.

When compared with the scale on which war has since been waged by American armies, the battles through which our soldiers fought their way to the city of Mexico may seem, indeed, but petty and insignificant combats. But the campaign of 1847 was, in truth, a most instructive school for the officers who passed through it. Not less by the mistakes and failures of the enemy than by our own successes were the capable and the thoughtful among those officers taught rightly to estimate the tremendous difficulties which attend a war of invasion, and the formidable advantages enjoyed by an army acting on the defensive in a country sparsely populated, broken, rugged, and densely wooded; nor is it easy to imagine the extent of the disasters which must have befallen the cause of the Union had the absolute conduct in the field of our vast and undisciplined armies been assumed, in the outset of the existing war by the arrogant and inexperienced civilians whose influence has been since so lamentably felt in the disturbance of well-considered plans of campaign and the waste of well-organized resources.

The hard-fought action of Molino del Rey, on the 8th of September, 1847, afforded Lieutenant McClellan an occasion to prove that his rapid promotion in his profession had not disturbed that well-balanced sense of justice which is one of the rooted qualities of his nature.

The conduct of the attack upon the Mexican positions at Molino del Rey had been confided, by General Scott, to General Worth. The ostensible object of this attack was the destruction of a cannon-foundry which the Mexicans were believed to have established at that point; but as General Worth found reason to anticipate such a resistance as might lead to a general action for the possession of the heights and fortress of Chapultepec, it was of the first importance for him to be thoroughly informed of the true nature of the defences thrown up by Santa Anna at Molino del Rey, and of the true proportions of the force which the Mexican President would there array against him.

Two serious reconnoissances were accordingly ordered by General Worth before the attack was made, and in these reconnoissances Lieutenant McClellan bore a distinguished part.

The conflict which followed assumed the character of a battle, — the most fiercely-contested battle indeed of the whole war, in which, after hours of desperate onslaught, an aggregate American force about 3,500 strong assailed and drove from their formidable intrenchments a Mexican army numbering at least 10,000 men, with a loss to the enemy of four pieces of artillery and nearly a thousand prisoners. Lieutenant McClellan was offered the brevet rank of Captain for his share in this victory, but declined to receive it on the ground that he was not fully entitled to it, having been concerned in the preliminary operations alone, and not in the actual assault and capture of the enemy's works.

The maxim, Palmam qui meruit ferat, is not often thus rigorously applied to his own case by a young and ambitious man actively engaged in the most exciting of professions! Within a week, however, the storming of Chapultepec and the consequent occupation of the Mexican capital gave the magnanimous young soldier a fresh opportunity of winning, by actual service and exposure in the stricken field, the rank which he disdained otherwise to wear. He was breveted a Captain for these crowning operations of the campaign on the 14th September, 1847.

As Captain McClellan, he remained with the army in Mexico till the signing o treaty of peace with that republic. Th ministration of a conquered city neces afforded to a soldier of his character and ing many valuable opportunities of ob tion and reflection upon the true relati the military with the civil authority. impotence of mere force to maintain o store a solid tranquillity in the social or never so apparent to a clear and vigorous as when force is clothed with a temporar nipotence; the beauty and the majesty o are never so apparent as when the calm constant operation of the law is, for a suspended in favor of the sword. A Duke of Wellington learned, during his military mastery of the Peninsula and brief practical dictatorship of Paris, tha found dislike of all unnecessary milita terference with civil affairs which, at a day, when England was convulsed with commotion, made the veteran of a hu victories the calmest, most forbearing most conciliatory of English statesmen, may be sure that his experience of con and of military rule in Mexico contri mainly to fix in the mind of Captain Clellan those sound and moderate prin of policy which were afterwards to de themselves so fully and so firmly in the lamations and in the conduct of the vic West Virginia and the leader of the Pe lar campaign.

In June, 1848, Captain McClellan turned to the United States, and was a immediately ordered to the post at Point, where, for three years, he remain command of the company of sappers miners.

In June, 1851, he was removed to Delaware to superintend the constructi the works; and early in the next year h filled the common destiny of the officers o regular army of the Union by joining a pedition for the exploration of the far we territory of the Red River, under the comm of Colonel Marcy, whose daughter has become his wife.

From the Red River he passed into T upon the staff of General Persifer F. Sm and until March, 1853, was occupied in survey of the Texan coast. From the breezes of the Gulf and the lowlands of T he was suddenly transferred to the neigh hood of the Rocky Mountains, going to W ington Territory in the spring of 1853, remaining there until May, 1854, in ch of the western division of the survey for northern route to the Pacific Ocean.

it Captain McClellan's love and reverof American nationality were to be ind to a full captaincy in the 1st Cavalry, and, Major Delafield and Major Mordecai, was perations of the great war then raging een the Western Allies and the Russian ire. War on a scale which had become tional in our time — war waged upon the iples of the Napoleonic era, but with all appliances of modern progress — was to pass under his inspection.

Then Captain McClellan and his companreached the Crimea, in the early part of summer of 1855, the most trying period

y called, as Mr. Kinglake has called it, olossal "adventure of invasion."

A brief extract from this author's bitter, brilliant, history of the "Invasion of the imea" will show the precise nature of great military lesson set before the Amer-n observers, and will enable the reader to imate for himself the grave and manifold arings of that lesson upon the vast enter-se which it was written in the book of des-y that but a few years afterwards the most conspicuous of these observers should be called to undertake: —

"There were now upon the coast of the Crimea some 37,000 French and Turks,[1] with sixty-eight pieces of artillery, all under the orders of Marshal St. Arnaud; and we saw that 27,000 English, including a full thousand of cavalry, and together with sixty guns, had been landed by Lord Raglan. Altogether, then, the allies numbered 63,000 men and 128 guns. These forces, partly by means of the draught animals at their command, and partly by the aid of the soldier himself, could carry by land the ammunition necessary for perhaps two battles, and the means of subsistence for three days. Their provisions beyond those limits were to be replenished from the ships. It was intended, therefore, that the fleets should follow the march of the armies, and that the invaders, without attempting to dart upon the inland route which connected the enemy with St. Petersburg, should move straight upon the north side of Sebastopol by following the line of the coast.

"The whole body of the Allied armies was to operate as a 'movable column.'[2]

"Between an armed body engaged in regular operations, and that description of force which the French call a 'movable column,' the difference is broad; and there is need to mark it, because the way in which regular operations are conducted is not even similar to that in which a 'movable column' is wielded. It is, of course, from the history of continental wars that the principle of regular operations in the field is best deduced. A prince intending to invade his neighbor's territory takes care to have near his own frontier, or in states already under his control, not only the army with which he intends to begin the invasion, but also that sustained gathering of fresh troops, and that vast accumulation of stores, arms, and munitions which will suffice, as he hopes, to feed the war. The territory on which these resources are spread is called the 'base of operations.'[3] When the invading general has set out from this his strategic home to achieve the object he has in view, the neck of country by which he keeps up his communications with the base is called the 'line of operations;' and the maintenance of this line of operations is the one object which must never be absent from his mind. The farther he goes, the more he needs to keep up an incessant communication with his 'base;' and yet, since the line is lengthening as he advances, it is constantly becoming more and more liable to be cut. Such a disaster as that he looks upon as nearly equal to ruin, and there is hardly anything that he will refuse to sacrifice for the defence of the dusty or mud-deep cart-roads, which give him his means of living and fighting.

[1] 30,204 Frenchmen and 7000 Turks, according to the French accounts. Lord Raglan, I believe, thought that the French force was less, and put it at 27,600.

[2] I make this endeavor to elucidate the true character of the operation for the purpose of causing the reader to understand the kind of hazard which was involved in the march along the coast, and also in order to lay the ground for explaining (in a future volume) the causes which afterwards brought upon the army cruel sufferings and privations.

[3] This is generally, but not invariably, the same line as the one by which he has advanced.

"On the other hand, the commander of a 'movable column' begins his campaign by wilfully placing himself in those very circumstances which would bring ruin upon an army carrying on regular operations. He does not profess nor attempt to hold fast any 'line of operations' connecting him with his resources. He says to his enemy, 'Surround me if you will; gather upon my front; hover round me on flank and rear. Do not affront me too closely, unless you want to see something of my cavalry and my horse-artillery; but, keeping at a courteous distance, you may freely occupy the whole country through which I pass. I care nothing for the roads by which I have come. What I need whilst my task is doing, I carry along with me. I have an enterprise in hand. That achieved, I shall march toward the resources which my countrymen have prepared for me. Those resources I will reach or else perish.' If an army engaged in regular operations were likened to an engine drawing its supplies by means of long pipes from a river, the principle of the 'movable column' would be well enough tokened by that skinful of water which, carried on the back of a camel, is the life of men passing a desert.

"Each of the two systems has its advantages and its drawbacks. The advantages enjoyed by an army undertaking regular operations are:—the lasting character of its power, and its comparative security against great disasters. The general conducting an army in regular operations is constantly replenishing his strength by drawing from his 'base' fresh troops and supplies to compensate the havoc which time and the enemy, or even time alone, will always be working in his army; and if he meets with a check, he retires upon a line already occupied by portions of his force, already strewed with his magazines. He retires, in short, upon a road prepared for his reception, and the farther he retreats, the nearer he is to his great resources. The drawbacks attending this system are the great quantity of means of land transp required for keeping up the communicat and the eternal necessity of having to be re with a sufficient force to defend every mil the 'line of operations' against the en prises of the enemy.

"The advantages of the 'movable colu are:—that its means of land transport be comparatively small,—may, in fact, proportioned to the limited duration of service which it undertakes; and that, being clogged with the duty of maintainin 'line of operations,' it has, in truth, noth to defend except itself. But grave drawba limit the power of a 'movable column.' the first place, it is an instrument fitted o for temporary use, because, during the ser in which it is engaged, it has no resource rely upon, except what it carries along with Another drawback is the hazard it incurs, of mere defeat, but of total exterminati for it is a force which has left no dominion its wake, and if it falls back, it falls into midst of enemies having hold of the cou around, and emboldened by seeing it retr

"Then, also, a movable column, e though it be never defeated in any pitc battle, is liable to be brought to ruin by be well harassed; and very inferior troops, even armed peasants, if they have spirit enterprise, may put it in peril; for, having command of the country all round it, they easily prepare their measures for vexing column by day and by night. Again, 'movable column' can not send its sick wounded to the rear. It must either aban the sufferers, or else find means of carry them wherever it marches, and this, course, is a task which is rendered m and more difficult by every succeeding c bat. Again, if the 'movable column' brought to frequent halts by the necessity self-defence, there is danger that the operat in which it is engaged will last to a time yond the narrow limit of the supplies wh it is able to carry along with it.

"In Algeria the French had brought system of using small 'movable columns' a high state of perfection; and there might see a force complete in all arms, ca ing with it the bread and the cartridges, driving betwixt its battalions the little herd cattle, which would enable it to live and fight; one might see it bidding farewell perhaps several weeks to all its commun tions, and boldly venturing into the midst a wilderness alive with angry foes; but Arabs and Kabyles, though not without so of the warlike virtues, were, upon the whc ) unintelligent and too feeble to be able to t the system of the 'movable column' to est sufficing to prove that the contrivance uld hold good in Europe.

"Upon the whole, it may be acknowledged at, for operating in a country where the emy is looked upon as at all formidable, the ployment of a 'movable column' is a asure which will be likely to win more vor from those who love an adventure than m those who are acquainted with the art war.

"But whichever of the two methods be osen, it is of great moment to choose deci-ely, taking care that the operations are car-d on in a way consistent with the principle the system on which they proceed. A neral conducting regular operations must wary, circumspect, and resolutely patient. he leader of a 'movable column' must be ift, and, even for very safety's sake, he ay have to be venturesome, for what would rashness in another may in him be rigid udence. The two systems are so opposite, at to confuse the two, or to import into the ractice of one of them the practice applica-le to the other, is to run into grave troubles nd dangers. Yet this is what the Allies did. When the English Government committed to is enterprise a large proportion of their nall, brilliant army, and appointed to the ommand of it a general mature in years and hooled by his long subordination to Wel-ngton, they acted as though they meant that ie army should engage with all due pru-ence in regular operations. When they rdered that this force should make a descent pon the Crimea without intending to prepare r it a base of operations at the landing-lace, they caused it to act as a 'movable olumn.' It will be seen hereafter that from his ambiguity of purpose, or rather from this imness of sight, the events of the campaign ook their shape.

"Again, it is right to see how far it be pos-ible to change with the same force from one f the two systems to the other. Upon this, t can be said that an army engaged in regu-ar operations may well enough be able to urnish forth a 'movable column;' but to ope that a 'movable column' will be able to ather to itself all at once the lasting strength f an army prepared for regular operations is o hope for what cannot be. It is true, as ve shall see hereafter, that by dint of great ffort, and the full command of the sea, the wo mighty nations of the West were able in ime to convert the remains of their 'movable olumn' into an army fitted for regular opera-tions, but we shall have to remember that be-fore the one system could be effectually re-placed by the other, the soldiery underwent cruel sufferings."

All that it was the rare privilege of Capt. McClellan to see and learn of the relations between politics and the military art, and of the practical operations of war conducted upon the grandest scale during his visit to Se-bastopol might however, let us here observe, have produced but an imperfect and inade-quate effect upon his mind, had not his own pre-vious and priceless, though comparatively lim-ited experience in Mexico prepared him intel-ligently to receive it, and fitted him to deduce from it the most solid instruction and the most durable convictions.

The immediate fruit of his sojourn in Eu-rope, at this time, was an elaborate and ex-haustive "Report upon the Constitution of the Greater European Armies," which was pub-lished under the authority of Congress in the early part of the year 1857, and which bears irrefragable witness to the pains and zeal with which the young officer had devoted himself to mastering the minutest details, as well as the broadest principles of military organiza-tion.

But of infinitely greater pith and moment to himself and to his country were the larger and deeper results of this military tour upon his mental constitution and his habits of thought.

The officers of the Regular Army of the United States, although most carefully trained in the principles of mathematical science and of the military art during the four years of their academic course, have enjoyed for the most part, in later life, but few and limited opportunities of military experience. With the exception of the Mexican war, the lives of most of them now living had been passed, when the great rebellion broke upon us, in a routine of post and garrison duty alternating between the peaceful seaboard of the Atlantic and the frontier forts of the far West. A harassing but contemptible warfare with the roving In-dian tribes of the trans-Mississippi educated them to practical skill in the handling of small detachments, but could do nothing, of course, towards familiarizing them with the spirit and the necessities of war on a grand scale. Many of them, inspired with a genuine zeal and love for their profession, were at great pains to master all that text-books could teach upon this subject; but as the most scientific and thoughtful of military authorities, Baron Jo-mini, has well observed, "War, practical war, is not an affair of mathematical demonstration, — it is a passionate drama," — and no study of military literature, however judicious and faithful, can teach in years so much available military truth as a soldier like McClellan must imbibe from a few weeks of actual living contact with the realities of war as he came upon and mingled with them in the Crimea.

After the publication of his Report of the Armies of Europe, in January, 1857, Capt. McClellan resigned his commission in the army and went into civil life.

He was appointed Chief Engineer of the Illinois Central Railroad, and upon the completion of that great enterprise was elected Vice-President of the company, which post he continued to fill, residing at Chicago, until the month of August, 1860, when, having been chosen President of the Eastern Division of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, he removed to Cincinnati.

He was busily engaged in the duties of this office, an office which with his previous experience as a "railroad man" in Illinois, naturally introduced him to a wide and accurate familiarity with the people and the resources of the Central West, as well as to a practical acquaintance with the details of the modern system of transportation by steam, when, in April, 1861, he was suddenly summoned from the pursuits of peace by the roar of the cannon fired at Sumter and the crash of impending civil war.

Governor Dennison, of Ohio, in response to the first call of the President of the United States for volunteers to aid in the suppression of the rebellion and in maintaining the supremacy of the Constitution, appointed Geo. Brinton McClellan Major-General, to command the contingent of the State, being thirteen regiments of infantry. This commission was offered and accepted on the 23d of April, 1861.

There was no difficulty in filling the ranks of these regiments. Throughout the great State of Ohio, as throughout the entire North and West, the call of the President for seventy-five thousand volunteers, to be enlisted for a service of three months, was answered by such a general uprising of the people as, in the words of General McClellan himself, made it "a struggle as to who should be received, and not as to who should avoid the call."

Throughout the long political conflict which had preceded the assertion by force of arms at Fort Sumter of the right of secession, the free States had been greatly divided in opinion concerning the issues so hotly debated between numbers of their own citizens on the one side, and the citizens of the slaveholding States on the other.

While the sentiment of hostility to slavery as an institution discreditable to the republ and in itself both criminal and dangerou had greatly grown in fire and in force throug out the North during the thirty years whi followed the emancipation of the slaves in t West Indian colonies of Great Britain, a while this sentiment had in some places ma itself, and in others had been manipulat into becoming a powerful engine of partiz action, an overwhelming majority of the pe ple of the North and the West still firmly a hered to the conviction that the Constitutio in no wise authorized any interference on t part either of the non-slaveholding States, of their citizens, or of the Federal Gover ment, with the institution of slavery in t States. It was the dominant feeling of ho orable and enlightened men, that it would l dishonest and disgraceful for an anti-slaver North to take advantage of a power conferre upon its numerical majority solely in virtue the Union and the Constitution, to accon plish purposes, no matter how laudable the might be in the eyes of philanthropists an philosophers, which, had they been avowe when the original compacts between the State were framed, would have made the Union i self impossible, and put a final stop to th formation of the Constitution.

It was plainly and painfully true, indeed that the leaders of the political party by whic Mr. Lincoln had been lifted into powe neither shared this feeling nor were disposed t respect it in their policy. But so long as th refusal of many of the Southern States t submit to the authority of the newly-elected President was expressed in the form of polit ical action alone, the great majority of th Northern people were indisposed to draw th sword against those whom they regarded a their fellow-citizens, and whom they believed to be governed by an honest, even if a mistaken fear that their rights, their property, and their liberties were really in peril.

It was well known throughout the North that the "right of secession" was not more generally accepted, as inherent in the Constitution of the Union, at the South than it was at the North.

Before the formation of the Union, indeed, a disposition had been manifested by the Eastern States, upon the invitation of the Legislature of Massachusetts, to separate themselves in respect to many of the most important elements of the public weal from the rest of the country, by forming a conven-with the State of New York for "regulating matters of common concern." This was in April, 1783; and, a debate arising on the subject in the Congress of the Confederation, Mr. Bland, of Virginia, had denounced such projects as tending directly to break up the Union, and to form what he described as "young Congresses." Alexander Hamilton's proposition that the Federal Government should assume the debts of the States, gave occasion, soon after the adoption of the Constitution, to a similar, though a more formidable manifestation. That proposition was supported by the Northern and opposed by the Southern States with so much acrimony on either side, that when the proposition was finally rejected, Congress adjourned from day to day without transacting any business, and some members from the Eastern States openly threatened the secession of those States from the Union, and the formation of an Eastern Confederacy. A compromise was finally effected by the concession to the South of the site for the National Capital, on the banks of the Potomac, in return for the reconsideration by the South of the vote which had defeated the "Assumption Bill." Under the Presidency of the elder Adams, in 1788, a new menace of separation came upon the country, at this time from the South, the States of Virginia and Kentucky passing resolutions in opposition to the policy of Mr. Adams, which clearly indicated by their tone, if not by their express phraseology, a determination to break under, in a certain contingency, the bonds which united the Confederacy.

The annexation of Louisiana, under Mr. Adams's successor, changed the whole sweep and scope of the future of the Republic; and again in the East the old propositions for the establishment of an Eastern Confederacy were revived, and discussed by men of the highest standing and in the most serious temper.

President John Adams, in December, 1828, gave Mr. Harrison Gray Otis and others, of Boston, the following account of this matter: —

"This design had been formed in the winter of 1803–4, immediately after and as a consequence of the acquisition of Louisiana. . . . The plan was so far matured that the proposal had been made to an individual (this was Alexander Hamilton) to permit himself, at the proper time, to be placed at the head of the military movements, which it was foreseen would be necessary for carrying it into execution." In a subsequent letter to Governor Plumer, of New Hampshire, an avowed Disunionist, President Adams states that "three projects of boundary" for the New England Confederacy had been prepared. These were: "1. If possible, the Potomac. 2. The Susquehanna. 3. The Hudson River." Of the truth of these statements Governor Plumer himself was well aware. He had written to New Hampshire from his seat in Congress, on the 19th of January, 1804, "What do you wish your Senators and Representatives to do here? We have no part in Jefferson and no inheritance in Virginia. Shall we return to our own homes, sit under our own vines and fig-trees, and be separated from the slaveholders?"

The admission of Louisiana as a State into the Union, seven years later, led to a sectional debate in Congress, in the course of which the Hon. Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts, declared (Jan. 14, 1811) that the admission of Louisiana would "free the States from their moral obligations, and, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some to prepare for separation, amicably if they can, violently if they must."

Without pursuing the subsequent history of this theoretical "right of secession" through the successive collisions of sectional interests and sectional passions, which again and again elicited the assertion of it, now from States of the South and now from States of the North, during the period which intervened between the admission of Louisiana and the first formal attempt of an American State to act upon the right in December, 1861, it must be evident to all reflecting minds that an impetuous and passionate determination to meet this attempt at once by the "last argument of kings" would have implied, on the part of the people of the Northern States, not only a discreditable ignorance of the precedents of American history, but a lamentable incapacity of appreciating the importance of time and argument in calming the effervescence of popular excitement, and dissipating the delusions which so often seize upon the mind of a whole community. No such impetuous and passionate determination we have said was, however, manifested by the people of the North. The secession of one after another of the States of the South Atlantic and the Gulf was received by the people at large with a kind of incredulous amazement, which was gradually giving place to a wide-spread conviction that the whole matter must eventually be referred for settlement to such a convention of the States as had already twice rescued the Republic from the danger of disintegration, when the commencement of actual hostilities in Charleston harbor, and the call of the President for troops to repel an assault made upon the national forces and to avenge an insult offered to the national flag, put an entirely new face upon the state of things.

The most powerful of the Southern States were still, at this time, standing out against the movement of secession. The feeling was almost universal at the North that the attack upon Fort Sumter could not possibly be sustained by the deliberate judgment of these unseceded Southern States. The existence of State Rights, it was felt, necessarily implied the existence of State Duties; and when the President appealed to the nation for seventy-five thousand troops to maintain the national authority, the people of the North and West took up arms, not for the purpose of annihilating the rights even of the seceded States, but for the purpose of compelling those States to fulfil their duties.

Had it then been understood that the force called into the field was but the advance guard of an army of millions of men, to be employed for an indefinite term of years, not merely in enforcing the authority of the Constitution and repressing a violent assault upon the established order of things, but in coercing the popular will throughout one half of the territory of the Republic, and in overwhelming the domestic institutions of thirteen States of the Federal Union, it cannot be doubted, by any candid man, that the popular voice of the North would have called a peremptory "halt!" and that the whole course of subsequent events would have been materially changed.

There are not wanting injudicious and inconsiderate friends of the Union, particularly upon the other side of the Atlantic, who delight to represent the "uprising of the North" as the initial movement of a magnificent moral crusade destined, in the providence of God, to deliver America from the sin and the shame of slavery.

Such representations give an indecently Jesuitical cast to the designs of "providence," do grave injustice to the spirit, the character, and the intelligence of the Northern people, and might almost seem to be made in the direct interest of that originally small and fanatical party of Disunion at the South, which, by insisting upon the imminence of such a crusade, and lashing therewith the fears and doubts and passions of the body of the Southern people into frenzy, precipitated the movement of secession, and enlisted whole commonwealths in the service of their own designs. And no one thing assured will bear more heavily upon the administ tion of Mr. Lincoln, at the bar of histor than the fact that the most conspicuous a visers of the President, in the outset of th great struggle, were men who, both by the antecedent and their subsequent course politics, have given color to such represent tions.

Nowhere is that blind and fanatical passi which would precipitate one whole communit or section of a community of human bein against another, upon a mission of mor chastisement and correction, so odious and u pardonable as in the high places of authorit "The whole modern mind," it has been a mirably said, "is in the sovereignty of re son, the rational organization of society by r flection;" and of those who are charged wi the duty of administering the affairs of great nation in modern times, it is above a required that they should be capable of refle tion and governed by reason.

Reason shows us that in the long course ages past there is no one movement of a who community which can be wholly condemn or wholly approved; reason convinces u therefore, that the future will judge ourselv as we judge the past, and will no more pa take our passions than we partake those of th past. Absent as it would seem to have bee where most its presence was required, in th inner councils of the Administration, th wholesome faculty of reason was not lackin to the people in general.

Among the volunteers who thronged th front of war at the Presidential summons April, 1861, there may have been, and doub less were men who were governed solely b their passions; who thought only of chastisin southern insolence; of abolishing southe slavery, and of settling by force the future r lations of the States. But the vast majorit of these volunteers were men of a very diffe ent stamp, — men who could discriminate b tween wrongs to be redressed and rights to b respected.

Of these was the young major-general calle to the command of the contingent of Ohio His first duty obviously was the organizatio of the force put under his orders; and to thi duty he addressed himself immediately wit all the energy of his character. Believin that the army of the Union had a single an definite work to do, he perceived the suprem importance of putting the army into such condition as should make the doing of tha work the certain immediate consequence o the attempt to do it.

The Western States, as General McClellan once found upon commencing his labors, ere "totally unprepared for the impending ruggle." The Government of the Union as entirely unable to assist the States in the ganization and equipment of the troops which had called upon them to furnish. Lieutenat-General Scott, commanding-in-chief the hole army, at once recognized the dangerous ndition of affairs, recommended the appointent of General McClellan to the rank of ajor-General in the Army of the United ates, and uniting the three great States of hio, Illinois, and Indiana into one "Departent of the Ohio," confided this department to s care. General McClellan instantly called e governors of these States into council ith himself, and laid before them the true ate of matters in the West. All that could ossibly be done, with the earnest coöperation these State authorities, was done, and the ork of preparing their contingents for the eld was pushed forward as rapidly as the circumstances of a population, quite unused to ar and not yet in the least aware of the ext of the conflict upon which it was entering, would permit.

While busily engaged in this exhausting nd harassing duty, General McClellan found ime to scan, with the practised and untroubled ye of a skilful soldier, the whole field over hich the clouds of war were swiftly rolling p.

The President's proclamation had produced ot only in the seceded States, but throughout he South, an effect wholly at variance with he general expectations of the Northern peole, if not with the intimate hopes and purposes of those who were most busy and influntial in the Presidential councils. Instead f intimidating the seceded States, it had inen-ified their rage against the Government nd the Union; instead of rallying the unseeded States of the South to the support of rder and the castigation of insults offered to he flag, it had been made the instrument of driving the great States of Tennessee, North Carolina, and Virginia themselves into secession, and had excited a most formidable ferment of public feeling in Kentucky and Missouri.

Within a month from the date of that proclamation it had become evident to experienced military men that an extensive collision between the troops and people of the States actually armed and arming at the South, and the hastily-organized and imperfectly-equipped though brave and enthusiastic volunteers of the North, might more than probably result in such a practical humiliation of the Government as must give an enormous impulse to the now gigantic movement of rebellion.

General Scott, at Washington, urged this consideration upon the Government with all the weight of his large experience and all the earnestness of his already historical patriotism. General McClellan, from his position upon the Ohio, reinforced the representations of the General-in-Chief, pressed most strongly for the utmost possible activity in arming and equipping the Western contingents, recommending the largest possible increase of the whole force to be employed, and proposed such a flank movement up the valley of southwestern Virginia upon Richmond as would insure the possession of Tennessee to the Union, guarantee the tranquillity of Kentucky, and, above all, secure decisive results to the great military operations preparing in the East against Virginia.

But in the temper, at once frivolous and fanatical, which then prevailed at Washington, the counsels of military experience were unheard or unheeded.

It was natural enough, perhaps, that the people of the North in general should have been insensible to the gravity of the events now before them. The great majority of the Northern people having neither desired nor labored for the disruption of the Union, could not possibly bring themselves to believe that the Union was really in danger of disruption. They looked upon the South as maddened and misguided, and fully expected that a brief campaign resulting in the overthrow of the extemporized "government" at Richmond and in the dispersion of the extemporized army of the rebellion, would be followed by the immediate return of the States to their allegiance, and to such a general revision of the political sins and follies of both sections as should insure their deserts to the fanatics and disorganizers of both.

With the smaller, but for the moment, unfortunately, influential party at the North, which really preferred the disunion of the States to the permanence of a constitution which recognized and protected the right of the Southern States to regulate their own domestic institutions, it was an article of faith that the South was incapable of a vigorous effort at independence. It was said of old that "a fool is never completely a fool until he knows Latin;" and it may be said, with equal truth, that a fanatic is never completely a fanatic till he has taken to statistics. Studying the South in the tables of the census, the political Abolitionists of the North had satisfied themselves, and were ready to crucify all the rest of the world into believing, that the South was bankrupt as to its finances, and emasculated as to its population; that it existed as a social fact, indeed, simply by virtue of its connection with the North, and must tumble hopelessly to pieces at the moment when it should attempt to stand alone.

Controlled by the spirit of those who thus believed, the Administration listened impatiently to such counsels as those of General Scott and General McClellan. To question, indeed, the certainty of an immediate collapse of the rebellion upon the first advance of the National forces was considered by the more enthusiastic supporters of the Administration in Congress and in the press at the outset of the war, as proof positive of a secret sympathy with secession. And there can be no doubt that much of the strange personal animosity with which General McClellan has been assailed by this class of persons, must be attributed to the intolerable vindication by subsequent events of the estimates which he originally made of the strength of the South, and of the force which would be needed to make a prompt and profitable demonstration of the national power. There is nothing which most men are so slow to forgive in those with whom they quarrel as the crime of being proved to be in the right.

"On the 21st of May," says General McClellan, "the total number of small arms in the State of Ohio was twenty-five thousand one hundred and seventy-nine, of which twenty-two thousand and seventy-five were smooth-bores, mostly very inferior specimens of the altered flint-locks. Infantry equipments were still more difficult to obtain."

With this miserable provision for the armament of the Ohio contingent to be made the best of, improved and increased only by personal unremitting efforts; and with the knowledge that no force equal to the vast enterprise before the country had yet been summoned by the President into the field, General McClellan did not hesitate to plan and to urge upon the Government such comprehensive and decisive schemes of action as we have already alluded to.

But these schemes of action were schemes of policy, as well of war. The young general of the Ohio troops, whose life had been passed in the study of the art of war, had less faith in the virtue of mere brute force to bring American citizens to reason, than many a new-fledged captain who had just left his law-books and his red tape to don the "harness of battle."

The following passage will show how anxiously at this time General McClellan sought to combine a wise abstinence from military interference, where such interference was not absolutely essential to the main tenance of the national authority, with large conceptions of the work to be done by the army and with adequate preparation for doing it: —

"During the month of May the political aspect of affairs in Kentucky and Western Virginia was uncertain and threatening. In the latter a convention had been called to assemble at Wheeling, on the 13th of May, to decide upon the question of separation from the eastern portion of the State, while the election upon the question of ratifying the Richmond ordinance of secession from the United States, was fixed for the 23d of the same month. Excitement ran high, and honest men differed widely as to the policy that should be pursued by the military authorities of the general government.

"I received a multitude of letters from a large number of sincere Union men who entertained widely divergent views as to the measures adequate to the emergency. Many urged, as early as the beginning of May, that troops should immediately be sent into Virginia, to encourage the Union men and prevent the secessionists from gaining a foothold. At least an equal number insisted, with equal force, that the arrival of troops from other States would merely arouse State pride, throw many wavering men into the rebel ranks, and at once kindle the flames of civil war.

"In Kentucky the struggle was much more bitter than in Western Virginia. The State government, the arms, and the military organization, were to a great extent in the hands of men who favored the secession of the State; but so able and determined was the course of the Union leaders, and so marked did the majority of the people soon become in their support, that the secessionist leaders were compelled to content themselves with the avowal of the position of neutrality, while awaiting the results of the elections to be held on the 26th June for congressmen, and on the 4th August for members of the legislature.

"The policy of the leaders of the Union party was, 'To remain in the Union without a revolution, under all the forms of law, and by their own action.' The words of Garret Davis were, 'We will remain in the Union by voting if we can, by fighting if we must, and if we cannot hold our own, we will call on the general government to aid us.'

"It was the desire of these true and able men that no extraneous elements of excitenent should be introduced in the State until he elections were over; they felt sure of carrying these elections if left to themselves. I fully coincided with them in their expectations and opinions, and, so far as was in my power, ent them every assistance in carrying out heir views, among which were the organization of Home Guards and the distribution of arms to Union men. In Missouri, hostilities had already broken out, and it was evident that that State was destined to become the seat of serious fighting; nor was it then supposed that our tenure of St. Louis was entirely secure.

"Collections of Southern troops at Memphis and Union City threatened Columbus, Ky., and Cairo, and made it necessary to keep a vigilant watch in that direction. It should also be remembered that in the early part of May the National Capital was by no means secure, and it was not at that time an improbable contingency that Western regiments might yet be needed to protect or regain Washington. As bearing upon this point, it may be stated that in a letter addressed to the General-in-chief on the 21st May, I informed him that from the information in my possession the indications were that the disposable troops in the regular Confederate service, from Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, and Louisiana had gone to the east, via Lynchburg; leaving in Tennessee the State militia, who were badly armed and under no discipline. On the 26th April, when my command was confined to the limits of the State of Ohio, I submitted to the General-in-chief certain suggestions, the substance of which was: That, for the purposes of defence, Cairo should be occupied by two battalions, strongly intrenched, and provided with heavy guns and a gun-boat to control the river; that some eight battalions should be stationed at Sandoval in Illinois to observe St. Louis, sustain the garrison of Cairo, and, if necessary, reinforce Cincinnati; that a few companies should observe the lower Wabash; that some four thousand men should be posted at Seymour in Indiana to observe Louisville, and be ready to support either Cincinnati or Cairo; that there should be five thousand men at or near Cincinnati, and two battalions at Chillicothe, Ohio. With the troops disposable for active operations, it was proposed to move up the valley of the Great Kanawha upon Richmond; this movement to be made with the greatest promptness, that it might not fail to relieve Washington, or to insure the destruction of the enemy in eastern Virginia, if aided by a prompt advance on the eastern line of operations. Should Kentucky assume a hostile attitude, it was recommended to cross the Ohio with eighty thousand men, and move straight on Nashville, acting thence in concert with a vigorous defensive on the eastern line. It was strongly urged that everything possible should be done to hasten the equipment and armament of the Western troops, as the nation would be entirely deprived of their powerful aid until this should be accomplished.

"It was not until the 13th May that the order, forming the Department of the Ohio and assigning me to the command, was received. In the mean time, as much excitement existed at Cincinnati, which city was regarded as a tempting object to the enemy in the uncertain condition of Kentucky, I took steps to concentrate the greater part of the Ohio troops at Camp Dennison, on the Little Miami Railroad, seventeen miles from Cincinnati; a favorable position for instruction, and presenting peculiar facilities for movement in any direction. As soon as the new department was placed under my command I took steps for the immediate erection of heavy batteries at Cairo. In the letter of May 21st, already referred to, after giving the information obtained in regard to the position of the enemy on the Mississippi River, it was stated that I was convinced of the necessity of having, without a day's delay, a few efficient gunboats to operate from Cairo as a base; that if they were rendered shot-proof, they would enable us at least to annoy seriously the rebel camps on the Mississippi, and interfere with their river communications — their main dependence; that I requested authority to make the necessary expenditures to procure gunboats, and that I regarded them as an indispensable element in any system of operations, whether offensive or defensive. In the same letter the necessity for light batteries was strongly set forth."

While General McClellan was thus reflecting and acting at the West, members of the cabinet in Washington were expressing to foreigners their "willingness to let the South have its way and go in peace," and radical journalists, ostensibly of the same party with these statesmen, were clamoring for the coercion of Kentucky into "active loyalty." All was chaotic, indefinite, passionate, and extravagant in the language, the policy, and the purposes of the Administration.

The Southern Government had been audaciously removed from Montgomery to Richmond, with an open threat uttered by the Southern Secretary of War, that the "Confederate flag" should soon wave in triumph over Washington city. Mr. Davis, availing himself of his past military experience, had secured the early organization of his army by inducing the "Confederate Congress" to pass a law enlisting all volunteers for the period of the war; and although many dissensions existed at Richmond and in the Southern camp, of which a calm and thoughtful mind at the head of the affairs of the Union might have taken signal advantage, the military preparations of the South were going on with a general consistency of purpose and harmony of action unknown upon our side of the Potomac.

General Scott, forgetting his many infirmities, labored resolutely to perfect the arrangements necessary to put an army into the field with any fair prospect of success; but he was daily insulted by the self-constituted captains of the nation in the columns of the Administration press, and he soon found that he could not safely count upon that quiet and vigorous support from the Administration itself, without which all his efforts must necessarily be vain. He could find but little time to bestow upon the state of matters west of the Alleghanies; and General McClellan was, accordingly, left very much to himself. The responsibility thus thrown upon him was very great and solemn; but he did not shrink from the burden.

Having made up his mind towards the end of May that the State troops of Virginia, then acting independently of the Confederate forces, and commanded by General Robert Lee, were bent upon invading Western Virginia, reducing the Union sentiment of that section, and destroying as far as possible the communications between Washington and the Central West, General McClellan, though he had under his orders at that time no more than nine available regiments of infantry, resolved to advance into and occupy Western Virginia.

General McClellan felt that this was a serious and momentous step to take. His mind was too deeply imbued with the spirit of the patriots who labored together at the building up of our national edifice, to regard the invasion of one American commonwealth by the armed citizens of another as a light or indifferent thing. He recognized his obligation to make a full explanation of the feelings and purposes with which such a step was taken to the people of the invaded State, and to impress upon the troops under his command in the clearest manner the strict limitations of the painful duty which they were about to perform.

And he accordingly issued to the inhabitants of Western Virginia, and to the soldiers of the Department the following proclamation and address: —

PROCLAMATION.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO,
May 26, 1861.

To the Union Men of Western Virginia:

VIRGINIANS! — The general government has long enough endured the machinations of a few factious rebels in your midst. Armed traitors have in vain endeavored to deter you from expressing your loyalty at the polls. Having failed in this infamous attempt to deprive you of the exercise of your dearest rights, they now seek to inaugurate a reign of terror, and thus force you to yield to their schemes, and submit to the yoke of the traitorous conspiracy, dignified by the name of the Southern Confederacy. They are destroying the property of citizens of your State, and ruining your magnificent railways. The general government has heretofore carefully abstained from sending troops across the Ohio, or even from posting them along its banks, although frequently urged to do so by many of your prominent citizens. It determined to await the result of the late election, desirous that no one might be able to say that the slightest effort had been made from this side to influence the free expression of your opinions, although the many agencies brought to bear upon you by the rebels were well known. You have now shown, under the most adverse circumstances, that the great mass of the people of Western Virginia are true and loyal to that beneficent government under which we and our fathers have lived so long. As soon as the result of the election was known, the traitors commenced their work of destruction. The general government cannot close its ears to the demand you have made for assistance. I have ordered troops to cross the Ohio River. They come as your friends and brothers, — as enemies only to the armed rebels who are preying upon you. Your homes, your families, and your property are safe under our protection. All your rights shall be religiously respected, notwithstanding all that has been said by the traitors to induce you to believe that our advent among you will be signalized by interference with your slaves. Understand one thing clearly. Not only will we abstain from all such interference, but we will on the contrary, with an iron hand, crush any attempt at insurrection on their part. Now, that we are in your midst, I call upon you to fly to arms and support the general government. Sever the connection that binds you to traitors; proclaim to the world that the faith and loyalty, so long boasted by the Old Dominion, are still preered in Western Virginia, and that you ren true to the stars and stripes.

GEORGE B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General U. S. A., Comd'g Dep't.

ADDRESS.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO,
CINCINNATI, May 26, 1861.

SOLDIERS! — You are ordered to cross the ntier, and enter upon the soil of Virginia.
ur mission is to restore peace and confidence, protect the majesty of the law, and to rese our brethren from the grasp of armed itors. You are to act in concert with Vir-ia troops, and to support their advance. I ce under the safeguard of your honor the sons and property of the Virginians. I ow that you will respect their feelings and their rights.

Preserve the strictest discipline; — rememr that each one of you holds in his keeping e honor of Ohio and the Union. If you e called upon to overcome armed opposition, know that your courage is equal to the task;
but remember, that your only foes are the med traitors, — and show mercy even to em when they are in your power, for many them are misguided. When, under your otection, the loyal men of Western Virginia ve been enabled to organize and arm, they n protect themselves, and you can then return your homes, with the proud satisfaction of ving saved a gallant people from destruc-on.

GEORGE B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General U. S. A., Comd'g.

Left entirely to himself, as we have seen at he was in the conduct as well as in the nception of this campaign upon which he d now entered, General McClellan could ve no reason to suppose that the Adminis-ation desired or intended to wage war gainst the seceded States otherwise than as fractory members of the national community.
e knew for himself what limits the Consti-tion had plainly put upon the interference the Federal authority with the internal af-irs of the States, and in his Proclamation nd Address he wisely reiterated, with all the lemnity of a man whose words were so on to be tested by his acts, the language ed by President Lincoln in his Inaugural ddress, delivered less than three months efore: —

"I declare that I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and have no inclination to do so. . . . The right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to the balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend."

Little could the young general have dreamed that, ere two years had passed over his head, the author of this Inaugural Address would tacitly suffer it to be imputed to him as a crime that he had thus honestly interpreted these solemn professions of loyalty to the letter of the Constitution and to the spirit of the Union.

General McClellan soon found that his military instincts had guided him aright, and that he had not entered Western Virginia a day too soon. The enemy were gathering in the mountains of that noble and picturesque country, and having already occupied two strong positions at Laurel Hill and Rich Mountain under an able commander, General Garnett, of Virginia, were preparing themselves to take the offensive.

From Washington, General McClellan, although he regularly forwarded intelligence of his movements, acts, and operations, received no orders or instructions whatever. He knew nothing of the campaign in the East save that Richmond was its object, and he had no reason to suppose that the slightest attention had been bestowed upon his repeated suggestions for the invasion and occupation of Eastern Tennessee, a movement which, had it been made at the time when he wished it, must almost irresistibly have been crowned with success; the Confederate army, such as it then was, being concentrated in Virginia and Tennessee, the latter State full of ill-suppressed Union feeling. How much in time, in expense, and in the inestimable waste of precious blood would have been saved to us, had those to whom these suggestions were thus early and thus clearly made, had ears to hear or hearts to understand!

By the end of June the columns of General McClellan were in such a position as to promise a speedy and decisive engagement with the troops of General Garnett. Once more the young commander thought it right to preface the actual shock of war with a frank appeal to his army. On the 25th of June, 1861, he issued, from his head-quarters at Grafton, in Virginia, the following address: —

"To the Soldiers of the Army of the West: —

"You are here to support the goverment of your country and to protect the lives and liberties of your brethren, threatened by a rebellious and traitorous foe. No higher and nobler duty could devolve upon you, and I expect you to bring to its performance the highest and noblest qualities of soldiers — discipline, courage, and mercy. I call upon the officers of every grade to enforce the strictest discipline, and I know that those of all grades, privates and officers, will display in battle cool, heroic courage, and will know how to show mercy to a disarmed enemy.

"Bear in mind that you are in the country of friends, not of enemies; that you are here to protect, not to destroy. Take nothing, destroy nothing, unless you are ordered to do so by your general officers. Remember that I have pledged my word to the people of Western Virginia, that their rights in person and property shall be respected. I ask every one of you to make good this promise in its broadest sense. We come here to save, not to upturn. I do not appeal to the fear of punishment, but to your appreciation of the sacredness of the cause in which we are engaged. Carry with you into battle the conviction that you are right, and that God is on your side.

"Your enemies have violated every moral law — neither God nor man can sustain them. They have without cause rebelled against a mild and paternal government; they have seized upon public and private property; they have outraged the persons of Northern men merely because they came from the North, and of Southern Union men merely because they loved the Union; they have placed themselves beneath contempt, unless they can retrieve some honor on the field of battle. You will pursue a different course. You will be honest, brave, and merciful; you will respect the right of private opinion; you will punish no man for opinion's sake. Show to the world that you differ from our enemies in the points of honor, honesty, and respect for private opinion, and that we inaugurate no reign of terror where we go.

"Soldiers! I have heard that there was danger here. I have come to place myself at your head and to share it with you. I fear now but one thing — that you will not find foemen worthy of your steel. I know that I can rely upon you.

"Geo. B. McClellan,
Major-General Comd'g."

This address was issued at Grafto where, hampered at every turn by the wa of competent staff officers, General McCl lan was rapidly organizing his new and ine perienced troops into a movable column, t service in a country singularly broken a difficult against an enemy familiar with the intricacies and defiles of its vast fores and its almost trackless mountain range This work was accomplished with a rapidi and a success which enabled General McCl lan to assail the enemy in their formidab positions before the arrival of the hea reinforcements which General Garnett w expecting from Richmond.

The Mexican experience of the youn commander now came into play. Ri Mountain, near the foot of which Colon Pegram, of Garnett's command, had rough but strongly entrenched himself, was turn by the manœuvre which had given Gener Scott the victory of Cerro Gordo. Und the command of Brigadier-General Ros crans, a force of about two thousand me chiefly troops of Ohio and Indiana, and s of them perfectly new to battle, passed in heavy rain through the dense forests, climbe a steep and difficult mountain, and formi gallantly upon the crest of the ascent, storme and carried the works of the enemy at th point. In the mean time General McClella had got the rest of his troops in position attack the position of Pegram in the fron But General Rosecrans, after carrying th enemy's works on the mountain, failed t complete his part of the programme, an move upon Pegram from the rear. Th misfortune disconcerted the plan of the com manding general, and gave the enemy th opportunity of which he availed himsel during the night, of evacuating his work and endeavoring to join the main body o General Garnett's force. General Rose crans did not succeed in communicating wit General McClellan until nearly noon of th next day, but such was the skilful dispo sition which the latter had made of his arm that the greater part of the fugitives fro Rich Mountain were ultimately forced t surrender themselves prisoners of war.

Garnett, on learning the fate of the battl at Rich Mountain, at once began his retrea from his own position of Laurel Hill. Hi was promptly pursued, and in an actio between his own rear-guard and the advanc of one of General McClellan's divisions under General Morris, at Carrick's Ford, fell, while gallantly striving to rally his troops. He was the first officer of conspicuous rank and erit who perished in actual conflict in this reat war.

General Hill, with about twenty-five hunred men, came up with the remnants of eneral Garnett's army on the 14th of July, ree days after the battle of Rich Mountain, t a point beyond the Red House, on the altimore and Ohio Railroad, but for some et unexplained cause, into which no inves gation was ever ordered, the great events f Bull Run and Manassas Plains sweeping ie matter swiftly into oblivion, failed to ttack them.

Notwithstanding these short-comings of is subordinates, however, General McClelin's successes in Western Virginia were oth brilliant and substantial. They cheered ie whole country with their evidences of ie work that might be expected from our olunteers when organized and led by a ommander worthy of his post. They eared Northwestern Virginia of the Conderate troops, and the population of that egion having been satisfied by the proclaations and by the conduct of the victorious eneral that their rights would really be proected and their institutions respected under he flag of the Union, Northwestern Virnia at once became, and has ever since emained, a staunch and loyal supporter of he Union cause.

Receiving no orders from the East, and aving satisfied himself that no danger was ft to threaten Patterson, at Winchester, from he quarter which he had just so thoroughly eared of enemies, General McClellan urned his attention at once to Southwestn Virginia, where General Cox was strugling against a superior force in the Kanwha Valley. He resolved to repair thither person.

His preparations were rapidly making, is troops in motion, and General Cox nformed of his general intentions, when the hole aspect of affairs was suddenly changed. n the 21st of July the army of the Union urled on the enemy at Manassas Plains by he clamor of the radical press and poliicians, was utterly and disastrously defeated.

On the 22d the Administration teleraphed to General McClellan, summoning im at once to the defence of the country nd the protection of the government.

Before leaving Western Virginia in obedince to the summons of the Government, for Washington, General McClellan released on arole the prisoners taken by him from Genral Garnett's command. This measure produced the happiest effects for the cause of the Union, in that part of the country Taken in connection with the calm and conciliatory tone of the Federal General's proclamations, it served to confound the passionate representations of the Southern press in respect to the purposes of the Federal invasion; and many months afterwards the Richmond papers bitterly complained of the "demoralizing" influence exerted upon the Confederate forces and upon the popular sentiment in Western Virginia, by the clemency and forbearance which had marked these first victories of the Union army.

It was of the first importance to the success of the revolutionary movement at the South that the worst impressions of the Northern temper, and of the purposes of the Administration elevated to power by an exclusively Northern majority, which had been propagated throughout the Southern States during the contest which preceded the Presidential election of 1860, should be confirmed and reinforced by the conduct of the armies of the Union, and by the tone of the Government. This General McClellan perfectly well understood. He saw that the battle for the Union was neither to be fought nor to be won in the field alone, but that military victories which might be decisive in the case of a foreign war, would be little more profitable than defeats, in the case of a civil war, unless they were made the opportunity of such appeals to the better reason of the defeated party, as an honest devotion to the avowed object of the war must dictate to every sincere and patriotic mind. It was above all things essential, he held, that nothing should be done either to countenance the idea that the war was to be waged for the abolition of slavery, or to justify the notion that the Northern people were actuated by a spirit of vengeful hostility towards their alienated fellow-citizens of the South.

Such had been the condition of the Southern States under the Union, such their prosperity, and so great the general welfare of their people, that it was impossible for any well-informed and intelligent mind to believe that anything less than a wide-spread conviction of danger immediately imminent over their peace and happiness, could have driven the inhabitants of those States into acquiescing in the violent rupture of the ties which bound them to their confederates of the North and West. The whole past history of the world unfortunately proves that a conviction need by no means be reasonable or well-founded, in order to drive whole communities into taking the most serious measures.

In our own country, and in the year 1832, Henry Clay had not hesitated to declare in his place in the Senate of the United States, while urging the claims of that protective tariff which was styled the "American system," "let New England and the West, and the Middle States all feel that they are the victims of a mistaken policy, and let those vast portions of our common country despair of any favorable change, and then, indeed, might we tremble for the continuance and safety of this Union." If a statesman so cordially and intensely patriotic as the "Sage of Ashland," could thus recognize the power which might reside in a wide-spread popular feeling in respect to a point of economical interest mainly, to break up the bonds of the Union, it was surely imperative upon all those whose duty called them to deal with an actual disruption of the Union under the influence of a wide-spread popular feeling, in respect to a point of vital social, as well as economical importance, that they should bear that feeling in mind in all their measures, and devote themselves sedulously to allaying and dissipating its force by all proper and possible means.

Thus, at least, Major-General McClellan construed the obligations of his position as a commander of the forces charged to maintain the authority of the Federal laws. That this construction of his obligations was as politic as it was honest and manly, and his conduct in obedience to this construction of his obligations, as wise as it was honorable, would seem to be abundantly established by the simple fact that out of all the region embraced within the scope of the movement of secession, the territory of West Virginia alone can, even now, be truly said to have been restored to its allegiance to the Union. It may well be questioned whether the measure by which that territory has since been severed from the State of Virginia, and erected into a separate sovereignty was any more politic than constitutional; but of West Virginia alone in the South, can it be with accuracy affirmed, that its inhabitants, as a body, have been reclaimed to the support of the Federal authority; nor can there be any doubt in the minds of candid men that this result was brought about by that brief but brilliant campaign of July, 1861, in which General McClellan, at once unassisted and unhampered by any communications with the administration at Washington, was wise and fortunate enough to be able to "superadd to the exercise of force the polic of conciliation," in dealing with this sectic of the "Old Dominion."

On the 27th of July, 1861, General M Clellan assumed the command in the city c Washington, of the "Division of the Pot mac."

Six days before, the greater part of tl troops comprising this division had suffere an overwhelming defeat from the army of tl rebellion on the plains of Manassas. Tl moral effects of this defeat had been portentous as the popular confidence of vi tory by which the army of the Union w driven into the field had been absolute an unquestioning.

The cabinet of Mr. Lincoln contained r one man possessed of the slightest militar experience. The President indeed, in h early youth, had made a brief campaig against the Indians of the Northwest in tl capacity of a captain of militia, but tl experience he had gained in this campaig was not of a nature greatly to serve him the administration of a great civil war to l waged against the whole force of elev proud and powerful American States. I a singular fatality, too, neither he nor a one of his ministers had ever enjoyed a opportunities of familiarity even with tl civil administration of the federal power. I the earlier times of the republic a certa education in one or another department e the cabinet was regarded almost as a co dition precedent to the elevation of any ma to the Presidency; but Mr. Lincoln ha passed at once from the practice of the la in the interior of a great Western Stat and from the "caucuses" of an oppositio party into the first administrative office o the land. Nor had one of the Secretari whom he called around him ever filled position of any importance in the administr tion of federal affairs.

From this condition of things at Washingto it resulted that the Government was equall unskilled to control and to direct the popula enthusiasm. When the President and h advisers saw themselves surrounded in th capital by a force of armed men vastl larger than had ever before been arraye under the flag of the Union they believe themselves to be looking upon an army read for and equal to any enterprise, howeve arduous. It was in vain that Lieutenan General Scott urged upon them the utte worthlessness for all purposes of invasio of such a force, unorganized, undisciplined imperfectly equipped, and still more impe ctly officered as it was. The partisan urnals of the Administration daily clamored r the advance of the "irresistible host," nich by the sheer force of its numbers, its thusiasm, and its holy cause, was destined, they said and shouted, to sweep secession to the Gulf of Mexico like chaff before the nd. All this appeared eminently reasonble to the general masses of the public haply unfamiliar with the realities of war, and uzzled by the patriotic arithmetic of the ess. For years, too, it had been the custom the Anti-Slavery leaders, orators, and riters, to represent the Southern States as iolated and emaciated by the fatal influences slavery. Upon the strength of economial and statistical returns, dating back beyond e census of 1850, the population and the ealth of the South had been steadily and stematically underrated. While the South ad, in truth, been growing rapidly stronger nd richer during the period of thirteen years hich had elapsed since the great gold disoveries in California and Australia, coinciding point of time with the first development of ne modern free-trade policy of England, nd began to treble and quadruple the world's emand for the great Southern staples, it was belief almost universal throughout the North nat the resources of the South had, during all his period, been wasting away and decaying.

Unbounded, therefore, were the expectaions of victory which everywhere throughout he North, from Maine to Minnesota, had ttended the "advanced guard of the grand rmy of the Union," when it passed at midight across the Long Bridge at Washington, nd invaded the "sacred soil of Virginia."

Over the story of the fatal day on which hese expectations came so cruelly to naught, mid the thunders of the rebel artillery, it is ot necessary for us now to linger. But it s important for us to bear clearly in mind he real condition of the army which General McClellan was called from his victories to ommand, at the time when it passed under is hands.

The strength of the army of General McDowell, defeated by the Confederates under Beauregard and Johnston, on the 21st July, is estimated by well-informed officers, as for example by Brigadier-General Barnard, at about 30,000 men. In artillery it was miserably deficient, having, says an experienced eye-witness, "not more than five complete batteries, or six batteries including scratch guns, and these of different calibre, badly horsed, miserably equipped, and provided with the worst set of gunners and drivers which I, who have seen the Turkish field-guns, ever beheld." It had no cavalry of any value, save a few regulars from the frontiers; no carriages for reserve ammunition; no adequate transportation service; no organized commissariat; and, above all, scarcely any staff-officers at all. So pitiably deficient was the army in this vital element of efficiency, that General McDowell himself was seen by Mr. Russell in Washington, looking after the arrival of some guns which he expected; and in the hottest and most important moments of the action on the 21st July, Colonel Burnside, then in command of a brigade, was forced to carry his own orders, having no aide-de-camp at his command! The troops had never been paraded or put through their evolutions by brigades; the line and company officers were, for the most part, totally inexperienced; and the great bulk of the troops were men enlisted for but three months, that being the limit set to the possible resistance of the South, by the heads of the Administration. Such was the evil influence exerted upon the temper of the troops by the tone of the Government in regard to the war, that the movement of General Patterson on the Upper Potomac, to prevent Johnston, at Winchester, from forming a junction with Beauregard at Manassas, was paralyzed by the point blank refusal of his troops to serve even for ten days beyond the expiration of their term of enlistment; while it is well known that certain Pennsylvania regiments were met on the day of the critical battle of the 21st, absolutely marching off the field, to the sound of the cannon, "because their time had expired."

And it was an army in this condition which the Administration and its friends in Congress, pliant to the impatient pressure of the ignorant public, literally compelled General Scott to launch against the enemy.

Who can properly describe the condition of this army when it had hurried and huddled itself back into Washington, beaten, broken up, "demoralized," and despairing? Had the Southern army been composed of veteran, disciplined troops, or had the Southern leaders been equal to the crisis of the tremendous revolution which they had begun, there can be little question that the army of the Union, notwithstanding the brief and creditable stand made by the reserve at Centreville, might have been speedily dispersed, and the cities of Washington and Baltimore captured by the victorious Confederates.

"If they had immediately advanced on Washington," says General Barnard, in his sketch of the battle of Bull Run, "and immediately crossed the Potomac, and seized Baltimore (and they could command any number of troops, flushed with success, while all our three months' men were leaving us, and we had to organize a new army), they would have placed the Government in a situation from which it could with difficulty have extricated itself."

The work which Major-General McClellan found himself called upon to do when he reached Washington, cannot be more completely set before the mind of the reader than it is in these words of an officer by no means friendly to him, and upon whose systematically prepared evidence the Congressional Committee of Inquiry into the Conduct of the War lay great stress, as vindicating the subsequent course of the Administration towards the man on whom it had called in the extremity of the nation, for counsel and for safety.

General McClellan was indeed charged with the "organization of a new army," and this army was to be organized in the face of a success on the part of the enemy, which was sure to enable them to "command any number of men," and to put their active forces in the field on a footing of the highest efficiency, under an act of the rebel Congress which had sagaciously secured the enlistment of all troops for "three years or during the war," and under the administration of a President whose past experience as a graduate of West Point, as a soldier in Mexico, and as Secretary of War of the United States, had given him everything in the way of military knowledge and administrative skill, which the President of the Union lacked.

The first thing to be done obviously was, to provide for the safety of Washington. While ignorance and inexperience were noisily insisting all over the North upon the necessity of an immediate levy en masse of the Northern people, and upon the feasibility of "sweeping the rebellion into the Gulf" by a kind of Peter the Hermit's crusade, all intelligent soldiers at Washington saw that the immediate conditions of the problem had been profoundly modified by the disaster of July 21st. It was known to them that the advance of the Confederates upon the Capital was restrained by political influences and considerations, which might at any moment be overruled in favor of the obvious military feasibility and advantages of such a step. The maxim of Napoleon that "all capitals should be fortified," had a peculiar and peremptory application to the case of Washington; and however eager the country might be for a campaign in the field, and for the "crushing of the rebellion," General McClellan had the military sense to see and the moral courage to insist that months of incessant labor must pass away before we could possibly hope to resume active hostilities with any rational prospect of success, and that unless we gave precedence over all other considerations to the proper fortification of Washington, no amount of patriotic enthusiasm, or senatorial thunder, or of popular sacrifice would save us from the most dangerous blow which could possibly be struck at our domestic organization and at our consideration abroad.

But General McClellan was also perfectly calm and self-possessed in his estimate of the measures necessary to be taken to secure this object. It was not difficult for him to inoculate the President and the Cabinet with a decent concern for the safety of the Capital in which it was their duty personally to reside. But it was much more difficult for him to impress upon them a due sense of the proportion which ought to be borne by the measures immediately taken for the security of Washington to the general plans of campaign for the suppression of the rebellion. Napoleon has laid it down that a force of 50,000 men, with 3,000 artillerists, should suffice for the defence of a properly fortified capital against the attack of an army of 300,000 men, being about in the proportion of about one defender to six assailants. Assuming it to be altogether improbable that the Confederates would be able to attack the Federal city with an army of more than 100,000 men, General McClellan set down the numbers of the force necessary for the defence of Washington after its fortifications should have been completed, at 20,000 men, being in the proportion of one defender to five assailants. This estimate, though based on the soundest military principles, excited great uneasiness at the time when it was made in the minds of many eminent persons condemned by their station in life to inhabit Washington, and the influence of this uneasiness may be traced throughout all the subsequent relations of General McClellan with the Federal authorities.

General Barnard, in his capacity of chief engineer of the defences of Washington, bears the fullest testimony in his report to the promptitude and energy with which General McClellan, on his assumption of the command in July, 1861, set about developing and completing the fortifications of the Capi-

. Of the condition of these fortifications, d of the army at that moment, General cClellan himself thus speaks: —

"When I assumed command in Washing- n on the 27th of July, 1861, the number troops in and around the city was about ,000 infantry, less than 1,000 cavalry, and 0 artillerymen, with nine imperfect field- tteries of thirty pieces.

"On the Virginia bank of the Potomac e brigade organization of General McDowell ll existed, and the troops were stationed at d in rear of Fort Corcoran, Arlington, and rt Albany, at Fort Runyon, Roach's Mills, dle's Mill, and in the vicinity of Fort Ells- rth, with a detachment at the Theological minary.

"There were no troops south of Hunting eek, and many of the regiments were en- nped on the low grounds bordering the tomac, — seldom in the best positions for fence, and entirely inadequate in numbers d condition to defend the long line from rt Corcoran to Alexandria.

"On the Maryland side of the river, upon e heights overlooking the Chain Bridge, o regiments were stationed, whose com- nders were independent of each other.

"There were no troops on the important nallytown road, or on the roads entering the y from the south.

"The camps were located without regard to rposes of defence or instruction; the roads re not picketed, and there was no attempt an organization into brigades.

"In no quarter were the dispositions for fence such as to offer a vigorous resistance a respectable body of the enemy either in e positions and numbers of the troops, or e number and character of the defensive rks. Earthworks in the nature of 'tetes- pont' looked upon the approaches to the eorgetown aqueduct and ferry, the Long idge, and Alexandria by the Little River rnpike, and some simple defensive arrange- nts were made at the Chain Bridge. With e latter exception, not a single defensive rk had been commenced on the Maryland le.

"There was nothing to prevent the enemy elling the city from heights, within easy nge, which could be occupied by a hostile lumn almost without resistance. Many ldiers had deserted, and the streets of ashington were crowded with straggling offi- rs and men, absent from their stations with- t authority, whose behavior indicated the neral want of discipline and organization."

The task of educing order and safety from this chaos of perils was, indeed, as a foreign observer styles it, "one of Herculean magnitude." But this task, great as it was, was but a part of the duty imposed upon the young commander of the Potomac army. Although Lieutenant-General Scott still retained the command of the armies of the Union, the President applied to General McClellan, almost immediately upon his arrival in Washington, to draw up a memorandum of a general programme of operations by land and sea, to cover the whole field of conflict.[1] This memorandum was handed by General McClellan to the President on the 4th of August, 1861. When it is remembered that this paper was written amid the diversified excitements of that fortnight of passion and fear, which followed upon the defeat at Bull Run; that it was written by a young commander, suddenly invested with the highest rank in the army, from which he had retired but three years before as a modest subaltern, and hailed as a hero of the Napoleonic order by the universal voice of press and people, in a country to which his very name had, six months before, been scarcely known; and that it was written for the eye of a President who looked upon the civil war as an evanescent absurdity, which must sooner or later disappear before the blast of the political trumpet, it is difficult to speak too highly of the modesty of tone, the sagacity of political insight, the just and patriotic temper, and the far-reaching military forecast which mark it.

One quality of General McClellan's nature shines conspicuously throughout this remarkable document: a quality admirable in itself, but which will appear still more admirable to the future student of our times when he shall contrast it with the spirit which colored and controlled the utterances and the policy of the leading partizans of the Administration when this paper was laid before the President. There is nothing here of those vehement and vulgar fulminations against "rebels and traitors," which weak and silly or malignant and designing men were then everywhere imposing upon the public sense, as evidences of loyalty and love of country. The general who lays before the President such a comprehensive and vigorous plan for the employment of the military forces of the nation, that all our subsequent successes have been achieved by acting in harmony with its conceptions, and our most lamentable subsequent reverses incurred by departing from their scope and tenor, exhibits throughout his formidable programme the most anxious desire for the mitigation of the horrors of war to all his countrymen, whether arrayed for or against the cause of their country — refuses utterly to look upon the angry and misguided populations of the South, otherwise than as citizens to be coerced into obedience to laws as truly designed for their own welfare as for that of their fellow-citizens from whom they have wrenched themselves away, and earnestly pleads for such a complete preparation of the national arms to strike, as shall make a single blow decisive, and terminate the war in one thorough and victorious campaign: and this not merely because a long war involves a fearful waste of human life and happiness and wealth; but because a long war must inevitably bequeath to future ages a fearful legacy of passion and vengeance and mutual hate.

[1] It is a striking illustration of the spirit in which General McClellan is attacked by the organs of the Administration, that this obedience to the suggestion is charged upon him by Mr. Lincoln's authorized biographer as a proof of his "ambition and presumption!" H. J. Raymond's Life of Lincoln, p. 221.

As has been excellently said, by one who had himself passed through the terrors of a great revolution and the fiery furnace of a civil war: — "The most frightful feature of a civil war is not the blood which flows on every side, or the dead who strew the streets and roads, or the shattered walls of once happy homes — it is the passions which ferment in men's souls. Nothing is so terrible as the mutual hatred of those who were born to love one another. The sombre legend which begins the story of the world — the legend of Cain and Abel — seems to hover over these fratricidal conflicts, and to stamp them with a seal of infernal rage. In ordinary war men hate each other like enemies: in civil war they hate each other like brothers."

It is told of one of the noblest of the French Republicans of our own time, Jean Reynaud, that on the third day of that hideous battle of Paris, known as the "days of June, 1848," he was on his way to the National Assembly, when his attention was arrested by a terrible scene in the Place de la Concorde. The fiercest fighting of the day was just over. It was about four o'clock in the afternoon; a workman in his blouse, unarmed and inoffensive, was traversing the place, then occupied by a battalion of the National Guards from one of the provinces. At the sight of the blouse the rural soldiery cried out, "An insurgent! an insurgent!" and rushed upon the unfortunate man, bayonet in hand. Their officers vainly sought to restrain them. The wretched workman took to flight, and was distancing his pursuers, when some cuirassiers stationed near by, seeing him run at full speed, made up the minds that he had escaped from some captured barricade, and dashed directly athwart his path. In a moment the helpless fugitive was surrounded; sabres gleamed above his head, bayonets were thrust at him; his blood had already begun to flow, when suddenly, at the risk of his own life, a citizen forced his way through the excited throng, seized the unhappy workman, and, with the quickness of thought, threw over him the tri-colored scarf of a Representative of the French people.

At the sight of this scarf, the emblem not of a party nor of a passion, but of France herself, of the nation and of the people, the lifted weapons were dropped, and the destined victim was safe.

In the mind of General McClellan the banner of the Union was meant, like the tricolor of Jean Reynaud, to speak to all classes and sections of his countrymen, — in the midst of their passion, in the moment of battle, of victory, or of vengeance, — not for classes nor of sections, but of the republic of the nation, of liberty protected by law and of force consecrated by justice.

Read in the light of its author's spirit and with the eloquent commentary of subsequent events, how instructive a contribution is this memorandum to the right understanding of that "history" which Mr. Lincoln and his administration have for now four years been "making," and suffering to be made, for the people.

"MEMORANDUM.

"The object of the present war differs from those in which nations are usually engaged mainly in this: That the purpose of ordinary war is to conquer a peace, and make a treaty on advantageous terms. In this contest it has become necessary to crush a population sufficiently numerous, intelligent, and warlike to constitute a nation. We have not only to defeat their armed and organized forces in the field, but to display such an overwhelming strength as will convince all our antagonists, especially those of the governing aristocratic class, of the utter impossibility of resistance. Our late reverses make this course imperative. Had we been successful in the recent battle (Manassas), it is possible that we might have been spared the labor and expense of a great effort; now we have no alternative. Their success will enable the political leaders of the rebels to convince the mass of their people that we are inferior to them in force and courage, and mand all their resources. The contest gan with a class; now it is with a people, r military success can alone restore the for- r issue.

"By thoroughly defeating their armies, tak- g their strong places, and pursuing a rig- y protective policy as to private property d unarmed persons, and a lenient course to private soldiers, we may well hope for permanent restoration of a peaceful Union. it, in the first instance, the authority of the overnment must be supported by overwhelm- g physical force.

"Our foreign relations and financial credit so imperatively demand that the military tion of the Government should be prompt d irresistible.

"The rebels have chosen Virginia as their ttle-field, and it seems proper for us to make e first great struggle there. But while us directing our main efforts, it is necessary diminish the resistance there offered us, by ovements on other points, both by land and ater.

"Without entering at present into details, I ould advise that a strong movement be made the Mississippi, and that the rebels be riven out of Missouri.

"As soon as it becomes perfectly clear that entucky is cordially united with us, I would dvise a movement through that State into astern Tennessee, for the purpose of assist- g the Union men of that region, and of izing the railroads leading from Memphis the east.

"The possession of those roads by us, in onnection with the movement on the Missis- ppi, would go far towards determining the vacuation of Virginia by the rebels. In the ean time, all the passes into Western Virgin- a, from the east, should be securely guarded, ut I would advise no movement from that uarter towards Richmond, unless the politi- al condition of Kentucky renders it impos- ible or inexpedient for us to make the move- nent upon Eastern Tennessee, through that State. Every effort should, however, be nade to organize, equip, and arm as many roops as possible in Western Virginia, in rder to render the Ohio and Indiana regi- nents available for other operations. At as arly a day as practicable it would be well to protect and re-open the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

"Baltimore and Fort Monroe should be oc- cupied by garrisons sufficient to retain them in our possession. The importance of Har- per's Ferry and the line of the Potomac in the direction of Leesburg will be very mate- rially diminished so soon as our force in this vicinity becomes organized, strong, and effi- cient, because no capable general will cross the river, north of this city, when we have a strong army here, ready to cut off his retreat.

"To revert to the West, it is probable that no very large additions to the troops now in Missouri, will be necessary to secure that State.

"I presume that the force required for the movement down the Mississippi will be deter- mined by its commander and the President. If Kentucky assumes the right position, not more than 20,000 troops will be needed, to- gether with those that can be raised in that State and Eastern Tennessee, to secure the latter region and its railroads, as well as ulti- mately to occupy Nashville.

"The Western Virginia troops, with not more than 5,000 to 10,000 from Ohio and Indiana, should, under, proper management, suffice for its protection. When we have re- organized our main army here, 10,000 men ought to be enough to protect the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and the Potomac. Five thousand will garrison Baltimore, 3,000 Fort Monroe, and not more than 20,000 will be necessary, at the utmost, for the defence of Washington.

"For the main army of operations, I urge the following composition: —

250	regiments of Infantry, say	225,000	men
100	Field Batteries, 600 guns	15,000	"
28	regiments Cavalry	25,500	"
5	" Engineer troops	7,500	"
	Total,	273,000

"The force must be supplied with the ne- cessary engineer and pontoon trains, and with transportation for everything save tents. Its general line of operations should be so directed that water transportation can be availed of, from point to point, by means of the ocean and the rivers emptying into it. An essential feature of the plan of operations will be the employment of a strong naval force, to pro- tect the movements of a fleet of transports in- tended to convey a considerable body of troops from point to point of the enemy's sea-coast, thus, either creating diversions, and rendering it necessary to detach largely from their main body, in order to protect such of their cities as may be threatened, or else landing and forming establishments on their coast at any favorable places that opportunity might offer. This naval force should also coöperate with the main army, in its efforts to seize the im- portant sea-board towns of the rebels.

"It cannot be ignored that the construction of railroads has introduced a new and very important element into war, by the great facilities thus given for concentrating at particular positions, large masses of troops from remote sections, and by creating new strategic points and lines of operation. It is intended to overcome this difficulty by the partial operations suggested, and such other, as the particular case may require. We must endeavor to seize places on the railways, in the rear of the enemy's points of concentration, and we must threaten their sea-board cities, in order that each State may be forced, by the necessity of its own defence, to diminish its contingent to the Confederate army.

"The proposed movement down the Mississippi will produce important results in this connection. That advance, and the progress of the main army at the East, will materially assist each other by diminishing the resistance to be encountered by each. The tendency of the Mississippi movement upon all questions connected with cotton, is too well understood by the President and Cabinet, to need any illustration from me. There is another independent movement which has often been suggested, and which has always recommended itself to my judgment. I refer to a movement from Kansas and Nebraska through the Indian Territory upon Red River and Western Texas, for the purpose of protecting and developing the latent Union and free-state sentiment, well known to predominate in Western Texas, and which, like a similar sentiment in Western Virginia, will, if protected, ultimately organize that section into a free State. How far it will be possible to support this movement by an advance through New Mexico from California, is a matter which I have not sufficently examined to be able to express a decided opinion. If at all practicable, it is eminently desirable, as bringing into play the resources and warlike qualities of the Pacific States, as well as identifying them with our cause, and cementing the bond of Union between them and the general government.

"If it is not departing too far from my province, I will venture to suggest the policy of an intimate alliance and cordial understanding with Mexico; their sympathies and interests are with us; their antipathies exclusively against our enemies and their institutions. I think it would not be difficult to obtain from the Mexican government the right to use, at least during the present contest, the road from Guyamas to New Mexico. This concession would very materially reduce the obstacles of the column moving from the Pacific. A similar permission to use their territory for the passage of troops between the Panuco and th Rio Grande, would enable us to throw a co umn of troops, by a good road from Tampic or some of the small harbors north of it, upo and across the Rio Grande, without risk, an scarcely firing a shot. To what extent, if any it would be desirable to take into service an employ Mexican soldiers, is a question en tirely political, on which I do not venture t offer an opinion.

"The force I have recommended is large the expense is great. It is possible that smaller force might accomplish the object i view; but I understand it to be the purpos of this great nation to reëstablish the powe of its government, and to restore peace to it citizens in the shortest possible time. Th question to be decided is smply this: shall w crush the rebellion at one blow, terminate th war in one campaign, or shall we leave it fo a legacy to our descendants?

"When the extent of the possible line o operations is considered, the force asked fo the main army under my command cannot b regarded as unduly large. Every mile w advance carries us farther from our base o operations, and renders detachments neces sary to cover our communications, while th enemy will be constantly concentrating as h falls back. I propose, with the force which have requested, not only to drive the enem out of Virginia and occupy Richmond, but t occupy Charleston, Savannah, Montgomery Pensacola, Mobile, and New Orleans; i other words, to move into the heart of th enemy's country, and crush out the rebellio in its very heart.

"By seizing and repairing the railroads a we advance, the difficulties of transportatio will be materially diminished. It is, perhaps unnecessary to state, that, in addition to th forces named in this memorandum, strong re serves should be formed, ready to supply any losses that may occur.

"In conclusion, I would submit that the exigences of the treasury may be lessened by making only partial payments to our troops, when in the enemy's country, and by giving the obligations of the United States for such supplies as may there be obtained.

"Geo. B. McClellan,
"Major-General."

While the organization of the Army of the Potomac was going on, to use the words of the Prince de Joinville, a most competent and candid witness of the mighty enterprise, "with a rapidity and a success which are extraordinary, when we think that the whole thing had be accomplished without any assistance the past; the whole fabric of the Westarmies had also to be constructed. The stern States, though abounding in men and patriotic fervor, were still more destitute of he materials of war than the Eastern; and, ough General McClellan was not formally sted with the rank of commander-in-chief il the month of November, he performed greater part of the then inconceivably oner-duties of that office almost from the first nent of his taking command in Washing-

His suggestions were not always adopted, plans were subjected to revision and mod-tion at the hands of the President, and of those whom the President chose to take his military confidence. But the solid k of organization, — the creation, we may y say, — of the commissariat service, the nsportation service, the ordnance service, artillery reserves, the engineer corps, the toon corps, the telegraph corps, the topo-phical brigade, the coast reserves, the hos-l corps of such armies as no American had r dreamed he should live to see assembled American soil, — all this was put upon the ulders of the young general. And to do this k it was, that through good report and evil ort while inquisitive senators frowned and ted at his reticence, and arrogant journalists nounced his imbecile inactivity, he labored essantly through the long months of the umn. A "Herculean task," truly, and Herculean task of such a nature, too, that popular eye, greedy of whatsoever is glitterg, sudden, and electrical, is slow to rest h just approval and true appreciation upon n who achieves it.

Whatever measures seemed really likely to celerate the moment when the troops of the nion could once more take the field with id force enough to overcome the vast increase momentum given to the rebellion by the ak and ill-advised measures which brought out the defeat of July 21, received a cor-l support from General McClellan, no mat-from what quarter they came to him.

Thus he urged upon the Secretary of War appeal to the States for a draft such as the onstitution had empowered the State authori-es to make in case of need, and had the ap-al been wisely heeded and answered, it is ore than probable that such a law as the onscription Act, passed by the Congress of 863, would never have been so much as eard of among us.

Again, in September, 1861, the President nd the Secretaries of War and of State be-ame convinced that a project existed in Maryland for forcing an act of secession upon the legislature of that State, then about to meet at the city of Frederick. The evidences of such a project were collected under the authority of Mr. Cameron, the Secretary of War, and Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State; and having been laid by them before the President, it was judged expedient to order the arrest of certain members of the legislature more particularly implicated in the alleged conspiracy.

On the eleventh of September, Mr. Cameron sent the following letter to Major-General Banks, commanding our forces in Maryland:

"General: The passage of any act of secession by the Legislature of Maryland must be prevented. If necessary, all, or any part of the members must be arrested. Exercise your own judgment as to the time and manner, but do the work effectively.

"Very respectfully,
"Your obedient servant,
"Simon Cameron,
"Secretary of War."

On the same day General McClellan was called into council with the President, the Secretaries, and General Scott, upon the subject; and it having been asserted to him by the highest functionaries in the land that Maryland was really about to be thrown into the tide of secession, his judgment, as a military man, as to what should be done, was necessarily prompt and clear. To permit even a possibility of the secession of Maryland in the rear of Washington, at the base of the whole army, and of all the operations then planning, was not for a moment to be thought of. The duty of ascertaining the reality of the danger rested not upon General McClellan, but upon his informants, the heads of the Government. The duty of preventing the danger asserted by them to be real, rested upon him, and it was done, promptly and vigorously done.

Circumstances have since come to light which make it very doubtful whether any such project as that denounced to General McClellan was really entertained at the time by the persons charged with being concerned in it. But the crisis at which General McClellan was called upon to act, forbade all hesitation on his part. He reinforced the order sent by Mr. Secretary Cameron to General Banks, with a letter from himself to that officer. The arrests were made, and the prisoners, mostly gentlemen of character, intelligence, and high standing, were properly turned over to the control of the Secretary of State. Under the orders of this functionary and against the protest of the military officers, who upon the suggestion and at the request of the Federal authorities, had acted in the matter, these gentlemen were removed from their own State to Fort Warren, in Boston Harbor, were treated with great indignity and indecency, and their guilt being assumed as unquestionable, were detained in a close and cruel confinement long after all danger from any possible evil influence of theirs in Maryland had passed away; no such opportunity being conceded to them of establishing their innocence as would have been granted to the meanest soldier accused of a violation of his military duty.

On the 1st of November, 1861, General McClellan was called to relieve General Scott of the general command of the armies of the Union.

This high distinction was conferred and this grave responsibility imposed upon General McClellan by the President, after three months of constant intercourse with him in the discharge of his duties as Commander of the Potomac army, and in consultation upon the affairs of the Union. It was a step which it would be doing the President great injustice to suppose lightly taken; and in taking it the President certainly assumed a substantial moral obligation to do all that might in him lie to make easier the task of the man upon whom he had deliberately imposed the onerous responsibility of the command of the armies of the Republic. History will one day pass her final verdict upon the character of the way in which that obligation was fulfilled by Mr. Lincoln. It will be enough for us to show what that way was.

The disastrous affair which had occurred at Ball's Bluff but a few days before President Lincoln conferred the supreme command of the forces upon General McClellan, ought to have warned the President of the danger of interference with the well-considered plans of a commander in the field.

In the beginning of the month of October, General McClellan had found reason to believe that the enemy were preparing to evacuate their positions at and about Manassas Plains. Watching the whole field of operations with an instructed and intelligent eye, he had not failed to perceive that the victory of July 21st, while it had given a certain spirit and prestige to the army of the Confederates actually in service, had indisposed the Southern people in general to making any particular efforts to increase their army, or to strengthen the hands of their government. They had been trapped by the successes of that day into a condition of careless self-confidence which must prove eminently advantageous to the cause of the Union if the renewal of active hostilities could be postponed until the Army of the Union should be strong enough to take the offensive at one and the same time against all the great points of Southern resistance. Little had been done towards adequately fortifying the Southern seaport New Orleans, the most important city of the South, was almost literally defenceless, and the whole Confederate army in Kentucky and Tennessee scarcely amounted to the strength of a single army corps. This being the general condition of affairs at the South, the Confederate Government perceived that it was absolutely necessary to the defence of their capital — Richmond — that the army under General Johnstone, at Manassas, should be kept prepared to fall back upon and cover that city, at the first intimation of a probable Federal movement for its capture by the way of the lower Rappahannock or the James and York Rivers. The value of the position at Manassas, as a base for offensive operations against Washington, had passed away during the inaction which was enforced upon General Beauregard immediately after his victory of July. The Southern army at Manassas had suffered so much from disease, and from defective organization, during the months of August and September, that it was in no condition, in the beginning of October, either to assume the offensive or even to join battle with a superior force advancing from Washington. In the very improbable contingency that General McClellan should suffer himself to be hurried by non-military influences into making the lamentable blunder of such an advance, General Johnstone had accordingly prepared himself to retreat at once toward his true base at Richmond.

Nothing of this was commonly understood at the North, where the continued presence of Johnstone at Manassas was perpetually denounced as an insult, a menace, and a peril to Washington and to the Union; and President Lincoln was incessantly besieged with entreaties, more or less imperious, to command a direct movement upon the enemy.

On the 19th of October, General McClellan clearly conceiving the true state of the case, ordered General McCall to cover a grand reconnoissance in force to be made the next day from Drainsville. This reconnoissance was successfully made; and on the next day, October 20th, General Stone, occupying Poolesville in Maryland, was ordered to make a feint of crossing the Potomac in order to fl the enemy at Leesburg in Virginia, which Jneral McClellan believed them to be, as ly in fact were, abandoning. This feint was de. But in making it General Stone em- yed an officer whose direct personal relations h the President, and whose official rank as enator of the United States seem to have led him into adventuring further than it s expected or intended he should go; and events of the next day, Oct. 21st, con- ted the simple reconnoissance of Edward's rry into the disastrous battle of Ball's luff, a battle fought, certainly, without the owledge or the orders of the commanding neral, fought where there was no direct mili- y purpose to be gained even by a victory; l fought with so little skill and judgment t it resulted in the complete and humiliat- g defeat of our troops by a body of the emy largely inferior in point of numbers d of artillery.

All that could possibly have been won by successful issue of this unhappy movement ould have been a stimulation of the public petite for "brilliant and exciting intelli- nce," and a powerful reinforcement of the ready formidable Aulic Council of military izens by whom the Government was sur- unded and the commanding general beset. s failure confirmed the exulting confidence the Southern troops in their own invincibil- y, and cast another shade of gloom over the avery which the defeat of Bull Run had ready clouded.

Good might, however, have come out of is evil, had the President learned from it e absolute necessity of trusting the control the armies implicitly to their nominal com- ander, and of abstaining himself, and caus- g others to abstain, from ignorant and im- atient interference with operations which nperatively demanded time for their ripening, nd unity of authority for their successful xecution.

Immediately after taking command of the rmies of the Union, General McClellan ddressed letters of instruction to Generals Halleck, Buell, Sherman, and Butler, com- anding respectively the departments of Mis- ouri and Ohio, and the expeditions of the outh Atlantic and the Gulf. In these letters he whole field of operations before the army is urveyed with masterly judgment, and the pecial part to be taken in those operations by ach commander, sketched out for him with learness and with precision, and, as subse- uent events have proved, with an almost narvellous sagacity. The restoration of pub- ic confidence in Missouri by a thorough reform in the military administration of that State, and the chastisement of corruption, the conciliation of the well-disposed population of Kentucky by a "religious respect for the rights of all;" the prompt and decisive occupation of Knoxville and East Tennessee, cutting off all communication between Virginia and the Mississippi; the reduction of Fort Pulaski in the Savannah River, and the organization of a formidable attack upon Charleston. These were the principal measures which General McClellan proposed to himself as the constituent parts of his grand campaign for the reduction of the seceded States to their allegiance to the Union.

Had these measures been carried into effect simultaneously in the spring of 1862, under the untrammelled supervision of a single military mind, and with forces adequate as well in point of preparation as in point of numbers, to the work, it is difficult to resist the conviction that they must have resulted in the complete prostration of the organized force of the Confederate States. As we shall shortly see, such was the condition of the Confederate armies at the time when General McClellan was maturing his plans, that the hastily prepared and somewhat hurriedly executed movements which were made in the West, under the direct authority of President Lincoln, in February and March, sufficed to make an impression upon the front of Confederate resistance in that quarter, which, had it been accompanied by an equal impact upon the eastern and southern bulwarks of the then loosely-jointed Confederate system, could hardly have failed to determine a speedy issue of the war. Won as they were, these isolated and premature triumphs in the West simply aroused the Confederates to a full sense of their danger. The great scheme of the war was broken up by them, and the nation expiated, in more than a year of desperate and costly efforts to master the Mississippi and open a way into Eastern Tennessee, the impatience which refused to recognize the infinite advantages of the delay which perfects concentration, over the desultory and incoherent energy which spends itself in ill-combined and in spasmodic efforts.

The period during which General McClellan really held command of the armies of the Union, and was really in a position to enable him to plan and prepare a campaign proportionate to the area of the war, extended over but a little more than two months. He was called to fill the post vacated by Lieut.-General Scott in November, 1861. Incessantly occupied with the details of the organization of the main army, which was to be directly commanded by himself, General McClellan was, at the same time, burdened with the duty of supervising all the military preparations of the Union, and of elaborating the vast plan of campaign already sketched.

It is not surprising that, while sparing neither body nor brain in this collossal task, the young Commander-in-Chief should have overtaxed even his vigorous constitution. Towards the middle of December he contracted a serious illness, which, for a short time, confined him to his head-quarters at Washington.

During this time the political pressure upon the President, for an advance of the armies, became daily more and more vehement. The Secretary of War, Mr. Cameron, left the Cabinet, and was succeeded by Mr. Stanton, who, while he professed the warmest regard for the young General in command of the armies, gave his most strenuous efforts in support of the external clamor which was driving the President towards a practical nullification of his influence and his authority.

Before General McClellan had fully recovered his health, and without any consultation whatever had with him, the President finally, on the 27th of January, 1862, succumbed to these demoralizing forces, and assumed himself the command of the national forces.

On that day he issued, from the Executive Mansion, the following War Order: —

"Ordered, That the twenty-second day of February, 1862, be the day for a general movement of the land and naval forces of the United States against the insurgent forces. That especially the army at and about Fortress Monroe, the Army of the Potomac, the Army of Western Virginia, the army near Mumfordsville, Kentucky, the army and flotilla at Cairo, and a naval force in the Gulf of Mexico, be ready to move on that day.

"That all other forces, both land and naval, with their respective commanders, obey existing orders for the time, and be ready to obey additional orders when duly given.

"That the heads of departments, and especially the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, with all their subordinates, and the General-in-Chief, with all other commanders and subordinates of land and naval forces, will severally be held to their strict and full responsibilities for prompt execution of this order.

"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

From the moment of the promulgation of this most extraordinary order, the General whom it so peremptorily and so insultingly superseded, ceased, of course, to be respon ble for the conduct of any military operatic not carried on directly under his own ey and specially committed to his own dire control.

It is necessary to remember here that t armies thus directed to be set in motion up a given day, thus publicly announced to fo and friends alike, were made up of ma thousands of men entirely unfamiliar wi war, and commanded, for the most part, l officers as inexperienced as themselves.

The few "veterans" of this host were no whose nominal service, under armies, had date of but from four to five months. As the condition of these great branches of t military service, on which the practicability c moving such a force must have been absolut ly dependent, had the troops been troops c the line inured to war, no one could possibl form an intelligent notion, excepting the co manding general, under whom they had bee organized, and who, as we have seen, was n so much as consulted upon the subject.

Viewed in the light of these consideration this singular Order would seem as unaccoun able in itself as it is certainly unique i the history of human warfare, were not a adequate, if not a satisfactory, explanation c its origin and intent furnished to us by on of the most intrepid defenders of Mr. Lincol and his administration.

In his "Life of President Lincoln," Mr Raymond, of New York, thus simply an clearly states the case: —

"As winter approached without any indi cations of an intended movement of our ar mies, the public impatience rose to the high mt point of discontent. The Administratio was everywhere held responsible for thes unaccountable delays, and was freely charge by its opponents, with a design to protrac the war for selfish political purposes of its own; and at the fall elections the public dissatisfaction made itself manifest by adverse votes in every considerable State where elections were held."

From the moment when considerations of political and partizan expediency thus invaded the great question of the conduct of the war in the mind of the President, all harmonious concert of action between that functionary and General McClellan necessarily came to an end. With such considerations General McClellan, as an honest and single-minded soldier laboring solely for the defeat of the armed enemies of the Union, had and could have nothing whatever to do. The "public dissatisfaction," which "made itself manifest adverse votes" in the fall elections of 61, had its origin in many other causes be- s the delays in the movement of our ies. The civil administration of the gov- nent had been conducted with an extraor- ry recklessness alike of the laws of the l and of the liberties of the citizens, while bare fact of the civil war itself necessarily k the public confidence in the statesman- of a party whose leading representative openly laughed the possibility of such a to scorn, and had predicted the complete oration of order throughout the nation within xty days" from the passage of the Ordi- ce of Secession by the State of South olina. To concentrate this "public dis- sfaction," if possible, upon the delays in movement of our armies; to brand those ys as "unaccountable;" and to fix the onsibility of them upon the commander he forces, was such a move in partizan tac- as seems to have tempted the Administra- into entire forgetfulness of the fatal conse- nces which it was to entail upon the public ice and the welfare of the state.

t would appear, too, that a singular con- nce in his own capacity as a military ler, was, at the same time, growing up in mind of the President. For, not content h assuming the general command, by clamation, of the armies of the Union, . Lincoln at once proceeded to assume the ct control of the campaign of the Army the Potomac in particular.

On the 31st of January, 1862, appeared President's Special War Order, No. 1, ched in the following terms: —

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, Jan. 31, 1862.

"Ordered, That all the disposable force of Army of the Potomac, after providing ly for the defence of Washington, be med into an expedition for the immediate ect of seizing and occupying a point upon railroad southwestward of what is known Manassas Junction; all details to be in the cretion of the Commander-in-Chief, and expedition to move before or on the twenty- ond day of February next.

"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

Had the civil war been suddenly brought an end, by the submission of the South, be- a single movement had been made in the mpaigns of 1862, this "Special War Order, o. 1" would, doubtless, live in history as e most grotesque document which ever anated from a man elevated by his llow-men to a position of great trust and grave responsibility. The accredited biographer of Mr. Lincoln informs us that he distinguished himself in his early life by his bravery and skill in conducting the defence of a flat-boat on the Mississippi River against an attack made upon it by seven negroes. The remembrance of this exploit does not seem to have impelled the President to relieve our naval commanders of the responsibilities of their profession. And it is highly improbable that it would ever have occurred to the President had he found himself on board of the "Monitor," during her memorable conflict with the "Merrimac," to assume the command of that gallant little craft, and prescribe manœuvres of battle to Lieutenant Worden. Yet the brief land campaign against the Indians, in which we are assured that Mr. Lincoln once took a creditable part as a captain of militia, appears to have inspired him with the belief that he might reasonably and respectably undertake to handle one of the largest armies of modern times, engaged in one of the most formidable and difficult invasions upon record!

General McClellan has many times, in the course of his career, exhibited a power of self-command, and a forgetfulness of all merely personal considerations in behalf of his obligations to his country and to the troops under his command, which entitle him to a lofty place among those true heroes who have dared to feel that "The path of duty is the way to glory."

But never, surely, were these qualities more keenly tested than they must have been by this "War Order," which at once shocked his common sense as a soldier, and outraged his self-respect as an officer high in command.

Before this "Order" was issued, General McClellan had explained to the President the plan of campaign which he intended to pursue in Virginia. Like the immortal Dutch Commissioners, who harassed the soul of Marlborough with their incessant interference in his campaigns, the President certainly had a right, in virtue of his position, to know what operations the general in command of his armies was about to undertake; but, like those high and mighty marplots, also, his Excellency abused this right into a warrant for assuming the control of those operations, objecting to them, and modifying all the conditions essential to their success. Had Mr. Lincoln consulted General Halleck on the subject of these pretensions of his, that officer, who has done his country the service of translating Jomini's great work on the "Art of War," might have enlightened him as to the limits of executive duty, with the following passage upon which the campaign of 1862, on the Peninsula, has furnished a commentary more striking than any which the elder history of war has bequeathed to us: —

"In my judgment," observes Baron Jomini, upon the part taken by the Executive Aulic Council, of Vienna, in directing the operations of the Austrian armies, "the only duty which such a council can safely undertake is that of advising as to the adoption of a general plan of operations. Of course I do not mean by this a plan which is to embrace the whole course of a campaign, tie down the generals to that course, and so inevitably lead to their being beaten; I mean a plan which shall determine the objects of the campaign, decide whether offensive or defensive operations shall be undertaken, and fix the amount of material means which may be relied upon, in the first instance, for the opening of the enterprise, and then, for the possible reserves in case of invasion. It can not be denied that all these things may be, and even should be discussed in a council of government made up of generals and of ministers: but here the action of such a council should stop; for if it pretends to say to a commander-in-chief not only that he shall march on Vienna or on Paris, but also in what way he is to manœuvre to reach those points, the unfortunate commander-in-chief will certainly be beaten, and the WHOLE RESPONSIBILITY OF HIS REVERSES WILL REST UPON THOSE WHO, TWO HUNDRED MILES OFF FROM THE ENEMY, PRETEND TO DIRECT AN ARMY, WHICH IT IS DIFFICULT ENOUGH TO MANAGE WHEN ACTUALLY IN THE FIELD."

How completely the President, while leaving to General McClellan the nominal command of the Army of the Potomac undertook to direct that army, appears from the following note, sent by him to General McClellan, while the latter, animated by an honorable determination to remember only the respect due the exalted office of the Chief Magistrate, was preparing a paper in which his reasons for the movement he had resolved upon should be clearly set forth.

"EXECUTIVE MANSION,
"WASHINGTON, February, 3, 1862.

"MAJ.-GEN. MCCLELLAN, —

"MY DEAR SIR: You and I have distinct and different plans for a movement of the Army of the Potomac. Yours to be done by the Chesapeake, up the Rappahannock to Urbana, and across and to the terminus of the railroad on the York River; mine to mo directly to a point on the railroad southwe of Manassas.

"If you will give me satisfactory answe to the following questions, I shall glad yield my plan to yours.

"1st. Does not your plan involve a great larger expenditure of time and money th mine?

"2d. Wherein is a victory more certa by your plan than mine?

"3d. Wherein is a victory more valual by your plan than mine?

"4th. In fact would it not be less valuab in this; that it would break no great line the enemy's communications, while mi would?

"5th. In case of disaster, would not a r treat be more difficult by your plan th mine?"

"Yours truly,
"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

It will be observed that there is no que tion, in this strange note, of the general o jects of the campaign about to be undertake of the nature, whether offensive or defensiv of the operation about to be begun; nor of t material means to be provided for the ex cution of these operations.

The President desires the Commander-i Chief to discuss with him the way in whi Richmond, the admitted objective point the campaign, is to be reached. He assum that he is himself at least as good a judge t that way as the Commander-in-Chief can b and proposes, in fact, though not in form that General McClellan shall undertake execute not his own plan of operations, bu a plan of operations conceived by the sup rior military ability of the Chief Magistra of the republic. The importance of this not to a first comprehension of all the subsequen events not of the Peninsula campaign alone but of the whole war, cannot well be exag gerated.

It was answered by General McClellan, s far as concerned the Peninsula campaign, i the paper which, as we have already said, h was drawing up when it was handed in t him. It has been answered, so far as th welfare of the republic, the honor of ou arms, and the prospects of the cause of th Union are concerned, by two long and wear and wasting years of Herculean efforts thwart ed and misdirected; by the unnecessary expen diture of hundreds of millions of dollars diverted from the pursuits of industry an subtracted from the national wealth; by th rt-breaking sickness of a nation's hope erred; by the irreparable sacrifice of thou-ds upon thousands of lives; answered in od and tears from the heights of Fredersburg, and the plains of Manassas, from wildernesses of Chancellorsville, and the amed unnumbered graves of Spottsylva-

The paper presented by General McClellan he Secretary of War, on the very day of receipt of this note, is so full and manly tatement of the whole case as it then stood, l throws so clear a light not only on the ble military history of the war as well sequently to its date as before that time, t it cannot be too often reproduced or too efully pondered.

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
"WASHINGTON, Feb. 3, 1862.

HON. E. M. STANTON, Sec'y of War.

"SIR: I ask your indulgence for the owing paper, rendered necessary by cirnstances.

"I assumed command of the troops in the inity of Washington on Saturday, July 27, 61, six days after the battle of Bull Run.
ound no army to command; a mere collec-n of regiments cowering on the banks of Potomac, some perfectly raw, others disited by the recent defeat. Nothing of any sequence had been done to secure the thern approaches to the capital by means defensive works; nothing whatever had en undertaken to defend the avenues to city on the northern side of the Potomac.
e troops were not only undisciplined, unlled, and dispirited; they were not even ced in military positions, — the city was most in a condition to have been taken by lash of a regiment of cavalry.

"Without one day's delay I undertook the ficult task assigned to me; that task the on. Secretary knows was given to me with-t my solicitation or foreknowledge. How I have accomplished it will best be shown the past and the present. The capital is ure against attack; the extensive fortifica-ns erected by the labor of our troops enaa small garrison to hold it against a merous army; the enemy have been held check; the State of Maryland is securely our possession; the detached counties of irginia are again within the pale of our ws, — and all apprehension of trouble in elaware is at an end; the enemy are con-ned to the positions they occupied before the saster of the 21st of July; more than all is, I have now under my command a well illed and reliable army, to which the destinies of the country may be confidently committed; this army is young and untried in battle, — but it is animated by the highest spirit, and is capable of great deeds. That so much has been accomplished, and such an army created in so short a time, from nothing, will hereafter be regarded as one of the highest glories of the Administration and the nation. Many weeks, I may say many months ago, this Army of the Potomac was fully in condition to repel any attack; but there is a vast difference between that and the efficiency required to enable troops to attack successfully an army elated by victory and intrenched in a position long since selected, studied, and fortified. In the earliest papers I submitted to the President, I asked for an effective and movable force far exceeding the aggregate now on the banks of the Potomac.
I have not the force I asked for. Even when in a subordinate position, I always looked beyond the operations of the Army of Potomac; I was never satisfied in my own mind with a barren victory, — but looked to combined and decisive operations. When I was placed in command of the armies of the United States, I immediately turned my attention to the whole field of operations, regarding the Army of the Potomac as only one, while the most important, of the masses under my command. I confess that I did not then appreciate the total absence of a general plan, which had before existed, — nor did I know that utter disorganization and want of preparation pervaded the Western armies. I took it for granted that they were nearly, if not quite, in condition to move toward the fulfilment of my plans; I acknowledge that I made a great mistake.
I sent at once, with the approval of the Executive, officers I considered competent to command in Kentucky and Missouri, — their instructions looked to prompt movements, —
I soon found that the labor of creation and organization had to be performed there;
transportation, arms, clothing, artillery, discipline, all were wanting: these things required time to procure them. The generals in command have done their work most creditably; but we are still delayed. I had hoped that a general advance could be made during the good weather of December; I was mistaken.
My wish was to gain possession of the Eastern Tennessee Railroad as a preliminary movement, — then to follow it up immediately by an attack on Nashville and Richmond, as nearly at the same time as possible. I have ever regarded our true policy as being that of fully preparing ourselves, and then seeking for the most decisive results. I do not wish to waste life in useless battles, — but I prefer to strike at the heart. Two bases of operations seem to present themselves for the advance of the Army of the Potomac. 1st. That of Washington, its present position, involving a direct attack upon the intrenched positions of the enemy at Centreville, Manassas, &c., or else a movement to turn one or both flanks of those positions; or a combination of the two plans. The relative force of the two armies will not justify an attack on both flanks; an attack on his left flank alone involves a long line of wagon communication, and cannot prevent him from collecting for the decisive battle all the detachments now on his extreme right and left. Should we attack his right flank by the line of the Occoquan, and a crossing of the Potomac below that river and near his batteries, we could, perhaps, prevent the junction of the enemy's right with his centre (we might destroy the former), we would remove the obstructions to the navigation of the Potomac, reduce the length of wagon transportation by establishing new depots at the nearest points of the Potomac, and strike more directly his main railway communication.

"The fords of Occoquan, below the mouth of Bull Run, are watched by the rebels; batteries are said to be placed on the heights in rear (concealed by the woods), and the arrangement of his troops is such that he can oppose some considerable resistance to a passage of that stream. Information has just been received, to the effect that the enemy are intrenching a line of heights, extending from the vicinity of Sangster's (Union Mills) towards Evansport. Early in January Sprigg's Ford was occupied by Gen. Rhodes with 3,600 men and eight guns. There are strong reasons for believing that Davis's Ford is occupied. These circumstances indicate, or prove, that the enemy anticipates the movement in question, and is prepared to resist it. Assuming, for the present, that this operation is determined upon, it may be well to examine briefly its probable progress. In the present state of affairs, our columns (for the movement of so large a force must be made in several columns, at least five or six) can reach the Accotink without danger; during the march thence to the Occoquan, our right flank becomes exposed to an attack from Fairfax Station, Sangsters, and Union Mills, this danger must be met by occupying, in some force, either the two first-named places, or better, the point of junction of the roads leading to the village of Occoquan. This occupation must be sustained so long as continue to draw supplies by the roads fr this city, or until a battle is won.

"The crossing of the Occoquan should made at all the fords from Wolf's Run to t mouth, the points of crossing not being nec sarily confined to the fords themselves. Shou the enemy occupy this line in force we mu with what assistance the flotilla can affor endeavor to force the passage, near the mout thus forcing the enemy to abandon the whc line, or be taken in flank himself.

"Having gained the line of the Occoquan, would be necessary to throw a column, by t shortest route, to Dumfries, partly to for the enemy to abandon his batteries on t Potomac, partly to cover our left flank again an attack from the direction of Acquia, an lastly, to establish our communication wi the river by the best roads, and thus gi us new depots. The enemy would by th time have occupied the line of the Occoqu above Bull Run, holding Brentsville in t force, and perhaps extending his lines sor what further to the southwest.

"Our next step would be to prevent the er my from crossing the Occoquan between B Run and the Broad Run, to fall upon our rig flank while moving on Brentsville. Th might be effected by occupying Bacon Ra Church and the cross-roads near the mouth Bull Run, or still more effectually, by movin to the fords themselves, and preventing hi from debouching on our side.

"These operations would possibly be resi ed, and it would require some time to effe them. As nearly at the same time, as pc sible, we should gain the fords necessary our purposes above Broad Run. Having s cured our right flank, it would become nec sary to carry Brentsville at any cost, for w could not leave it between our right flank ar the main body. The final movement on th railroad must be determined by circumstanc existing at the time.

"This brief sketch brings out in bold r lief the great advantage possessed by th enemy in the strong central position he occ pies, with roads diverging in every directio and a strong line of defence, enabling him remain on the defensive, with a small for on one flank, while he concentrates everythin on the other for a decisive action.

"Should we place a portion of our force i front of Centreville, while the rest crosses th Occoquan, we commit the error of dividin our army by a very difficult obstacle, and b a distance too great to enable the two par to support each other, should either be a ced by the masses of the enemy, while other is held in check.

"I should, perhaps, have dwelt more dedly on the fact that the force left near gster's must be allowed to remain somere on that side of the Occoquan until the isive battle is over, so as to cover our ret, in the event of disaster: unless it should decided to select and intrench a new base ewhere near Dumfries, a proceeding inving much time.

"After the passage of the Occoquan by main army, this covering force could be wn in to a more central and less exposed ition, say Brimstone Hill, or nearer the oquan.

"In this latitude the weather will, for a siderable period, be very uncertain, and a vement commenced in force on roads in rably firm condition, will be liable, almost ain to be much delayed by rains and
w. It will therefore be next to impossito surprise the enemy, or take him at a dvantage, by rapid manœuvres. Our w progress will enable him to divine our poses, and take his measures accordingly.
e probability is, from the best information possess, that the enemy has improved the ds leading to his line of defence, while we l have to work as we advance.

"Bearing in mind what has been said, and present unprecedented and impassable dition of the roads, it will be evident that precise period can be fixed upon for the vement on this line. Nor can its duration closely calculated; it seems certain that ny weeks may elapse before it is possible commence the march. Assuming the suc-s of this operation, and the defeat of the my as certain, the question at once arises to the importance of the results gained. I nk these results would be confined to the ssession of the field of battle, the evacuan of the line of the Upper Potomac by the emy, and the moral effect of the victory;
portant results, it is true, but not decisive the war, nor securing the destruction of e enemy's main army, for he could fall ck upon other positions and fight us again
d again, should the condition of the troops rmit. If he is in no condition to fight us ain out of range of the intrenchments at ichmond, we would find it a very difficult d tedious matter to follow him up there, for would destroy his railroad bridges, and herwise impede our progress through a gion where the roads are as bad as they ell can be, and we would probably find ourlves forced, at last, to change the whole theatre of war, or to seek a shorter land route to Richmond, with a smaller available force, and at an expenditure of much more time than were we to adopt the short line at once. We would also have forced the enemy to concentrate his forces, and perfect his measures, at the very point where it is desirable to strike him when least prepared.

"II. The second base of operations, available for the Army of the Potomac, is that of the lower Chesapeake Bay, which affords the shortest possible land route to Richmond, and strikes directly at the heart of the enemy's power in the east.

"The roads in that region are passable at all seasons of the year.

"The country now alluded to is much more favorable for offensive operations than that in front of Washington (which is very unfavorable), much more level, more cleared land, the woods less dense, the soil more sandy, the spring some two or three weeks earlier. A movement in force on that line obliges the enemy to abandon his intrenched position at Manassas, in order to hasten to cover Richmond and Norfolk. He must do this; for should he permit us to occupy Richmond, his destruction can be averted only by entirely defeating us in a battle, in which he must be the assailant. This movement, if successful, gives us the capital, the communications, the supplies of the rebels; Norfolk would fall; all the waters of the Chesapeake would be ours; all Virginia would be in our power; and the enemy forced to abandon Tennessee and North Carolina. The alternative presented to the enemy would be, to beat us in a position selected by ourselves; disperse or pass beneath the Caudine Forks.

"Should we be beaten in battle, we have a perfectly secure retreat down the Peninsula upon Fort Monroe, with our flanks perfectly covered by the fleet. During the whole movement our flank is covered by the water, our right is secure, for the reason that the enemy is too distant to reach us in time; he can only oppose us in front, we bring our fleet in full play.

"After a successful battle, our position would be, — Burnside forming our left, Norfolk held securely, our centre connecting Burnside with Buell both by Raleigh and Lynchburg, Buell in Eastern Tennessee and Northern Alabama, Halleck at Nashville and Memphis.

The next movement would be to connect with Sherman on the left, by reducing Wilmington and Charleston; to advance our centre into South Carolina and Georgia; to push Buell either towards Montgomery, or to unite with the main army in Georgia; to throw Halleck southward to meet the naval expedition from New Orleans.

"We should then be in a condition to reduce, at our leisure, all the Southern seaports; to occupy all the avenues of communication; to use the great outlet of the Mississippi; to reëstablish our government and arms in Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas; to force the slaves to labor for our subsistence, instead of that of the rebels; to bid defiance to all foreign interference. Such is the object I ever had in view; this is the general plan which I hope to accomplish.

"For many long months I have labored to prepare the Army of the Potomac to play its part in the programme. From the day when I was placed in command of all our armies, I have exerted myself to place all the other armies in such a condition, that they, too, could perform their allotted duties.

"Should it be determined to operate from the lower Chesapeake, the point of landing which promises the most brilliant results is Urbana, on the lower Rappahannock. This point is easily reached by vessels of heavy draught; it is neither occupied nor observed by the enemy; it is but one march from West Point, the key of that region; and thence but two marches to Richmond. A rapid movement from Urbana would probably cut off Magruder in the Peninsula, and enable us to occupy Richmond before it could be strongly reinforced. Should we fail in that, we could, with the coöperation of the navy, cross the James and show ourselves in rear of Richmond, thus forcing the enemy to come out and attack us; for his position would be untenable, with us on the southern bank of the river.

"Should circumstances render it not advisable to land at Urbana, we can use Mob Jack Bay; or, the worst coming to the worst, we can take Fort Monroe as a base, and operate with complete security, although with less celerity and brilliancy of results, up the Peninsula.

"To reach whatever point may be selected as a base, a large amount of cheap water transportation must be collected, consisting mainly of canal-boats, barges, wood-boats, schooners, &c., towed by small steamers, all of a different character from those required for all previous expeditions. This can certainly be accomplished within thirty days from the time the order is given. I propose as the best possible plan that can, in my judgment, be adopted, to select Urbana as a landing-place for the first detachmen to transport by water four divisions infantry with their batteries, the regul infantry, a few wagons, one bridge train, a a few squadrons of cavalry, making t vicinity of Hooker's position the place embarkation for as many as possible; move the regular cavalry and reserve art lery, the remaining bridge trains and wago to a point somewhere near Cape Lookou then ferry them over the river by means North River ferry-boats, march them over the Rappahannock (covering the moveme by an infantry force near Heathsville), and cross the Rappahannock in a similar wa The expense and difficulty of the moveme will thus be very much diminished (a savi of transportation of about 10,000 horses and the result none the less certain.

"The concentration of the cavalry, &c in the lower counties of Maryland, can l effected without exciting suspicion, and t movement made without delay from th cause.

"This movement, if adopted, will not all expose the city of Washington to dange

"The total force to be thrown upon t new line would be, according to circumsta ces, from 110 to 140,000; I hope to use t latter number by bringing fresh troops in Washington, and still leave it quite safe. fully realize that, in all projects offered, tim will probably be the most valuable consider tion. It is my decided opinion, that in th point of view, the second plan should b adopted. It is possible, nay highly probabl that the weather and state of the roads ma be such as to delay the direct movement fro Washington, with its unsatisfactory result and great risks; far beyond the time require to complete the second plan. In the firs case we can fix no definite time for a advance. The roads have gone from bad t worse — nothing like their present condition has ever been known here before — they ar impassable at present, we are entirely at th mercy of the weather. It is by no mean certain that we can beat them at Manassas On the other line, I regard success as certain by all the chances of war. We demoraliz the enemy by forcing him to abandon his pre pared position for one which we have chosen in which all is in our favor, and where suc cess must produce immense results.

"My judgment, as a general, is clearly in favor of this project. Nothing is certain in war, but all the chances are in favor of thi movement. So much am I in favor of the southern line of operations, that I would pre the move from Fort Monroe as a base — certain, though less brilliant movement, that from Urbana — to an attack upon Manassas.

I know that his Excellency the President, you and I, all agree in our wishes, and these wishes are to bring the war to a close, as promptly as the means in our possession will permit. I believe that the mass of the people have entire confidence in us. I am sure of it. Let us then look only to the great result to be accomplished, and disregard everything else. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"G. B. McClellan,
"Major-General Commanding."

At the time when this letter was written the Western armies of the Union were already in motion and, supported by the gun-boats, were beginning that campaign which, resulting in the capture of Forts Henry and Donelson, compelled the evacuation of Nashville by the Confederates, and led to the bloody but indecisive battles of Shiloh and Pittsburg Landing. This movement, naturally enough, excited the public mind to a still greater impatience with what the Administration press persistently represented as the "unaccountable delays" of the Army of the Potomac, and still further indisposed the President to give the commander of that army the cordial support which he had a right to expect from the National Executive, and which was absolutely necessary to the success of its own far more important movements.

Awakening the Southern government and people to a lively sense of the peril impending over them, this campaign at the West accelerated the preparations of General Johnston in Virginia, for the evacuation of Manassas and redoubled his efforts to provide for the defence of the Confederate capital against any attack from the line of the James or the York Rivers. Against the loss of important opportunities thus incurred in consequence of the abandonment of General McClellan's plan of a general and simultaneous advance, must be set, however, the fresh confidence which the Western victories infused into the army of the Union, dispirited by the defeat of Bull Run. The advantages won over the enemy at Port Royal and at Roanoke Island, though not otherwise of any particular importance, concurred in producing this wholesome effect; and, had the correspondence at the beginning of February, between General McClellan, the President, and the Secretary of War, brought about a frank concession to the General of the powers necessary to enable him to act with freedom and with force, great results might still have been secured.

This, however, was very far from being the case. Mr. Lincoln, indeed, gave way so far as to permit General McClellan to endeavor to proceed with the necessary arrangements for opening his campaign from the Lower Chesapeake, but it was not until the 27th of February that the Secretary of War authorized the Assistant-Secretary, Mr. Tucker, to procure the transports and steamers for moving the forces to their new field of operations. Notwithstanding the urgent representations of General McClellan and of Mr. Tucker, nothing had, before this date, been permitted to be done towards accomplishing this vital preliminary work; and it is worthy of notice by all those who have thoughtlessly and ignorantly lent themselves to the outcry which partizanship has raised over the alleged "slowness" of General McClellan's movements, that in thirty-seven days from the time when the Government at last put the General at liberty to set about preparing his transportation, he had moved, with the assistance of Mr. Tucker, his whole army of

121,500 men,	44 batteries,
14,592 animals,	74 ambulances,
1,150 wagons,

together with pontoon bridges, telegraph materials, and the enormous quantity of equipage, luggage, and the like required for a force of this magnitude, from Washington to Fortress Monroe.

This was done with the loss of but eight mules and nine barges, which latter went ashore at near Fortress Monroe in a gale, — the cargoes, however, being saved.

Well may Mr. Tucker claim for this extraordinary achievement that, "for economy and celerity of movement, this expedition is without a parallel on record."

While General McClellan was superintending and carrying out this colossal movement he was not, however, suffered to be entirely his own master, nor was he delivered from the torment of the Presidential plan of campaign. His own conduct, during this trying time, is admirably depicted by an observer whose competency and whose candor no man of intelligence and of character will be likely to dispute. The Prince de Joinville, an educated and accomplished military man, whose sole interest in the events passing before his eyes, beyond that of a deep and cordial sympathy with the cause of the Union, is that of a student of the political and military history of his times, thus describes the position and the bearing of General McClellan, during the months of February and March, 1862.

"As the day of action drew near, those who suspected the General's project, and were angry at not being informed of it; those whom his promotion had excited to envy; his political enemies (who is without them in America?), in short, all those beneath him or beside him who wished him ill, broke out into a chorus of accusations of slowness, inaction, incapacity. McClellan, with a patriotic courage which I have always admired, disdained these accusations, and made no reply. He satisfied himself with pursuing his preparations in laborious silence."

On the 8th of March, while these preparations, as we have seen, were going rapidly forward, and at a moment when the completest freedom and the profoundest secrecy in regard to his movements were essential to the General's success, he was suddenly sent for by the President to learn that the whole matter must once more be reconsidered and debated. He had already been interrupted in the progress of the arrangements, begun on the 27th of February, by the importunities of the President and the Secretary of War, that he would secure the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and clear the Potomac River of the rebel batteries. In respect to the former, General McClellan fully showed, what events have since a thousand times confirmed, that the true defence of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad lay in the occupation of the Shenandoah, an occupation which his army, upon the eve of a great expedition, was not then in a condition to effect, for which it was the duty of the President, now proclaimed by himself to be Commander-in-Chief, to provide, and which, in spite of repeated lessons, the President has never since intelligently attempted to carry out.

In respect to the rebel batteries on the Potomac, established as they all of them were independently of the rebel base at Manassas, it had been long settled by the report of General Barnard, that their establishment "could not be prevented by the army." It was by the navy alone that the river could be cleared of them, unless the whole Army of the Potomac was to be employed in the task by "forcing," to use the words of General Barnard, "a very strong line of defence of the enemy, and doing all that it would have to do if it were really opening a campaign against them."

The President, however, kept insisting upon this latter operation, and General McClellan, on the 8th of March, 1862, called his di ional commanders into council at head-qu ters, at the request of the President, for purpose of discussing with them a movem towards the Occoquan upon the enemy's ri batteries. At this council the grand ulte movement to the Lower Chesapeake was cessarily revealed. Upon the consequen of this revelation, thus directly forced u General McClellan by the conduct of "Commander-in-Chief," the President, Prince de Joinville simply, but with a terri significance, remarks: —

"McClellan was then forced to explain projects, and the next day they were kno to the enemy; informed, no doubt, by one those thousand female spies who keep up communications into the domestic circles the Federal enemy, Johnstone evacuated M nassas at once."

Watchful as Johnstone had all the win been of the young commander, the value whose silent and patient preparations he co prehended far better than the petulant a headstrong politicians by whom General M Clellan was surrounded, this timely not enabled him to reach Richmond, and to c centrate his attention and his forces upon t Peninsular defences of that capital a mon before the Federal commander was suffered assume the initiative of his campaign.

Memorable indeed, on many accounts, w this ominous eighth day of March, 1862.

On the 8th of March General McClell was compelled, as we have seen, to make l plan of campaign known far beyond what h ever been esteemed proper or prudent in t annals of war.

On the 8th of March another blow w struck at his control of the army with whi he was to operate, in the publication by t President, again without consultation wi himself, of two more "General War Orders.

The first of these divided his army in army corps, and assigned to these corps the several commanders, thus practically takin out of General McClellan's hands the orga ization of his troops. The second tied u anew his whole campaign in the followin almost inconceivable manner: —

"Executive Mansion, Washington,
"March 8, 1862.

"President's General War Order, No. 3

"Ordered, That no change of the base o operations of the Army of the Potomac shal be made without leaving in and about Wash ington such a force as, in the opinion of th

eral-in-Chief and the commanders of army ps, shall leave said city entirely secure.

That no more than two army corps (about thousand troops) of said Army of the Po-ac shall be moved en route for a new base operations until the navigation of the Po-ac, from Washington to the Chesapeake y, shall be freed from the enemy's batteries other obstructions, or until the President ll hereafter give express permission.

That any movement, as aforesaid, en route a new base of operations, which may be ered by the General-in-Chief, and which y be intended to move upon the Chesapeake y, shall begin to move upon the bay as ly as the 18th of March instant, and the neral-in-Chief shall be responsible that it so ves as early as that day.

" Ordered, That the army and navy co-rate in an immediate effort to capture the my's batteries upon the Potomac, between shington and the Chesapeake Bay.

" ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

. Thomas, Adj't Gen."

By the promulgation of his General War der No. 1, the President, had assumed the nmand of all the armies of the Union. By promulgation of this " Order No. 3 " he sumed the command of the campaign of the otomac.

A single comment upon one single clause this " Order " will suffice to show the owledge of military affairs, and the respect the feelings towards General McClellan nself, which presided over its composition. e " General-in-Chief," as General Mc-ellan is derisively entitled, is made " re-onsible " for the readiness of his army " to ve upon the Bay as early as the 18th of arch."

Now it will be remembered that the army uld " move upon the Bay " only by the lp of steamers and transports; that the resident had never consented to any " move-ent upon the Bay " at all until the middle February, there being at that time no ansport service whatever available on the otomac; and that the Secretary of War had ever authorized the establishment of a trans-ort service until the 27th of February, or ss than ten days before the publication of his " Order " which thus called upon Gen-ral McClellan to create, within twenty days, he complete sea transportation service neces-ary for an army as large as that with which he Allies first invaded the Crimea !

On the 8th of March, again, the Merrimac making her appearance suddenly from the port of Norfolk, — in which, as had been known for months to the Federal Navy Department, she had been raised from the bottom, refitted and equipped for a new and terrible experiment in naval warfare, — assailed the Federal fleet lying in those waters, scattered and discomfited the ships, and, for the moment, rode supreme over the lower James.

The engagement which took place the next day between the Merrimac and the Monitor, though it recovered the prestige of the Federal navy, and secured the safety of Fortress Monroe, failed to establish the power of the Naval Department to control the James River. General McClellan was thus compelled to modify the plans of his campaign, upon the calculation that the York River alone must make his line of water communication with his base at Fortress Monroe.

On the 9th of March Johnstone began to evacuate Manassas and Centreville. During the night of that day General McClellan ordered a general movement of the army towards the enemy's abandoned positions, less, of course, with the hope of being able to inflict any serious loss upon him, than in order to prepare the troops for their entry upon the great campaign before them. The observations which this movement enabled the General to make of the strength of the enemy's position confirmed him in the double belief that an advance upon those positions, during the winter, would have been extremely dangerous to the untried army of the Union, and that they had been held so long only that Johnstone might ascertain distinctly from what quarter Richmond was likely to be menaced. General McClellan's own language on this subject has acquired a weight, from the subsequent course of events, which demands its reproduction here : —

" New levies that have never been in battle cannot be expected to advance without cover under the murderous fire from such defences, and carry them by assault. This is work in which veteran troops frequently falter, and are repulsed with loss. That an assault of the enemy's positions in front of Washington, with the new troops composing the Army of the Potomac during the winter of 1861–2, would have resulted in defeat and demoralization, was too probable. The same army, though inured to war in many battles hardly fought and bravely won, has thrice, under other generals, suffered such disasters as it was no excess of prudence then to avoid.

" My letter to the Secretary of War, dated February 3, 1862, and given above, expressed the opinion that the movement to the enemy to retire from his position at Manassas, and free Washington from danger.

"When the enemy first learned of that plan, they did thus evacuate Manassas. During the Peninsular campaign, as at no former period, northern Virginia was completely in our possession, and the vicinity of Washington free from the presence of the enemy. The ground so gained was not lost, nor Washington again put in danger, until the enemy learned of the orders for an evacuation of the Peninsula, sent to me at Harrison's Bar, and were again left free to advance northward, and menace the National Capital. Perhaps no one now doubts that the best defence of Washington is a Peninsula attack on Richmond."

While this movement on Centreville and Manassas was going on, another complete and formal change in the organization of the army was made by the President, the order making it, like so many preceding orders, being published without consultation with General McClellan, and coming this time to his knowledge through one of his aids-de-camp, who, having seen it in the National Intelligencer of March 12, 1862, telegraphed a copy of it to the General at Fairfax Court House.

The Order ran as follows: —

"Executive Mansion,
"Washington, March 11, 1862.

"President's War Order, No. 3.

"Major-General McClellan, having personally taken the field, at the head of the army of the Potomac, until otherwise ordered, he is relieved from the command of the other military departments, he retaining command of the Department of the Potomac.

"Ordered, further, That the departments, now under the respective commands of Generals Halleck and Hunter, together with so much of that under General Buell as lies west of a north and south line indefinitely drawn through Knoxville, Tennessee, be consolidated and designated the Department of the Mississippi, and that until otherwise ordered, Major-General Halleck have command of said department.

"Ordered, also, That the country west of the Department of the Mississippi be a military department, to be called the Mountain Department, and that the same be commanded by Major-General Fremont.

"That all the commanders of the departments, after the receipt of this order by them, respectively report, severally and directly, to the Secretary of War, and that prompt, full, and frequent reports will be expected of and each of them.

"Abraham Lincoln."

When it is remembered that the Presid had permitted General McClellan to "t the field" two days before this order issued, without the slightest intimation t any such change in the organization of army was contemplated, it would certai seem to be unnecessary to look elsewh than to the habitual state of mind of Chief Executive of the nation for an adequ explanation of the "unaccountable delay disappointments, and deceptions which h unhappily marked the course of the under Mr. Lincoln's administration of affai

General McClellan met this fresh bl with his usual fortitude and patience.

On the 10th of August, 1861, being appe ed to by Mr. Lincoln to "withdraw," a let addressed, at his own request, to Gene Scott, on the subject of the then immin peril of Washington, General McClellan h replied: —

"Washington, Aug. 10, 186

"The letter addressed by me under d of the 8th inst. to Lieutenant-General Sco commanding the United States Army, w designed to be a plain and respectful expr sion of my views of the measures demand for the safety of the Government in the imm nent peril that besets it at the present ho Every moment's reflection and every f transpiring, convinced me of the urgent nec sity of the measures there indicated, and felt it my duty to him and to the country communicate them frankly. It is therefo with great pain that I have learned from yo this morning, that my views do not me with the approbation of the Lieutenant-Ge eral, and that my letter is unfavorably regar ed by him. The command with which I a entrusted was not sought by me, and has onl been accepted from an earnest and humb desire to serve my country in the moment o the most extreme peril. With these views am willing to do and suffer whatever may b required for that service. Nothing could b farther from my wishes than to seek any com mand or urge any measures not required fo the exigency of the occasion, and, above al I would abstain from any conduct that coul give offence to General Scott or embarass th President or any department of the Govern ment.

"Influenced by these considerations, yield to your request, and withdraw the lette erred to. The Government and my supe- officer being apprised of what I consider be necessary and proper for the defence of National Capital, I shall strive faithfully l zealously to employ the means that may placed in my power for that purpose, dis- ssing every personal feeling or considera- n, and praying only the blessing of Divine ovidence on my efforts."

In the same temper of single-minded devo- n to the duty which he had undertaken, neral McClellan now wrote to the Presi- nt, who was so recklessly and so wilfully ling with the gravest military interests of e nation, —

"I believe I said to you some weeks since, connection with some western matters, t no feeling of self-interest or ambition ould ever prevent me from devoting myself the service. I am glad to have the oppor- nity to prove it, and you will find that, nder frequent circumstances, I shall walk st as cheerfully as before, and that no con- leration of self will in any manner inter- re with the discharge of my public duties."

The way seemed now to be cleared at st for the grand movement of the Army the Potomac against Richmond by the ute upon which its commander had fixed.

The line of the Rappahannock and the anassas Gap Railway were left secure from l important menace by the enemy, and a ouncil of generals being held at Fairfax ourt House, March 13, 1862, it was greed that if the Merrimac could be neu- alized and the transportation arrangements peedily completed, the operations against ichmond, from Fortress Monroe, should be t once commenced. The proceedings of this ouncil were submitted to the President, by hom they were approved, upon condition hat Washington should be entirely secured, nd Manassas Junction occupied in suffi- ient force. General Banks was accordingly harged by General McClellan with the occu- ation of Manassas Junction, and the defences f Washington were put under the command f General Wadsworth.

At this time General "Stonewall Jack- on" was at Winchester, from which on the 12th of March, he retreated upon the advance f General Shields, and a brief campaign in he Valley of the Shenandoah followed, with uch results as, had that Valley continued to form a part of General McClellan's com- mand, and had the instructions given by him to General Banks been carried out, would have enabled the Union forces completely to clear the country of the enemy.

But the Valley of the Shenandoah was comprised by the President in a new Moun- tain Department, created by him at the re- quest of the political friends of General Fre- mont, and the lamentable events which speed- ily signalized that portion of the theatre of the war have no further connection with the grand campaign of General McClellan than the sinister influence which they exercised upon its fortunes, and for which the Presi- dent alone must be held finally responsible.

For the defence of Washington, General McClellan left a force in all amounting to 67,428 men and 85 pieces of light artillery. His dispositions taken for the safety of the Capital being fully known to the Presi- dent and the Secretary of War, General McClellan was permitted by them to de- part on his way to the seat of operations with the fully implied understanding that these dispositions were satisfactory not to him- self alone, but to them. On the day after his departure, however, the President submitted these dispositions to two subordinate gen- erals, to be by them revised and passed upon, and upon their report proceeded to detach from the grand expeditionary army, and to detain at Washington no less than fifty thousand men, forming one full third of the force upon which General McClellan had been suffered to count not only in preparing his plan of operations, but in actually com- mencing his movement against the enemy. Had the President, in taking this step, been acting under direct instructions from the War Office at Richmond, he could not have more effectually forwarded the purposes of the ene- my. Restrained by the conventional pro- prieties of his position, General McClellan contents himself with describing it, in his offi- cial report, as a "fatal error." It was in truth "a fatal error;" but the circumstances attending a similar step which had been taken by the President a few days before, upon the eve of General McClellan's departure, will abundantly justify the use of sterner lan- guage from unofficial lips.

The division of General Blenker, 10,000 strong, had been attached to the Army of the Potomac during the whole time of the prepa- rations for the Peninsular campaign. "A few days before sailing for Fortress Monroe," says General McClellan, in his Report, "while still encamped near Alexandria, I met the President by appointment, on a steamer. He then informed me that he had been strongly pressed to take General Blenker's division from my command and give it to General Fremont. His Excellency was good enough to suggest several reasons for not taking Blenker's division from me. I assented to the force of his suggestions, and was extremely gratified by his decision to allow the division to remain with the Army of the Potomac. It was therefore with surprise that I received, on the 31st, the following note: —

"'EXECUTIVE MANSION,
"'WASHINGTON, March 31, 1862.

"'MAJOR-GENERAL MCCLELLAN, —

"'MY DEAR SIR: This morning I felt constrained to order Blenker's division to Fremont; and I write this to assure you that I did so with great pain, understanding that you would wish it otherwise. If you could know the full pressure of the case, I an confident you would justify it, even beyond a mere acknowledgment, that the Commander-in-Chief may order what he pleases.

"'Yours, very truly,

"'A. LINCOLN.'"

"To this I replied, in substance, that I regretted the order, and could ill afford to lose 10,000 troops which had been counted upon in forming my plan of campaign; but as there was no remedy, I would yield and do the best I could without them. In a conversation with the President a few hours afterwards, I repeated verbally the same thing, and expressed my regret that Blenker's division had been given to Fremont, from any 'pressure,' other than the requirements of the national exigency. I was partially relieved, however, by the President's positive and emphatic assurance that I might leave, confident that no more troops beyond these 10,000 should, in any event, be taken from me, or in any way detached from my command.'"

What the "full pressure of the case" was to which the President thus confidently alludes, as his justification for an act at once insulting and unjust to the Commander of the Army of the Potomac, to that army itself, and to the whole country, whose dearest interests it imperilled; we may learn now from the best authority. In his "Life of President Lincoln," Mr. Raymond carelessly informs us that this thing was done "out of deference of the importunities of General Fremont and his friends, and from a belief that this officer could make a good use of a larger force than he then had at his command in the Mountain Department."

The bitterest opponent of Mr Lincoln and of his Administration may vainly ransack the vocabulary of contempt for phrases which shall intensify the terrible, though unconscious, sarcasm of this bland and indifferent paragraph. It will stand upon the record of o times forever in melancholy, but irrefragal proof that the leader of the finest army whi the Union had ever sent into battle, we forth upon the most important campaign the war for the Union at the mercy of "Commander-in-Chief" whose profound ign rance of the military art was only equall by his boundless confidence in his own geni for war, and whose inability to comprehend t relative importance of different operations the field was only less conspicuous than b subservience to political terrorism, and to t lowest considerations of personal expedienc in the Cabinet.

So vital is a distinct understanding of th fact to the just comprehension of all the su sequent events of the campaign of the Peni sula, that we may well pause at this point o our narrative long enough to fix the trut clearly in the reader's mind.

We have already seen that, while Gener McClellan has been commonly represented a having been in command of the armies the Union for the greater part of a year, h in truth, occupied that position for a litt more than two months. All the details o the practical organization of the vast forc contributed by the patriotism of the peopl to the policy of the President were, indeed confided to him. He was charged with thes serious, exhausting, and important, but obscur duties from the moment when he appeared a Washington upon the Macedonian cry of th paralyzed and panic-stricken Cabinet in July 1861, down to the time of his departure fo the Peninsula. But the formal authority t plan and direct the great campaigns of the army was committed to him on the first of November, 1861, and was withdrawn from him again before the middle of January, 1862, by the President, whose idea of the whole duty of the military head of the State is happily summed up in his own phrase, that "the Commander-in-Chief may direct whatever he pleases."

Upon resuming the absolute control of all the forces, the President proceeded to debate plans of campaign with the commanding general, suspending the necessary preparations for the most vital operations of the war until he had convinced himself by the verdict of a jury of twelve officers, that his own notions of the wise and practicable in war were not absolutely better and more profound than those of the young chieftain, of whom General Scott, even at a moment when the retiring veteran imagined that he had reasons to be fended with his rising junior, had felt himself obliged to say that he possessed "very gh qualifications for military command."

When at last the President somewhat unaciously made up his mind not to insist on moving the army into the field by the assisted light of nature, he resolved that s own genius should still determine the rm in which that army should move; and volving this weighty matter in the recesses his own mind, he took such order upon it, on three successive occasions, completely odified all the conditions of the tremendous oblem which General McClellan was working out, at the most critical moments for the ccessful solution of that problem.

And this not by any means in exclusive obeence to such purely military inspirations as ay be supposed to have been vouchsafed to "Commander-in-Chief who could direct natever he pleased," but under the pressure strictly political considerations, utterly and tally foreign to the stern and serious busiss in hand.

How these considerations affected the nount of the forces dispensable by General cClellan for his campaign, Mr. Lincoln's endly biographer, Mr. Raymond, has alady shown us. From the same source we rive the following light upon the scarcely ss important conclusions which the President ddenly sprang upon the commander of the oops, in relation to the division of his army to army corps, and to the assignment of vaous general officers to the command of those rps.

Mr. Raymond favors us with the following tter, "never before," as he says, "made iblic," upon this subject: —

"FORTRESS MONROE, May 9, 1862.

"MY DEAR SIR: I have just assisted the ecretary of War in forming the part of a spatch to you, relating to army corps, hich dispatch, of course, will have reached u long before this will. I wish to say a w words to you privately on this subject. ordered the army corps organization not only the unanimous opinion of the twelve genals of division, but also on the unanimous inion of every military man I could get an inion from, and every modern military ok, yourself only excepted. Of course I d not, on my own judgment, pretend to unerstand the subject. I now think it indisensable for you to know how your struggle gainst it is received in quarters which we nnot entirely disregard. It is looked upon merely an effort to pamper one or two pets, and to persecute and degrade their supposed rivals. I have had no word from Sumner, Heintzelman, or Keyes. The commanders of these corps are of course the three highest officers with you, but I am constantly told that you have no consultation or communication with them, that you consult and communicate with nobody but Fitz John Porter, and, perhaps, General Franklin. I do not say these complaints are true or just; but, at all events, it is proper you should know of their existence. Do the commanders of corps disobey your orders in anything?

"When you relieved General Hamilton of his command, the other day, you thereby lost the confidence of at least one of your best friends in the Senate. And here let me say, not as applicable to you personally, that Senators and Representatives speak of me, in their places, as they please without question; and that officers of the army must cease addressing insulting letters to them for taking no greater liberty with them. But to return, are you strong enough, even with my help, to set your foot upon the neck of Sumner, Heintzelman, and Keyes, all at once? This is a practical and very serious question for you. Yours truly, A. LINCOLN."

Upon this letter it is only necessary to observe that General McClellan, as he shows us in his Report, had never opposed the organization of the army into army corps. He had merely insisted that it was necessary to test the merits of the divisional commanders under his orders before deciding upon their respective fitness to be trusted with the vitally important responsibilities of a corps command. Regarding the army under his orders as the hope of the nation in the field, and not as, in any sense, a machine for organizing political influence and power, General McClellan never permitted himself to reflect upon the view which "Senators and Representatives" might take of his action in regard to one or another office. He was absorbed in the duty of ascertaining and selecting the men to whom the lives of his soldiers and the honor of the country might be most safely entrusted.

Whether those whom he found reason to trust would be considered by their rivals as his "pets," or those whom he hesitated to advance would be regarded by their friends as his "victims," were questions which it would have forever and justly disgraced him, as a commander, to entertain.

The President looked upon the matter from quite another point of view, and being the "Commander-in-Chief, who could direct whatever he pleased," he accordingly relieved himself of the "pressure" brought against him by "Senators and Representatives," and compelled the general commanding the army to accept such corps commanders as he thought fit to assign to the service.

It is with no invidious feeling towards any of the officers so assigned by Mr. Lincoln, that we call attention to the fact that of the four corps commanders, selected by the President, with the help of the "Senators and Representatives" afore-mentioned, every one has been removed from that high station since General McClellan was relieved of his command.

One of these generals, the brave and veteran Sumner, has been taken by death from the country he had so nobly served. He had previously, however, been removed by Mr. Lincoln from the command of his corps in the Army of the Potomac.

Another, General McDowell, has been sent by Mr. Lincoln to a post of comparative obscurity in the Far West. A third, General Heintzelman, has been assigned by Mr. Lincoln to the duties of a sort of grand police inspector in the States of Ohio and Indiana. The fourth, General Keyes, has been dismissed by Mr. Lincoln from the army of the Union.

Whether it would have been better for the fame of those commanders and for the general service of the Union that General McClellan should have been suffered to come to his own conclusions in respect to the rank which ought to be assigned to them after a practical experience in the field, is a question which the reader may be profitably left to ponder for himself.

General McClellan reached Fortress Monroe on the 2d of April. It had been understood that the troops at this point, 10,000 in number, under General Wool, were to compose a part of the Army of the Potomac. During the night of April 3d, a telegram from Washington announced that this understanding was revoked by the "Commander-in-Chief who could direct what he pleased"; and that General McClellan was deprived of all control over General Wool and the troops under his command. This order left the base of all General McClellan's operations under the command of another and independent general!

General McClellan, in his Report, tells us that "The council, composed of four corps commanders, organized by the President of the United States, at its meeting on the 13th of March, adopted Fort Monroe as the base of operations for the movement of the Army of the Potomac upon Richmond.

For the prompt and successful executio of the projected operation, it was regarde by all as necessary that the whole of the fo corps should be employed, with at least th addition of ten thousand men drawn from th forces in the vicinity of Fortress Monroe that position and its dependencies being r garded as amply protected by the naval for in its neighborhood, and the advance of th main army up the Peninsula, so that it coul be safely left with a small garrison.

The President having thus been clearl informed, not merely by General McClella but by the four corps commanders whom h had himself selected from among the division generals for promotion, that, "for the promp and successful execution of the projecte operation, "it was necessary that the whole o the four corps commanded by these officer with at least ten thousand additional me from Fortress Monroe, should be employe how did it come to pass not only that one o these corps, and that the strongest of them was withdrawn bodily from General McCle lan's expedition, but that the general com manding it was nominated to the command of new and independent department, created e pressly for him? To withdraw nearly one third of the force "necessary" for the promp and successful execution of a great militar movement, was for the President to take upo himself the terrible responsibility of the fai ure of that movement. Ignorant as the Pre ident was of all military matters, and su rounded by counsellors no more enlightene than himself, some dim sense of this formi able truth, one would suppose, might hav dawned upon his mind. By what was th healing ray obscured?

"The order creating a new department fo Gen. Irwin McDowell," says the well inform ed New York Times of April 7, 1862, "is bu the culmination of a long cherished plan o the progressive Republicans." In othe words, the President of the United State deliberately assumed the dread responsibilit of ruining the most important campaign o the most important army of the nation, fo the sake of propitiating the most "progre sive" and impatient and annoying member of his own political party. This was so di tinctly understood at the time in Washingto that it was the subject of public as well a private conversation; and the following ex tract from the New York Times of April 1 1862, will show the pleasant and humorou light in which the trifling of the Commander

n-Chief who could "direct whatever they leased," and of "progressive Republicans," ho could control these Commanders-in-Chief ith the lives of our soldiers, the honor of heir generals, and the hopes of the nation as regarded by those who were at home beind the political scenes: "It looks now ery much as though the two Macs had been itted against each other, and it would be a ood joke, after all, if Banks's dashing movement down the valley should frighten the ebels out of Gordonsville, and drive them recipitately out of Virginia, thus cheating oth Macs out of a fight."

While the Administration and its friends at Vashington were taking these cheerful and ocose views of war, its responsibilities and s conditions, General McClellan, at Fortress Ionroe, was earnestly endeavoring to ascertain he truth in regard to the rebel forces before im, resolved to do his best with his army and or the country, in spite of official recklessess and executive injustice. He found this ask not much more easy than Lord Raglan ad found it before Sebastopol. His only roper dependence, of course, was upon the eports of General Wool, and General Wool, stonishing as it may appear, had no authentic r intelligent reports to give. He could prolect General McClellan's rear, but could hrow no safe light on the state of affairs in is front. On the 5th of April, for example, General Wool telegraphed to the Secretary f War: "The Army of the Potomac will not ind many rebel troops to contend with." On he 6th of April, he telegraphed: "General Magruder has thirty thousand men at Yorkown." Clearly, General McClellan was left to ind out all the conditions of the situation or himself. His engineer officers, headed by General Barnard, found the strength of the nemy's lines on the Warwick River and beore Yorktown so great, that it was "not leemed practicable to break them," and "too hazardous" to attempt the capture of Yorktown by assault.

The Merrimac, which the President had promised General McClellan should be neutralized by the navy, was still so far mistress of the James that the naval forces in Hampton Roads were entirely unable to assist the army in the reduction of the water-batteries of Yorktown and Gloucester.

In short, all the elements of the position in Virginia were so completely different from those upon which General McClellan had been officially led to count, that his whole plan of campaign had now to be re-cast in the face of the enemy.

The following letter from General Keyes, one of the four officers appointed by the President himself to the command of army corps, states the true condition of affairs at this time, so well, that we give it in full:—

"Head-quarters, 4th Corps.
"Warwick Court House, Va., April 7, 1862.

"My dear Senator: The plan of campaign on this line was made with the distinct understanding that four army corps should be employed, and that the navy should cooperate in the taking of Yorktown, and also (as I understood it) support us on our left by moving gun-boats up James River.

"To-day I have learned that the 1st Corps, which, by the President's order, was to embrace four divisions, and one division (Blenker's) of the 2d Corps, have been withdrawn altogether from this line of operations, and from the Army of the Potomac. At the same time, as I am informed, the navy has not means to attack Yorktown, and is afraid to send gun-boats up James River for fear of the Merrimac.

"The above plan of campaign was adopted unanimously by General McDowell and Brigadier-Generals Sumner, Heintzelman, and Keyes, and was concurred in by Major-General McClellan, who first proposed Urbana as our base.

"This army being reduced by forty-five thousand troops, some of them among the best in the service, and without the support of the navy, the plan to which we are reduced bears scarcely any resemblance to the one I voted for.

"I command the James River column, and I left my camp, near Newport News, the morning of the 4th instant. I only succeeded in getting my artillery ashore the afternoon of the day before, and one of my divisions had not all arrived in camp the day I left, and, for the want of transportation, has not yet joined me. So you will observe that not a day was lost in the advance; and in fact we marched so quickly and so rapidly that many of our animals were twenty-four and forty-eight hours without a ration of forage. But, notwithstanding the rapidity of our advance, we are stopped by a line of defence nine or ten miles long, strongly fortified by breastworks, erected nearly the whole distance, behind a stream or succession of ponds nowhere fordable, one terminus being Yorktown and the other ending in the James River, which is commanded by the enemy's gunboats. Yorktown is fortified all around with bastioned works, and, on the water side, it and Gloucester are so strong that the navy are afraid to attack either.

"The approaches on our side are generally through low, swampy, or thickly wooded ground, over roads which we are obliged to repair or to make, before we can get forward our carriages. The enemy is in great force, and is constantly receiving reinforcements from the two rivers. The line in front of us is therefore one of the strongest ever opposed to an invading force in any country.

"You will then ask why I advocated such a line for our operations? My reasons are few, but, I think, good.

With proper assistance from the navy, we could take Yorktown, and then, with gun-boats on both rivers, we could beat any force opposed to us on Warwick River, because the shot and shells from the gun-boats would nearly overlap across the Peninsula, so that, if the enemy should retreat, and retreat he must, he would have a long way to go without rail or steam transportation, and every soul of his army must fall into our hands or be destroyed.

"Another reason for my supporting the new base and plan was, that this line, it was expected, would furnish water transportation nearly to Richmond.

"Now, supposing we succeed in breaking through the line in front of us, what can we do next? The roads are very bad, and if the enemy retains command of James River, and we do not first reduce Yorktown, it would be impossible for us to subsist this army three marches beyond where it is now. As the roads are at present, it is with the utmost difficulty that we can subsist it in the position it now occupies.

"You will see therefore, by what I have said, that the force originally intended for the capture of Richmond should be all sent forward. If I thought the four army corps necessary when I supposed the navy would coöperate, and when I judged of the obstacles to be encountered by what I learned from maps and the opinions of officers long stationed at Fort Monroe, and from all other sources, how much more should I think the full complement of troops requisite, now that the navy cannot coöperate, and now that the strength of the enemy's lines and the number of his guns and men prove to be almost immeasurably greater than I had been led to expect!

"The line in front of us, in the opinion of all the military men here who are at all competent to judge, is one of the strongest in the world, and the force of the enemy capable of being increased beyond the numbers we now have to oppose to him. Independently o the strength of the lines in front of us, an of the force of the enemy behind them, w cannot advance until we get command o either York River or James River. The eff cient coöperation of the navy is, therefore absolutely essential, and so I considered i when I voted to change our base from th Potomac to Fort Monroe.

"An iron-clad boat must attack Yorktown and if several strong gun-boats could be sen up James River also, our success will be cer tain and complete, and the rebellion will soo be put down.

"On the other hand, we must butt agains the enemy's works with heavy artillery and great waste of time, life, and material.

"If we break through and advance, both ou flanks will be assailed from two great water courses in the hands of the enemy; our sup plies would give out, and the enemy, equal if not superior, in numbers, would, with th other advantages, beat and destroy this army

"The greatest master of the art of war ha said that 'if you would invade a countr successfully, you must have one line of opera tions and one army, under one general. But what is our condition? The State of Virginia is made to constitute the command in part or wholly, of some six generals, viz. Fremont, Banks, McDowell, Wool, Burnside and McClellan, besides the scrap, over th Chesapeake, in the care of Dix.

"The great battle of the war is to come of here. If we win it, the rebellion will b crushed. If we lose it, the consequences will be more horrible than I care to foretell. The plan of campaign I voted for, if carried out with the means proposed, will certainly suc ceed. If any part of the means proposed are withheld or diverted, I deem it due to myself to say that our success will be uncertain.

"It is no doubt agreeable to the commander of the 1st Corps to have a separate department, and, as this letter advocates his return to General McClellan's command, it is proper to state that I am not at all influenced by personal regard or dislike to any of my seniors in rank. If I were to credit all the opinions which have been poured into my ears, I must believe that, in regard to my present fine command, I owe much to General McDowell and nothing to General McClellan. But I have disregarded all such officiousness, and I have from last July to the present day supported General McClellan and obeyed all his orders with as hearty a good-will as though he had been my brother

r the friend to whom I owed most. I shall ontinue to do so to the last, and so long as e is my commander, and I am not desirous o displace him, and would not if I could. He left Washington with the understanding hat he was to execute a definite plan of ampaign with certain prescribed means. The lan was good and the means sufficient; and, ithout modification, the enterprise was cer- ain of success. But, with the reduction of orce and means, the plan is entirely changed, nd is now a bad plan, with means insufficient or certain success.

"Do not look upon this communication as he offspring of despondency. I never de- pond; and when you see me working the ardest, you may be sure that fortune is rowning upon me. I am working, now, to ny utmost.

"Please show this letter to the President, nd I should like, also, that Mr. Stanton should now its contents. Do me the honor to write o me as soon as you can, and believe me, vith perfect respect,

"Your most obedient servant,

"E. D. Keyes,
"Brig.-Gen. Com'g 4th Army Corps.

Hon. Ira Harris,
"U. S. Senate."

While General McClellan and his subordi- nates, in the field, were thus anxiously con- emplating the conditions and seeking the olutions of the problem before them, the Commander-in-Chief," in Washington, stood mazed at their hesitation. He saw what vas to be done at once, and suggested it, by elegraph, to General McClellan, in this light nd airy fashion: —

"Washington, April 6, 1862. 8 P. M.

Gen. Geo. B. McClellan, —

"Yours of 11 A. M. to-day received. Sec- retary of War informs me that the forwarding f transportation, ammunition, and Wood- bury's Brigade, under your orders, is ot and will not be interfered with. You ave now over one hundred thousand troops vith you, independent of General Wool's ommand. I think you had better break the nemy's line from Yorktown to Warwick River at once. This will probably use time s advantageously as you can.

"A. Lincoln, President."

This despatch, it will be observed, bears date April 6th. The "enemy's line," which the Commander-in-Chief who could "direct whatever he pleased," thus cavalierly recom- mended should be "broken at once," had only been discovered by our forces two days before, and is described by General Keyes, who led the advance, as "one of the strong- est ever opposed to an invading foe in any country." No trustworthy information being accessible to General McClellan as to the strength of the enemy behind this line, and General Johnston having had ample time, thanks to the premature revelation of General McClellan's plans, forced upon him by the "Commander-in-Chief," to throw his whole army, if it should have so pleased him, upon this point, General McClellan ventured to think that he might "use time" more "ad- vantageously" than in risking thousands of heroic lives upon the more than dubious as- sault of such a position.

The army and the country have since learned, in an agonizing experience of such "murderous assaults" at Fredericksburg and elsewhere, to appreciate the humane soldierly wisdom which declined to act upon Mr. Lin- coln's brilliant suggestion. It is the glory of General McClellan that, at a moment when a more vulgar mind might have sought popular éclat, and the favor of "Senators and Repre- sentatives," by hurling the army of the Union upon this bristling front of death, he chose that better part which all the ex post facto declamation in the world shall never take away from him; and the second siege of Yorktown crowns him, in the history of his country, with that title which was held especially honorable by the most warlike race of all time, — Victor sine clade, — the bloodless conqueror who had the moral courage to hold to what he felt to be wise and right while all the journals of "progressive Republicanism" rang with exul- tation over the sanguinary conflicts of Shiloh and Pittsburg Landing, and with insulting comparisons between the loud noise of battle at the West, and the silent but irresistible growth of "great designs" in the East.

These comparisons, too, be it remembered, were condensed and hurled at the young Gen- eral in despatches from the seat of govern- ment at Washington, as, for example, in the following characteristic letter from the Presi- dent: —

"And once more, let me tell you, it is indispensable to you that you strike a blow. I am powerless to help this. You will do me the justice to remember, I always insisted that going down the bay in search of a field, in- stead of fighting at or near Manassas, was only shifting and not surmounting a difficulty; that we would find the same enemy, and the same or equal intrenchments, at either place

The country will not fail to note — is now noting — that the present hesitation to move upon an intrenched enemy, is but the story of Manassas repeated.

"I beg to assure you that I have never written you, or spoken to you, in greater kindness of feeling than now, nor with a fuller purpose to sustain you, so far as in my most anxious judgment I consistently can. But you must act.

"Yours very truly,

"A. Lincoln."

Not less characteristic is the calm comment which General, McClellan, in his Report, makes upon this appeal to his selfish fears and hopes. "I could not forego the conclusions of my most instructed judgment for the mere sake of avoiding the personal consequences intimated in the President's despatch."

A speedier evacuation of Yorktown might have been forced upon the Confederates by a movement which General McClellan had planned of the corps of McDowell up the left bank of the York River, but the creation of the Department of the Rappahannock had made this movement impossible.

Finally, on the 4th of May, 1862, the overwhelming batteries of the Union army having just been completed, and ready to open, from all quarters, their irresistible fire upon the rebel positions, General Johnstone commanded the evacuation of Yorktown.

The news of this event was hailed with delight throughout the North, and in Congress a vote of thanks was moved to the General and to his army, by a member from the West belonging to the extreme section of the Republican party, Mr. Owen Lovejoy. Those who have since honored as a martyr this leader in their own faith now departed, are now not ashamed to deride the great and substantial victory which then moved him to this just and creditable action.

The evacuation of Yorktown was followed immediately by an advance of the victorious army as rapid as the horrible condition of the roads and the necessity of establishing a new base of supplies on the York River would permit. Having the advantage of the railway in his rear, and being much too strong in point of numbers to be easily pushed, in retreating through a friendly country, General Johnstone fell back fighting. General Sumner, in the front of General McClellan's pursuit, came with a small part of his corps upon the enemy strongly intrenched in front of Williamsburg. Such was the state of the roads, "narrow and full of frightful morasses from which it was difficult to extricate the cannon," says the Prince de Joinville, "although the weather had been fine and dry for several days," that no such thing as a general action was to be thought of in these virgin forests. The Confederate intrenchments were gallantly, but fruitlessly assailed by General Sumner's cavalry under General Stoneman. The infantry of Sumner came up too late in the evening to affect anything, and during the night one of those tropical rains began, which in the early spring so often convert whole square miles of country, in Eastern Virginia, into one immense lake. The next day was fought the battle of Williamsburg, begun, practically by accident, while the commander of the army was where his duty called him to be, in the rear, organizing and pushing forward the tremendous work of the general advance. The Union troops of General Hooker were first engaged, and although they fought with extraordinary gallantry, suffered terribly, and had begun to fall back when the battle was reëstablished by General Hancock, and by General McClellan, who, having been notified of what was going on, had made his way through incredible difficulties to the front, and appeared in person on the field at the decisive moment to secure the victory to the army of the Union. The Prince de Joinville thus paints, in simple but burning words, this critical and glorious scene:

"The Federal General Hancock, seizing the moment, cried to his soldiers, as he waved his cap, 'Now, gentlemen, the bayonet!' and charged with his brigade. The enemy could not withstand the shock, broke and fled, strewing the field with his dead. At this very moment General McClellan, who had been detained at Yorktown, appeared on the field. It was dusk, the night was coming on, the rain still falling in torrents. On three sides of the plateau on which the General was, the cannon and the musketry were rattling uninterruptedly. The success of Hancock had been decisive, and the reserves brought up by the General-in Chief, charging upon the field, settled the affair. Then it was that I saw General McClellan pressing in front of the Sixth Cavalry, give his hand to Major Williams, with a few words on his brilliant charge of the day before. The regiment did not hear what he said, but it knew what he meant, and from every heart went up one of those masculine, terrible shouts which are only to be heard on the field of battle. These shouts, taken up along the whole line, struck terror to the enemy. We saw them come upon the parapets and look out in silence and notionless upon the scene. Then the firing ied away, and night fell on the combat, which, n America, is called the battle of Williamsurg."

The battle of Williamsburg was but an pisode in the march upon Richmond, and, n the circumstances of the case, could not ossibly have been any more than an epiode in that march. But it threw the elecric light of battle over that love of the rmy of the Potomac for its commander, hich had already developed itself, and hich has since inwrought itself so deeply nto the moral substance of that splendid rganization that, in spite of two years of ncessant obloquy, misrepresentation, and alumny poured out upon his head, the ame of General McClellan rings still like trumpet through its heart.

"It seems," observes one of the most rilliant of modern historical writers, that although by human contrivance a hole people may be shut out from the nowledge of momentous events, in which s armies are taking a part, there is yet a ubtile essence of truth which will perneate into the heart of a nation those kept n ignorance."

Through all the cloud, which partizan assion has raised about the name of Genral McClellan, through all the rolling and welling slanders of a partizan press, and he wordy mists of partizan reports on the onduct of the war, this truth has made its ray into the nation's heart, that the real istory of that arduous march through the wampy forests of the Peninsula, and of hat great siege which has made the rude ame of the Chickahominy immortal, is ritten in the love which the soldiers of IcClellan bear to their commander.

Criticism may assail this love; malignity nay denounce it; but impartial history has nly one verdict upon such affections. Their root is in reality — reality proved and ested by all that is sharpest and sternest n human experience. Their meaning is ncontrovertible. He who wins such affecions is worthy to have won them.

The progress of our sketch has brought us now to that portion of General McClellan's career which is best known to the public, which has been most discussed by friends and foes, and which has been most fully set forth by himself in his Report upon the Peninsular Campaign.

It is not necessary that we should here re-write, in detail, the history of the siege of Richmond. It has already, we trust, been made sufficiently clear that the course of policy pursued towards General McClellan and his army from the moment when, on the 8th of March, the President found himself constrained to waive the adoption of his own "plan," for the campaign against Richmond had made it impossible for General McClellan to look for success in his enterprise to anything like those bold and decisive movements by which, when untrammelled and at liberty to act, he had organized victory in Western Virginia. In the execution of such movements it is vitally essential that he who undertakes them should know precisely upon what amount of force he may count, and that he should be the absolute master of the dispositions of that force.

For General McClellan, in the face of his experience of the President's theory and practice of the "command-in-chief" of the armies, to have risked a single important manœuvre upon the belief that any one of the corps under his orders was so attached to his army that it might not at any moment be detached from him by telegram, for service in the Rocky Mountains of the West, or the sea islands of the South, would have been little less than a crime.

Immediately after the evacuation of Yorktown, the Confederates abandoned Norfolk, and blew up the Merrimac. The troops of General Huger, to the number of 18,000 men, were drawn in upon the main body at Richmond, before which city Johnstone prepared himself for a desperate stand on the formidable defensive line of the Chickahominy. The crew of the Merrimac were transferred to the naval batteries, which, suddenly thrown up at Drury's Bluff, on the James River, proved themselves, when assailed by the gun-boats and iron-clads of the Federal fleet, a not less formidable barrier to the passage of that river than the Merrimac in her time had been.

This repulse of the gun-boats, and this increase of the force assembled at Richmond, made it impossible for General McClellan, situated as he was, to venture upon the grand flank movement for transferring his base to the James, to which the destruction of the Merrimac would otherwise have invited him. Although his army had been reduced by the policy of the Administration far below the figure which had been deemed necessary to its safety by the President himself and his councillors, when the expedition was decided upon, it was still however strong enough, with the aid of the gun-boats on the York and the Pamunkey, to threaten and advance upon Richmond, to drive the Confederates within the lines of their capital, and to compel them to a decisive battle whenever it should receive the reinforcements which it could scarcely be deemed the Government would hesitate to throw into its thinned but triumphant ranks.

"Who," exclaims the Prince de Joinville, with very natural amazement,—"who could foresee that the 80,000 men assembled before Washington, would do nothing and less than nothing to aid the army in overcoming the concentration of forces it was called upon to encounter?"

General McClellan urged the exigency of the position, in repeated telegrams, upon the President and the Secretary of War, as he advanced. Imperfect as all sources of information necessarily were in a country profoundly and passionately hostile to his army, he yet learned enough of the true state of things in Richmond to satisfy him that it was the intention of the Confederate government, reassured as they were, by the repulse of the gun-boats, as to the safety of their capital from an attack by the James, to concentrate all their available forces for defence on the line of the Chickahominy. The following telegram, of May 14, will show how his representations of these facts were received at Washington: —

"Camp at Cumberland, May 14, 1862.

"His Excellency, Abraham Lincoln,

"President of the United States:

"I have more than twice telegraphed to the Secretary of War, stating that, in my opinion, the enemy were concentrating all their available force to fight this army in front of Richmond, and that such ought to be their policy. I have received no reply whatever to any of these telegraphs.

"I beg leave to repeat their substance to your Excellency, and to ask that kind consideration which you have ever accorded to my representations and views. All my information from every source accessible to me, establishes the fixed purpose of the rebels to defend Richmond against this army by offering us battle with all the troops they can collect from east, west, and south, and my own opinion is confirmed by that of all my commanders whom I have been able to consult.

"Casualties, sickness, garrisons, and guards have much weakened my force and will continue to do so. I cannot bring into actual battle against the enemy more than eighty thousand men at the utmost, and with them I must attack in position probably intrenched, a much larger force —perhaps double my numbers. It is possible that Richmond may be abandoned without a serious struggle; but the enemy are actually in great strength between here and there, and it would be unwise, and even insane, for me to calculate upon anything but a stubborn and desperate resistance. If they should abandon Richmond it may well be that it is done with the purpose of making the stand at some place in Virginia, south or west of there, and we should be in condition to press them without delay. The Confederate leaders must employ their utmost efforts against this army in Virginia, and they will be supported by the whole body of their military officers, among whom there may be said to be no Union feeling, as there is also very little among the higher class of citizens in the seceding States.

"I have found no fighting men in this Peninsula—all are in the ranks of the opposing foe.

"Even if more troops than I now have should prove unnecessary for purposes of military occupation, our greatest display of imposing force in the capital of the rebel government will have the best moral effect. I most respectfully and earnestly urge upon your Excellency that the opportunity has come for striking a fatal blow at the enemies of the Constitution, and I beg that you will cause this army to be reinforced without delay by all the disposable troops of the Government. I ask for every man that the Government can send me. Any commander of the reinforcements, whom your Excellency may designate, will be acceptable to me, whatever expression I may have heretofore addressed to you on that subject.

"I will fight the enemy, whatever their force may be, with whatever force I may have, and I firmly believe that we shall beat them; but our triumph should be made decisive and complete. The soldiers of this army love their Government, and will fight well in its support; you may rely upon them. They have confidence in me as their General, and in you as their President. Strong reinforcements will, at least, save the lives of many of them. The reater our force, the more perfect will be ur combinations, and the less our loss.

"For obvious reasons, I beg you to give mmediate consideration to this communi- ation, and to inform me fully at the ear- est moment of your final determination.

"GEO. B. MCCLELLAN,
"Major-General Com'g."

To this telegram a reply finally came, ated May 18, and signed by Mr. Stanton, ho had now begun to rule the situation.

"WASHINGTON, May 18—2 P. M.

"GENERAL: Your despatch to the Presi- ent, asking reinforcements, has been re- eived and carefully considered.

"The President is not willing to uncover ie Capital entirely; and it is believed that ven if this were prudent, it would require ore time to effect a junction between your rmy and that of the Rappahannock by the ay of the Potomac and York Rivers, than y a land march. In order, therefore, to ncrease the strength of the attack upon Richmond at the earliest moment, General McDowell has been ordered to march upon hat city by the shortest route. He is or- ered, keeping himself always in position, o save the Capital from all possible attack, o to operate as to put his left wing in ommunication with your right wing; and ou are instructed to coöperate so as to es- ablish this communication as soon as pos- ible by extending your right wing to the orth of Richmond.

"It is believed that this communication an be safely established either north or outh of the Pamunkey River.

"In any event, you will be able to prevent he main body of the enemy's forces from aving Richmond, and falling in over- helming force upon General McDowell. He will move with between thirty-five and orty thousand men.

"A copy of the instruction to General McDowell are with this. The specific task ssigned to his command has been to pro- ide against any danger to the Capital of he nation.

"At your earnest call for reinforcements, e is sent forward to coöperate in the re- uction of Richmond, but charged, in at- empting this, not to uncover the city of Washington, and you will give no order, ither before or after your junction, which an put him out of position to cover this ity. You and he will communicate with ach other by telegraph or otherwise, as frequently as may be necessary for suffi- cient coöperation. When Gen. McDowell is in position on your right, his supplies must be drawn from West Point, and you will instruct your staff officers to be pre- pared to supply him by that route.

"The President desires that General Mc- Dowell retain the command of the Depart- ment of the Rappahannock, and of the forces with which he moves forward.

"By order of the President.

"EDWIN M. STANTON."

The sentences which we have italicized in this strange despatch are an apocalypse of the views which had prevailed in Wash- ington as to the Peninsular campaign. That movement against Richmond had now become entirely secondary in the minds of Mr. Lincoln and his advisers to the "de- fence of Washington." The commander of the Department of the Rappahannock was to vindicate the wisdom of the White House by moving against Richmond "by the shortest route," and Richmond was to be taken by his forces, those of General Mc- Clellan coöperating.

By advancing General McDowell on this route instead of sending him by water, the Administration, as a glance at the map will show, not only compelled General McClel- lan to abandon entirely all hope of taking advantage of the possible reopening of the James, but forced him to extend his right wing inordinately in order to meet and make his junction with McDowell march- ing from the north; drove him to the tedious and wasting work of bridging the Chickahominy, and finally exposed him, by the sudden withdrawal of McDowell's army, — which took place as soon as those peril- ous preparations for "coöperating" with it were fairly under way, — to the terrible blow which the Confederates eventually struck.

A telegram from Mr. Lincoln, on the 4th of May, put General McDowell under the orders of General McClellan, in the case of the junction of their forces, and announced that the Army of the Rappa- hannock would positively move on the next day but one.

While all this, however, was going on, the Confederates had not been idle. They had clearly ascertained that the relative importance of the operations on the Poto- mac and in the Shenandoah Valley, and of those before Richmond, was far from being understood at Washington, and they were swift to take advantage of the discovery. General "Stonewall" Jackson appeared in the valley, and spread such consternation by his movements, that in the afternoon of the 24th of May the President telegraphed again to General McClellan, announcing that, in consequence of "Banks's critical position," he had been obliged to "suspend" McDowell's advance.

This change of purpose leaving General McClellan with a line immensely and dangerously extended, and entirely in the dark as to what he might ultimately expect in the way of support from McDowell, it became more than ever necessary for him to strengthen himself artificially, and to construct such a number of bridges over the Chickahominy as would enable him safely to hold both banks of that stream in order to guard his communications. Arduous at all times in the face of a powerful and active enemy, this work was made trebly arduous by the unprecedented state of the weather. Incessant rains, such as had not been known for twenty years, flooded the low and swampy banks of the Chickahominy and swelled that brook itself to a river. Still the General urged his men to their ungrateful toil, and still the men unmurmuringly responded to his calls. That the Army of the Potomac was to be left to itself to await, as best it might, the moment when the enemy should feel himself strong enough to assume the offensive, became daily more and more plain. Such was the panic spread by the dashing and eccentric demonstrations of Jackson, and such the profound obfuscation which he contrived to breed in the official mind at Washington, that he actually wrung from Mr. Lincoln, on the 25th of May, the following telegram: —

"WASHINGTON, May 25, 1862, — 2 P. M.

"MAJ.-GEN. MCCLELLAN: The enemy is moving north in sufficient force to drive Gen. Banks before him; precisely in what force we cannot tell. He is also threatening Leesburg and Geary on the Manassas Gap Railroad from both north and south — in precisely what force we cannot tell. I think the movement is a general and a concerted one, such as could not be if he was acting upon the purpose of a very desperate defence of Richmond. I think the time is near when you must either attack Richmond or give up the job, and come back to the defence of Washington. Let me hear from you instantly.

"A. LINCOLN,
"President."

Possessed with an extraordinary infatuation as to the probability of the enemy's swooping down upon Washington by the way of Fredericksburg, the President, for some days, could not be made to comprehend that there was anything important in the world to be done excepting to cut the Fredericksburg and Richmond Railroad. In vain did General McClellan urge some attention to the true principles of the defence of Washington, as laid down by him before leaving the Potomac. The whole concern of the Administration centred upon the city of the Rappahannock.

On the 26th General McDowell advanced beyond the Rappahannock, and the enemy in that quarter began to fall back toward Hanover Court House and Richmond. This rebel force, commanded by Generals Anderson and Branch, was considerable enough in numbers to threaten the right and rear of General McClellan's extended line, and he at once ordered General Fitz John Porter — justly described by the New York Times, as one of the "noblest, most painstaking, and trustworthy of our officers" — to attack and dislodge it.

General Porter performed this duty with signal success. The battle of Hanover Court House was fought by him on the 27th of May. The whole division of General Branch, about 10,000 strong, was utterly routed, and General Anderson, who was supporting him at Ashland, hastily retreated upon Richmond. The fugitives from these points carried the news of the disaster into the rebel capital, where it was universally supposed that the action indicated the junction of the army of McDowell with the army of McClellan. This belief threw the city into the greatest alarm and confusion. The roads leading to the South were crowded with escaping citizens, women and children; and had the junction of the two Union armies been really now effected and General McClellan been thus enabled to force a decisive battle for the possession of Richmond, it can scarcely be doubted that the place must have fallen into his hands. So well aware of this was General McClellan, that immediately after the victory he telegraphed to the Government — "There is no doubt that the enemy are concentrating everything on Richmond. I will do my best to cut off Jackson, but am doubtful whether I can."

"It is the policy and duty of the Government to send me by water all the well drilled troops available. I am confiden at Washington is in no danger. Engines d cars in large numbers have been sent to bring down Jackson's command.

"I may not be able to cut them off, but ll try; we have cut all but the F. & R. R. The real issue is in the battle about be fought in front of Richmond. All ir available troops should be collected ere, not raw regiments, but the well-illed troops. It cannot be ignored that desperate battle is before us; if any regi-ent of good troops remain unemployed it ill be an irreparable fault committed.

"G. B. McClellan, Major-General.
Hon. E. M. Stanton, Sec'y of War."

On the next day, the 29th, having tained information that there was positively rebel force between Hanover Junction d Fredericksburg, he telegraphed this so to Washington. The President and ecretary of War, however, on the au-hority of certain contrabands, preferred to elieve that the rebels were not concen-rating on Richmond, but, on the con-rary, reinforcing the terrible Stonewall ackson, who might at any moment de-roy Gen. Banks, devour Gen. Fremont, nd annihilate Washington.

They accordingly threw away all the re-ults of the battle of Hanover Court House, y refusing to permit McDowell to join the Army of the Potomac.

Two years of waiting and fruitless efforts ave since atoned for the colossal blunder hen committed at Washington.

The golden opportunity offered to the ountry at the end of May, 1862, by Por-er and McClellan, has never since re-urned. The Confederates were not slow o avail themselves of the advantages held ut to them by the bewilderment and vac-llation of the Washington government. Gen. McClellan, as we have already seen, had been obliged to extend his line danger-ously, in order to meet the overland ad-vance of McDowell, and to attempt to hold both banks of the Chickahominy, in order to secure his own communications.

As soon as it was ascertained that Stone-wall Jackson had arrested the advance of McDowell, Gen. Johnstone at Richmond, at once determined to throw himself upon the weakest point of Gen. McClellan's position.

A rain-storm of unparalleled violence, on the night of May 30th, favored his de-sign. In a few hours the Chickahominy was converted into a roaring torrent. All the bridges of the Army of the Potomac, with a single exception, were rendered im practicable. The roads were destroyed. And on the 31st of May, the Confederates furiously assailed the left wing of Gen. McClellan's army at Fair Oaks. Gen. Casey's redoubts, in the advance of this wing, were stormed and carried; and after a desperate battle, in which the advantage rested with the Confederates, their victori-ous progress, threatening the absolute de-struction of the whole left wing, was arrest-ed with difficulty, just at nightfall, by the artillery of Gen. Sumner.

Night put an end to the conflict. Dur-ing the night an attempt was made to throw new bridges across the stream, and pass over the whole right wing of the Army of the Potomac. It was too late; the floods increasing prevented the execu-tion of the work. All that men could do General McClellan and his subordinates did. The General-in-Chief, rising from a sick-bed, spent the greater part of the night on horseback conferring with his generals and pushing on the operations. Snatching a slight repose towards day-break, he remounted his horse at the first sound of the guns, and appeared in the ad-vance of Sumner's corps when the battle began again in the morning; on the side of the Federal troops, with all the valor of des-peration; on the side of the Confederates in a fierce, confused disorderly fashion, attrib-utable to the fact, not then generally known to either army, that Gen. Johnstone, expos-ing himself with his usual gallantry, had fallen dangerously wounded. This circum-stance left the rebel army for a time with-out a recognized leader. Failing to over-come the determined resistance of the Fed-eral troops, the Confederates about noon on the 1st of June fell back in confusion on Richmond.

Thus ended the battle of Fair Oaks. Had it been possible for Gen. McClellan at this time to throw his right wing, with his artillery, across the Chickahominy, and advance upon Richmond during the two or three days of confusion which followed the failure of the Confederate attack and the fall of Gen. Johnstone, Richmond might have been seized and occupied.

Thanks to the confused and contradic-tory orders from Washington, by which his army had been forced to assume the posi-tion which it held before the battle, and to the tremendous rains of the 30th of May, this was simply impossible.

Gen. Lee succeeded immediately to the command of Gen. Johnstone; the Army of the Potomac strengthened itself in its position; and on the 3d of June Mr. Lincoln kindly telegraphed to Gen. McClellan to keep a close eye "on the Chickahominy River!"

The first days of June passed on; continual rains surrounded the operations of the army with difficulties, which, as Mr. Stanton, on the 11th, telegraphed to Gen. McClellan, "No art or skill could possibly avoid, but only endure;" the reinforcements, so urgently needed, still failed to arrive.

So weak had now become the extended lines that, on the 13th of June, the rebel Gen Stuart, with 1500 cavalry and four guns, was able to make a clever circuit of the whole army.

Thoroughly appreciating the dangers of his position, and determined not to imitate the inaction which had paralyzed the army before Corinth, Gen. McClellan, after taking the precaution to order supplies to City Point on the James, in preparation for a movement which he was already meditating, to a new, safer, and stronger base, on that river, devoted himself to bringing on a general engagement before Richmond.

The Prince de Joinville thus describes some of the adventures which attended the preliminary reconnoissances now become necessary: —

"On one occasion," says the Prince, "the General had climbed, with several of his officers, to the top of a high tree, and there, every man on his branch, with spy-glass in hand, they had held a sort of council of war. This took place within a hundred paces of the hostile pickets, whom no attempt at observation could escape. We dreaded to hear the crack of the rifles of the famous Southern squirrel-shooters; but they were magnanimous, and the reconnoissance ended without a mishap. On another occasion, the staff of a Confederate commander appeared, simultaneously with our own, upon the banks of the Chickahominy. At once, the hostile gentlemen ordered up one of their bands, which played a popular air; but it was hardly ended before the musicians gave way to a battery, which, coming up at full gallop, opened a terrible fire, to which we soon responded. These examinations convinced us that the enemy was not idle, and that he had thrown up works, armed with heavy guns, precisely where we did not wish to see them."

During all this time General McClell was vainly attempting to convince t Government of the importance of co centrating all its efforts on the reductio of Richmond. He suggested that mov ment upon Atlanta which has since, aft two years, been adopted, as a means c compelling the enemy to divide the for which they were gathering up for t decisive struggle before their capit He reiterated his appeal for the coöper tion of McDowell, and his convictio that the movements of "Stonewall Jackson were designed to culminate i the sudden return of that commander t Richmond, when he should have su ceeded in preventing this coöperation.

Meanwhile, if the Army of the Pot mac, thinned by battle and disease, wa really to be left to itself, General McCle lan determined so to wield it that whe attacked, as he saw that he in that cas should be, by an overwhelming concen tration of the enemy, he might hold hi communications by the York River lon enough to enable him to change his bas successfully to the James. This once effected, he supposed, as he had a righ to suppose, that the Government a Washington, awakened at last to under stand the designs of the Confederate would finally abandon its strange, inco herent, and inconclusive military policy and throw the whole strength of th army upon this decisive point.

On the 25th of June, the bridge an intrenchments being at last completed, a advance of Heintzelman's corps brough on a smart action, preliminary to th general advance, which resulted advan tageously to the Federal troops. Bu in the evening of the same day McClel lan learned that Jackson, with 30,00 men, had reached Hanover Court House threatening his right and rear. Other rumors, some of them no doubt incorrect, were brought in to him, of the reinforcements pouring into Richmond; but the substantial truth that the Confederate Commander-in-chief had completely outwitted the Government at Washington, and was ready to pour his whole available force upon the devoted army before Richmond, was no longer to be questioned. On the next day, the 26th, the Confederates attacked the right wing of the army in force, and the retreat to the James began.

The forces which had been befooled

ıd beaten by Jackson, in the valley and ong the Potomac, were now consoli- ıted by the Administration into the Army of Virginia," a commander for hich army was sought in the person of eneral Pope, and the Army of the Po- ımac was left to Providence, to the skill its commander, and to its own heroic ravery.

The history of the seven days which llowed need not here be written. hrough every hour of that tremendous eek the army proved itself worthy of ıe firm reliance upon its conduct and s courage in which its General began ıe of the most dangerous and difficult ndertakings ever attempted in war.

"I was confident," says McClellan, in s Report, "in the valor and discipline my brave army, and knew that it ıuld be trusted equally to retreat or dvance, and to fight the series of battles ow inevitable, whether retreating from ctories or marching through defeats; short, I had no doubt whatever of its ility, even against superior numbers, to ght its way through to the James, and t a position whence a successful ad- ıce upon Richmond would be again ssible. Their superb conduct through e next seven days justified my faith."

How well the Army of the Potomac ight have borne itself through this ter- ble ordeal had it been commanded by "Congressional Committee on the Con- ıct of the War," or even by the adminis- ative officers who suffered Gen. Jackson paralyze for weeks with twenty thousand en the powerful armies of the Rappahan- ock, the Mountains, and Washington City, ight be an interesting subject of histori- l inquiry. By what qualities it was that ıe general who actually led them through week of battle and of victory, without ıe loss of a gun, unbroken in discipline, ıd unshaken in spirit, from positions hich the folly or the recklessness of their vn government had rendered untenable, ck to the most formidable base of opera- ons which has ever been held by an army the Union operating against Richmond, foreign witness, competent to the task, as very adequately set forth.

Mr. Motley, the accomplished Minister the United States in Austria, in October, 862, sent to Mr. Seward the following ex- act from the leading military journal of ıe Austrian Empire. "It is not to be ondered at, then, if the General-in-Chief of the Army of the Potomac was in haste to save the army intrusted to him from the dangers surrounding it, even from certain destruction; from a noose, in fact, which required only to be drawn a little closely together in order to suffocate the soul of the Union. The manner in which he acquitted himself of this most difficult of all military tasks redounds to his infinite honor, and places him at once in the ranks of those memorable commanders whose names history treasures for posterity; men who, if they have, perhaps, not had the art to chain victory to their banners, possessed, at any rate, the fortitude, the audacity, and the circumspection to rescue their armies from impending ruin. The American General has made a thorough study of war in the swamps of the Chickahominy, and has made himself a complete master in that most difficult of professions. He has manifested the unquestioned talent to save his army in a manner not sufficiently to be admired, out of the most desperate of situations. Moreau made himself immortal by his famous retreat from the Iller to the Rhine, in the year 1796. What is due to the American General-in-Chief, who conducted, with a morally and physically exhausted army through a swampy, pathless country, covered with ancient forests, and in face of an open enemy outnumbering him two to one, the most classical of all retreats recorded in military history, without a single disaster!"

The President of the United States seems to have conceived that this great achievement was adequately recognized in the following telegrams sent immediately after that magnificent victory of Malvern Hill, which dissipated all the hopes formed by the Confederates of the destruction of McClellan's army, and assured its quiet reorganization at its new base:—

"WASHINGTON, July 3, 1862—5 P. M.

"MAJ.-GENERAL G. B. McCLELLAN,—

"Yours of 5.30 yesterday, is just received. I am satisfied that yourself, officers, and men have done the best you could. All accounts say better fighting was never done. Ten thousand thanks for it."

"JULY 5, 1862—9 P. M.

. . . . . .

"A thousand thanks for the relief your two despatches gave me. Be assured the heroism of yourself, officers, and men is, and forever will be, appreciated. If you can hold your present position we can hive the enemy yet.

"A. Lincoln."

These despatches are the more significant that, coming as they did after a despatch sent by Gen. McClellan on the 28th of June, from Savage's Station, in which, standing amid the dead and dying of his heroic army, and "feeling in his heart," to use his own warm words, the loss of every brave man who had been needlessly sacrificed, he had plainly said to Mr. Stanton "you have done your best to sacrifice this army," the words of the President virtually indorsed this terrible indictment, and authorized the General, who made it to anticipate that the necessary means would be given him, to "hold his position and to hive the enemy."

But irresolute and vacillating as ever, the President speedily subsided into fresh acquiescence in the will of those who had determined to eliminate General McClellan and his army from the contest.

To the latter, after all that they had borne and done, no word of recognition or of gratitude came from the Government, and when their commander, after waiting many days, ventured to ask for them this simple act of justice, in the following touching words, no reply, whatever, was made to his request.

"Please say a kind word to my army, that I can repeat to them in general orders, in regard to their conduct at Yorktown, Williamsburg, West Point, Hanover Court House, and on the Chickahominy, as well as in regard to the (7) seven days, and the recent retreat.

"No one has ever said anything to cheer them but myself. Say nothing about me, merely give my men and officers credit for what they have done. It will do you much good, and will strengthen you much with them if you issue a handsome order to them in regard to what they have accomplished. They deserve it.

"G. B. McClellan,
"Major-General.

"Maj.-General Halleck,
"Comd'g U. S. Army, Washington, D. C."

During the whole month of July Gen. McClellan remained at Harrison's Bar, pleading for the reinforcements which were never to come; refused even the slightest light as to the future plans of the Government; and watching the po erful and vigilant enemy at Richmo with the full knowledge that they wa ed only the moment of the embarkati of his troops, should so mad a measu be adopted, to precipitate themselves force upon the "Army of Virginia," a overwhelming its boastful and incomp tent leader in the North.

Military literature has nothing m solemn, nothing which in the light of t misfortunes which, since it was writt have overtaken the country, can be garded as more wisely prophetic th the letter which, during this weary s son, General McClellan, on the 7th July, 1862, addressed to the President

All that he had affirmed in the h of victory among the mountains of W Virginia in respect to the true aims a policy of the war for the Union, Gene McClellan, in this letter, reaffirms with the weight of his subsequent, his sadd and his larger experience.

"Head-Quarters, Army of the Potoma Camp near Harrison Landing, Va., July 7. 1

"Mr. President, —

"You have been fully informed that rebel army is in our front, with the p pose of overwhelming us by attack our positions or reducing us by block our river-communications. I cannot regard our condition as critical, and earnestly desire, in view of possible c tingencies, to lay before your Excellen for your private consideration, my g eral views concerning the existing st of the rebellion, although they do strictly relate to the situation of t army, or strictly come within the sc of my official duties. These views amo to convictions, and are deeply impres upon my mind and heart. Our ca must never be abandoned; it is the ca of free institutions and self-governme The Constitution and the Union m be preserved, whatever may be the c in time, treasure, and blood. If secess is successful other dissolutions are clea to be seen in the future. Let neit military disaster, political faction, foreign war, shake your settled purp to enforce the equal operation of laws of the United States upon the p ple of every State.

"The time has come when the Gove ment must determine upon a civil a military policy covering the whole grou

of our national trouble. The responsibility of determining, declaring, and supporting such civil and military policy, and of directing the whole course of national affairs in regard to the rebellion, must now be assumed and exercised by you, or our cause will be lost. The Constitution gives you power sufficient even for the present terrible exigency.

"This rebellion has assumed the character of war; as such it should be regarded, and it should be conducted upon the highest principles known to Christian civilization. It should not be a war looking to the subjugation of the people of any State in any event. It should not be at all a war upon populations, but against armed forces and political organizations. Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organizations of states, or forcible abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a moment. In prosecuting the war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject only to the necessity of military operations. All private property taken for military use should be paid or receipted for: pillage and waste should be treated as high crimes: all unnecessary trespass sternly prohibited, and offensive demeanor by the military towards citizens promptly rebuked. Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist, and oaths not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. Military government should be confined to the preservation of public order and the protection of political rights. Military power should not be allowed to interfere with the relations of servitude, either by supporting or impairing the authority of the master, except for repressing disorder, as in other cases. Slaves contraband under the act of Congress, seeking military protection, should receive it. The right of the Government to appropriate permanently to its own service, claims to slave labor, should be asserted, and the right of the owner to compensation therefor should be recognized.

"This principle might be extended, upon grounds of military necessity and security, to all the slaves within a particular State, thus working manumission in such State; and in Missouri, perhaps in Western Virginia also, and possibly even in Maryland, the expediency of such a measure is only a question of time.

"A system of policy thus constitutional and conservative, and pervaded by the influences of Christianity and freedom, would receive the support of almost all truly loyal men, would deeply impress the rebel masses and all foreign nations, and it might be humbly hoped that it would commend itself to the favor of the Almighty.

"Unless the principles governing the future conduct of our struggle shall be made known and approved, the effort to obtain requisite forces will be almost hopeless. A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our present armies.

"The policy of the Government must be supported by concentrations of military power. The national forces should not be dispersed in expeditions, posts of occupation, and numerous armies, but should be mainly collected into masses, and brought to bear upon the armies of the Confederate States. Those armies thoroughly defeated, the political structure which they support would soon cease to exist.

"In carrying out any system of policy which you may form, you will require a commander-in-chief of the army; one who possesses your confidence, understands your views, and who is competent to execute your orders by directing the military forces of the nation to the accomplishment of the objects by you proposed. I do not ask that place for myself. I am willing to serve you in such position as you may assign me, and I will do so as faithfully as ever subordinate served superior.

"I may be on the brink of eternity, and as I hope for forgiveness from my Maker, I have written this letter with sincerity towards you, and from love for my country.

"Very respectfully, your ob't servant,

"G. B. McClellan,

"Major-General Comd'g."

The response to this letter was long in coming. But it came at last on the 3d of August, in this brief and imperative sentence from General Helleck, —

"It is determined to withdraw your army from the Peninsula to Acquia Creek."

In the morning of the next day, General McClellan thus replied to this fatal order:—

"Your telegram of last evening is received. I must confess it has caused me the greatest pain I ever experienced, for I am convinced that the order to withdraw this army to Acquia Creek will prove disastrous to our cause.

"I fear it will be a fatal blow.

"Several days are necessary to complete the preparations for so important a movement as this; and while they are in progress I beg that careful consideration may be given to my statements.

"This army is now in excellent discipline and condition. We hold a debouche on both banks of the James River, so that we are free to act in any direction, and, with the assistance of the gun-boats, I consider our communications as now secure. We are (25) twenty-five miles from Richmond, and are not likely to meet the enemy in force sufficient to fight a battle, until we have marched (15) fifteen to (18) eighteen miles, which brings us practically within (10) ten miles of Richmond. Our longest line of land transportation would be from this point (25) twenty-five miles; but with the aid of the gun-boats we can supply the army by water during its advance, certainly to within (12) twelve miles of Richmond.

"At Acquia Creek we would be (75) seventy-five miles from Richmond, with land transportation all the way.

"From here to Fort Monroe is a march of about (70) seventy miles; for I regard it as impracticable to withdraw this army and its material except by land.

"The result of the movement would thus be a march of (145) one hundred and forty-five miles to reach a point now only (25) twenty-five miles distant, and to deprive ourselves entirely of the powerful aid of the gun-boats and water transportation. Add to this the certain demoralization of this army, which would ensue, the terribly depressing effect upon the people of the North, and the strong probability that it would influence foreign powers to recognize our adversaries, and there appear to me sufficient reasons to make it my imperative duty to urge, in the strongest terms afforded by our language, that this order may be rescinded, and that, far from recalling this army it be promptly reinforced to enable it to resume the offensive.

"It may be said that there are no reinforcements available. I point to Burnside's force, to that of Pope, not necessary to maintain a strict defensive in front of Washington and Harper's Ferry, to those portions of the Army of the West not required for a strict defensive there. Here, directly in front of this army, is the heart of the rebellion; it is here that all our resources should be collected to strike the blow which will determine the fate of the nation. All points of secondary importance elsewhere should be abandoned, and every available man brought here,—a decided victory here and the military strength of the rebellion is crushed,—it matters not what partial reverses we may meet with elsewhere. Here is the true defence of Washington; it is here, on the banks of the James, that the fate of the Union should be decided.

"Clear in my conviction of right, strong in the consciousness that I have ever been, and still am, actuated solely by love of my country, knowing that no ambitious or selfish motives have influenced me from the commencement of this war, I do now, what I never did in my life before,—I entreat that this order may be rescinded.

"If my council does not prevail, I will with a sad heart, obey your orders to the utmost of my power, directing to the movement, which I clearly foresee will be one of the utmost delicacy and difficulty whatever skill I may possess.

"Whatever the result may be, and may God grant that I am mistaken in my forebodings, I shall at least have the internal satisfaction that I have written and spoken frankly, and have sought to do the best in my power to avert disaster from my country.

"G. B. McClellan,
"Major-General Commanding.

"Maj.-Gen. H. W. Halleck,
"Major-General Comd'g U. S. A."

Vain entreaty! answered only by orders more peremptory and positive than the first, for the instant removal of the whole army. No adequate means of transportation having been provided by the Government for the execution of these orders, the movement went on more slowly than they wished.

This was regarded at Washington as a misfortune. In point of fact the delay probably saved General Pope from still more crushing defeat than that hich he was soon to experience. For induced General Lee to doubt whether e removal from Harrison's Bar upon hich he was counting was after all real- to take place, and led him accordingly delay the movement of the mass of s troops from Richmond. On the 18th August General McClellan determined push forward two of his army corps, their return, as far as Yorktown by nd; and on the same day, there being longer any question as to the reality the raising of the siege of Richmond, e Confederate General Longstreet hur- d forward with his whole force to- ard the North.

General Porter, with the first of the ederal Corps which left Harrison's Bar, ving intercepted a letter at Williams- rg which led him to believe that the emy were massing themselves rapidly ainst Pope, pushed his men on without pause to Newport News, which he ached on the 18th of August, having arched his troops, with but one halt in ree days and one night, sixty miles, rough the tangled and swampy wilder- ss of the Peninsula. This was the me General Fitz John Porter who was stined to be afterwards persecuted out the army, with the honorable history which his name is indissolubly con- ected, on the charge of withholding his en from action in order to prevent eneral Pope from winning a victory!

After giving his last orders for the fence of the Peninsula, General Mc- llellan sailed for Aquia Creek, where he ported for orders, August 24th, 1862. hen he arrived there he found every- ing in the wildest confusion. To his quest for information as to the whereа- outs of the army, the General-in-Chief General Halleck) replied: "I do not now where General Pope is, or where ne enemy in force is." Two days af- rwards General McClellan, at the quest of the General-in-Chief, went to lexandria, where he was to take charge f the sending out of the troops, nobody eing able to tell him, however, where he troops were to be sent, or to whom. eneral Pope, indeed, scarcely seems o have known where he was himself. Ie had been fighting, or rather he had een fought, ever since the 10th of ugust, and it is a curious illustration f the way in which General McClellan's history has been written by his enemies, that Mr. Lincoln's biographer denounces him for not having begun to join Pope on the 10th of August, — the order moving General McClellan from the Peninsula having been issued exactly one week before that date, on the 3d of August!

The charge of delay brought against a general for failure to move ninety thousand men from the James River to Northern Virginia in the space of one week, is a brilliant novelty in the history of human accusations. The telegrams of General Halleck and the President to General McClellan, during the week which followed his arrival at Alexandria, tell a pitiful story of executive imbecility. Deprived of his command, charged with neglecting duties which he had no means of performing, and with failing to execute the most chaotic and contradictory orders, General McClellan was still called upon continually for light and counsel in the midst of the general darkness and hurley-burley.

On the 30th of August, for example, the War Department issued an order reducing General McClellan's command to his personal staff and about one hundred men. On the next day General Halleck telegraphed to him: "I beg of you to assist me in this crisis, with your ability and experience, I am entirely tired out." Without a murmur of dissatisfaction at the indecent treatment to which he had been subjected, General McClellan earnestly devoted himself to the task of bringing order and safety out of the chaos around him, — chaos so complete that it compelled him to telegraph to General Halleck, "There appears to be a total absence of brains, and I fear the total destruction of the army." On the day before this decided despatch was sent, General Pope had contrived to loose fifteen thousand men. On the 1st of September General Halleck sent for General McClellan to come to Washington and take command of its defences. He went, and suggested the propriety of sending some one in authority to find out what had really happened to General Pope. The suggestion was adopted in the afternoon of the same day. The President requested an interview with General McClellan; came to General Halleck's house to see him; assured him that he had always been his friend, and begged the displaced commander, as a personal favor, to use his influence with the Army of the Potomac to secure its coöperation with General Pope. General McClellan replied that the Army of the Potomac needed no such stimulus to its duty, but the President insisting, with tears in his eyes, General McClellan telegraphed to General Porter: —

"Major-General Porter, —

"I ask of you for my sake, and that of the country, and the old Army of the Potomac, that you and all my friends will lend the fullest and most cordial coöperation to General Pope, in all the operations now going on. The destinies of our country, the honor of our army are at stake, and all depends now upon the cheerful coöperation of all in the field. This week is the crisis of our fate. Say the same thing to my friends in the Army of the Potomac, and that the last request I have to make of them is that, for their country's sake, they will extend to General Pope the same support they ever have to me.

"I am in charge of the defences of Washington, and am doing all I can to render your retreat safe, should that become necessary.

"Geo. B. McClellan."

To this telegram General Porter replied: —

"Fairfax Court House,
10 A. M., Sept. 2, 1862.

"You may rest assured that all your friends, as well as every lover of his country, will ever give, as they have given, to General Pope their cordial coöperation and constant support in the execution of all orders and plans. Our killed, wounded, and enfeebled troops attest our devoted duty.

"F. J. Porter,
"Major-General Commanding."

The next day the President and General Halleck came to General McClellan's house with news from General Pope. They announced that everything was in the worst possible condition, the army retreating rapidly and in confusion upon Washington, and ruin impending over the country. The President implored General McClellan to take the whole matter into his own hands, assume command of the troops, and save the state.

Never, perhaps, in the history of the world, has a man of character and ability, dishonorably and unworthily de with by his official superiors, been so su denly and rapidly avenged by the cou of events as was General McClellan this moment.

A month had scarcely elapsed sin the constitution of the Army of Virgin under General Pope, had deprived h of his last hope of vindicating, by t capture of Richmond, the wisdom of plans of campaign against that city. that had been refused to him had be conceded to General Pope; and when was recalled from the Peninsula it w with the scarcely disguised intenti on the part of the Government to d miss him in disgrace from the servi So late as the 18th of August, the m tary authorities in Washington had ri culed the idea that Lee could possib venture upon an attempt to overwhe Pope, and to retaliate upon the No the invasion of Virginia.

A fortnight later the heads of t Government were kneeling to the G eral whom they had thus insulted a wronged, and praying him to relie them of a burden of command to wh their force was no longer equal.

That this was asked of him in no la and magnanimous spirit, is painfully e dent from the fact that no formal or reinstating him in the command of army was issued. He was merely pointed to the command of the "troo for the defence of the Capital."

But whatever the temper in whi the public servants of the Union set t Union's sore need before him, Gene McClellan saw that need and saw more. Making no conditions, no throwing himself on the justice a honor of the State, he accepted t dread responsibility of attempting rally a disorganized army and to be back with it an exulting and confide foe.

Getting at once into the saddle, Ge eral McClellan rode out to meet t retreating forces. He came upon Ge eral Pope in person at no great distan from the Capital, but could learn nothi from him as to the position either of t enemy or of our own men. It was n till long after nightfall that he succeed in gaining such a definite idea of the co dition of things as enabled him to beg to issue his orders. But the fact of reappearance at the head of affairs was the signal of a sudden and astonishing change in the morale of the retreating troops. The soldiers of the Potomac army received him everywhere with enthusiastic cheers, the routed horde became a formidable host again, and before midnight of the 2d of September Washington was safe against any attack from the enemy.

The ulterior plans of Lee now began to develop themselves. His movements on the 3d of September indicated his intention to cross the Upper Potomac, thus threatening Maryland and Pennsylvania.

By the 7th General McClellan had restored the framework of the army sufficiently to enable him to take the field in pursuit of the adventurous invader It is curious to see that the same authorities who had so constantly pursued General McClellan with the charge of his excessive "slowness" to move during the spring and summer of 1864, now opened upon him eagerly for moving too fast and too far.

General Halleck, unwilling to give up his pet belief that Lee would never venture into Pennsylvania, followed General McClellan on his march with telegrams, urging such movements on his part as, if he had made them, would have resulted in the complete success of Lee's campaign of invasion. On the 12th of September the President sent him the following despatch: "Receiving nothing from Harper's Ferry or Martinsburg to-day, and positive information from Wheeling that the line is cut, corroborates the idea that the army is recrossing the Potomac. Please do not let him get off without being hurt."

Three days before this despatch was sent, General Lee had issued his orders to his army for the capture of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the cutting off and seizure of Harper's Ferry, and the concentration of the main body in Maryland, at a point from which it would equally menace Baltimore and the heart of Pennsylvania. And at the very moment when the President was inditing this despatch, Stonewall Jackson was appearing in force before Harper's Ferry.

The disgraceful surrender of that place by Colonel Miles and Colonel Ford almost immediately followed, the post being given up to the Confederates at eight, A. M., on the 15th of September. General Franklin, moving by order of General McClellan to its relief, was then actually within three miles of the position of Maryland Heights, and within seven miles of Harper's Ferry, at a point in Pleasant Valley where his advance had rested the night before from the combat and victory of Crampton's Gap.

On the same day with the combat at Crampton's Gap, the battle of South Mountain was fought and won for the possession of Turner's Gap. In this battle, one of the best contested of the war, about 30,000 men were engaged on each side. Here fell General Reno, in whom says the commander, "the nation lost one of its best general officers."

The President acknowledged the tidings of this victory in the following characteristic manner: —

"War Department,
"Washington, Sept. 15, 1862 — 2.45 P. M.

"Your despatch of to-day received. God bless you, and all with you. Destroy the rebel army if possible.

"A. Lincoln.

"To Maj.-Gen. McClellan."

The "rebel army," which the victors of South Mountain were thus requested to "destroy," was the same army, it will be remembered, which had destroyed Pope's "Army of Virginia," and thrown the Capital at Washington into a paroxysm of terror. The army invited to "destroy" it was an army which had become almost a mob but a fortnight before, and which had only been brought and held together in the advance upon a victorious enemy by the moral power which the name and the character of its commanding general exerted upon the men.

Two days afterward was fought the signal battle of Antietam Creek, near Sharpsburg, by which the whole Confederate plan of campaign was broken up; Maryland and Pennsylvania were delivered from the presence and the terror of the foe; and the triumphant and aggressive enemy, driven across the Potomac, was put once more upon the defensive. Never before had two such armies contended for victory on a single field in the new world. For fourteen hours nearly two hundred thousand men and five hundred pieces of artillery had shaken the solid earth, with their thunder of battle, among the Maryland hills.

The failure of General Burnside, on the left of the Federal line, to attack the enemy at the time when he was ordered so to do, and the subsequent delay of the same general in executing one of the vital movements of the day, prevented the Federal army from achieving the complete results of its victory. But the Army of the Potomac remained masters of the field of battle. Enough had been done for glory, enough for the safety of the State; and a thrill of triumph and of gratitude ran through the whole land.

On the next day the condition of the troops, as reported by their commanders, Meade, Sumner, Burnside, Hooker, and others, was not such as to make a renewal of the action desirable during this day, the 18th; reinforcements came up, though by no means in the numbers which had been expected, and General McClellan made his preparations for a fresh attack on the positions of Lee at daylight of the 19th.

But Lee had no disposition to risk another conflict at this point. After making a show, during the day, of moving over fresh troops from Virginia, Lee, under cover of the night, withdrew his army to the south side of the Potomac.

As the rebel lines were but a short distance from the river, this evacuation was effected without difficulty before daylight, and when the Federal advance reached the river, early in the morning of the 19th, it was discovered that their rear was then escaping under cover of eight batteries, placed in strong positions upon the elevated bluffs on the Virginia shore.

At dark on the same day a detachment from Fitz John Porter's corps crossed the Potomac, took the enemy's batteries, and drove back his supports a considerable distance.

After recrossing the river, General Lee, who knew how completely the army which defeated him at Antietam had been exhausted by its previous efforts and sufferings before Washington, concentrated his forces at Martinsburg and Winchester, and maintained a strong front to the foe.

On the 19th General McClellan telegraphed, "No fears need now be entertained for the safety of Pennsylvania." It is probable that those persons in power at Washington, whose obstinacy and incapacity alone had made it possible that "fears" ever should have been entertained for the "safety of Pennsylvania" found it impossible to forgive the man who had saved themselves and the nation from the fruits of their folly. But this as it may, the only acknowledgment vouchsafed to the deliverer of the North and to his heroic army, was the following telegram from General Halleck. It bears date Sept. 20, 1862, at a moment when the heart of the whole nation outside of the official councils at Washington was throbbing with gratitude to God and with admiration of the gallant chieftain and the gallant army to which, under God, the safety of the North was due.

"WASHINGTON, Sept. 20, 1862—2 P. M.

"MAJOR-GENERAL G. B. McCLELLAN,

"We are still left entirely in the dark in regard to your own movements and those of the enemy. This should not be so. You should keep me advised of both, so far as you know them.

"H. W. HALLECK,
"General-in-Chief."

Patient as he was, General McClellan for his brave army's sake, could not tamely brook the tone of this peevish and insolent despatch at such a moment, and he replied at once in these sharp, but dignified words:

"I regret that you find it necessary to couch every despatch, I have the honor to receive from you, in a spirit of fault-finding, and that you have not yet found leisure to say one word in commendation of the recent achievements of this army, or even to allude to them.

"I have abstained from giving the number of guns, colors, small arms, prisoners, &c., captured, until I could do so with some accuracy. I hope by to-morrow evening to be able to give at least an approximate statement.

"G. B. McCLELLAN,
"Major-Gen. Comd'g."

Something of course must be pardoned to men who, being no more than mortal found themselves in the humiliating position into which the official superiors of General McClellan had now, by their real inferiority to that officer, been brought. The campaigns of Pope in Virginia, and McClellan in Maryland had demonstrated this inferiority, not merely to all other competent observers, but to these official superiors themselves. The President and General Halleck knew at, but for General McClellan and the my which he alone had been able to hold gether, the beginning of September would ve seen them fugitives from Washington prisoners in Richmond; and it would asking too much, perhaps, of feeble hu- an nature to find fault with them for a rtain degree of restlessness and discomfort his presence.

But that they should have set themselves work, as soon as the safety of the North as assured, to find or make an occasion for priving its saviour of his command, was a ime against the state, the magnitude of hich is only to be measured by all that the tion has since been thereby called to bear loss, of suffering, and of shame.

Yet all the evidence in the case compels to believe that of this crime against the ate, the authorities at Washington will entually be found guilty at the bar of im- rtial history.

On the 22d of September the President sued his proclamation of emancipation, eclaring a general war against the social stem of the seceded States, to begin on e 1st of January, 1863.

This proclamation, of course, was utterly consistent with all those principles in edience to which alone General McClellan, his letter from Harrison's Landing, had xpressed his belief that the war could be onorably and successfully conducted. But eneral McClellan felt that this circum- ance only made it more imperative upon im to impress on the minds of his army e true nature of the relations between the vil and the military authorities.

"The principles upon which, and the bject for which armies, shall be employed suppressing rebellion," said General cClellan, in a General Order to his oops, October 7th, 1862, "must be etermined and declared by the civil au- orities; and the Chief Executive, who is harged with the administration of the ational affairs, is the proper and only urce through which the needs and orders f the Government can be made known to e armies of the nation. Discussions by fficers and soldiers concerning public meas- es determined upon and declared by the overnment, when once carried beyond mperate and respectful expressions of pinion, tend greatly to impair and destroy e discipline and efficiency of troops, by ubstituting the spirit of political faction r that firm, steady, and earnest support of e authority of the Government which is the highest duty of the American soldier. The remedy for political errors, if any are committed, is to be found only in the action of the people at the polls."

"In carrying out all measures of public policy," added the General in conclusion, "this army will, of course, be guided by the same rules of mercy and Christianity that have ever controlled their conduct towards the defenceless."

General McClellan's abstinence from interference in the civil policy of the Administration was not reciprocated by a similar abstinence on the part of the Administration from interference in his own military plans.

On the 1st of October the President visited General McClellan at his head-quarters, went through the camps, and went over the battle-fields of South Mountain and Antietam. It was upon this occasion that the President shocked the army and the nation by calling upon one of his suite to entertain him with certain comic songs while riding among the fresh graves of the soldiers who had fallen in the terrible battles of September.

The condition of the army was fully explained to the President, who recognized, or seemed to recognize, the absolute impossibility of moving now upon a new campaign of invasion in the face of an organized and powerful enemy, and who expressed his renewed and grateful confidence in its commander.

The army under General McClellan was indeed utterly worn down by the efforts which it had made. The main body was composed of the troops which General Pope had exhausted in his fatal campaign at the end of August. Hastily reorganized by General McClellan in the first week of September, the army had been marched through the mountains of Maryland to fight the fierce battles of South Mountain and Antietam. It needed everything that an army can need.

But the President, returning to Washington, caused his General-in-Chief to issue, on the 6th of October, an order directing General McClellan to "cross the Potomac and give battle to the enemy or drive him South."

The President, the Secretary of War, and General Halleck knew, when this order was issued, that it would not be obeyed, for they knew that it could not be obeyed. Whether they expected by issuing it to drive General McClellan into a resignation, or were merely preparing a "record" to which they might afterwards appeal in proof of his "tardiness" and their own "energy" is, perhaps, a question. There can be no question, however, that the order itself was an outrage alike upon common sense and all military propriety. It was followed up, a week later, by another of those astonishing military letters of advice and instruction which President Lincoln seems never to have ceased writing until the success of General Grant in taking Vicksburg, a year afterwards, on a plan which his Excellency had not suggested, induced him to admit that a general in the field might sometimes understand what he was doing better than a politician in the White House.

Whether from neglect at Washington, or from an inadequate organization of the transportation service, the necessary supplies came forward to the army so slowly, in such small quantities, and in such poor condition, that the "horses," in one case, as General Meigs testifies, "remained fifty hours on the cars without food or water."

Before moving upon the enemy, General McClellan was extremely anxious so to guard the line of the Potomac as to put a stop to the possibility of those raids by the Shenandoah which have since inflicted, through three consecutive years, so much shame upon our army, and so much loss upon the people of the Pennsylvania and Maryland border. The importance of taking these precautions was increased in the mind of General McClellan by the fact that Bragg's rebel army was then at liberty to reinforce Lee, and so to enable him to do precisely what he has since done, not once nor twice, but regularly with the recurrence of the harvest season of the Shenandoah.

General McClellan urged this matter upon General Halleck at Washington. The only reply which the "General-in-chief" vouchsafed was the information that "no appropriation existed for permanent intrenchments," and a silly sneer to the effect that Bragg was four hundred miles away while Lee was but twenty.

On the 26th of October the army began to cross the Potomac, and marching on a line east of the Blue Ridge, the 7th of November its several corps were massed at and near Warrenton. "The army," says General McClellan, "was in admirable condition and spirits. I doubt whether during the whole period that I had the honor to command the Army of the Potomac it was ever in such excellent condition to fight a great battle." The Confederates under Longstreet, were directly in front at Culpepper, and the rest of Lee's army lay west of the Blue Ridge. The army and its General alike expected, with confidence and hope, the issue of a new and near impending passage-of-arms with their antagonists.

Delivered from the terror of Lee's presence in the North; reassured for the safety of Washington by the position of McClellan's army, and persuaded that victory must crown its next efforts, the Administration judged the moment come for striking down the General whom they hated, as men hate those whom they have injured.

Late on the night of November 7th, in a storm of wind and rain, General Buckingham reached the tent of General McClellan at Rectortown. He found the commander surrounded by his staff and by some of the generals of the army, and handed him a despatch of which he was the bearer.

Opening the despatch, and reading it without a change of countenance or of voice, General McClellan passed over to General Burnside a paper which it contained, saying, as he did so, "Well, Burnside, you are to command the army."

Of General Burnside, let it be said, that no man in the Army of the Potomac has ever more emphatically than himself denounced the fatal step by which he was called to take the place of a commander whose superiority he fully recognized; and whose well-earned hold upon the confidence of his whole army he knew could never be transferred to any other officer by the despatches of presidents or the order of "generals-in-chief." But of the officials who thrust upon the destined victim of Fredericksburg this fearful responsibility, and inflicted upon the hero of Antietam this unparalleled wrong, what can present condemnation say that shall not seem tame in the eyes of future contempt?

The order relieving General McClellan instructed him to repair to "Trenton in New Jersey."

A soldier to the last, he lost no time in obeying this injunction. On Monday, the 10th, he rode through the camps, and bade farewell to his tried and trusty men. Hatred itself has never ventured to question the evidence which the conduct of the army on that day bore to the merit and the charter of its commander; and the "Fare-ll at Warrenton" will one day take its ace among the noblest subjects be-eathed by American history to American t, with the "Adieux of Fontainebleau" the fasti of France.

The words of General McClellan's Fare-ll Order are weighty with manly and astered emotion. No man can read them d fail to feel that in the heart from which ey sprang lies the true secret of that faith their commander which, in the soldiers Williamsburg and Fair Oaks, of Gaines' ill and Malvern, of South Mountain and ntietam, has lived through all their sub-quent experience of war, and defies alike e wasting influence of time and the ma-nity of remorseless and unwearied de-action: —

"Officers and Soldiers of the Army of e Potomac: — An order of the President volves upon Major-General Burnside the mmand of this army. In parting from u I cannot express the love and gratitude bear you. As an army you have grown under my care. In you I have never und doubt or coldness. The battles you ve fought under my command will oudly live in our nation's history. The ory you have achieved, our mutual perils d fatigues, the graves of our comrades llen in battle and disease, the broken rms of those whom wounds and sickness ve disabled, the strange associations hich can exist among men, unite us still y an indissoluble tie.

"We shall ever be comrades in support-g the Constitution of our country, and the tionality of its people.

"GEORGE B. McCLELLAN,
"Major-Gen. U. S. Army."

Two years have passed since these brave and touching words were addressed by George Brinton McClellan to the Army of the Potomac. Reviled, calumniated, persecuted with an ever-increasing malignity during these two years; every act of his life sifted for a matter of accusation against him; every conspicuous officer of his old army who could be proved to be loyal to his merits, made the partaker of his disgrace, George Brinton McClellan has calmly waited in silence for the certain victorious vindication which time and the justice of the popular heart reserve for honor, forbearance, and fortitude in the long duel with power and calumny and corruption.

No word has he uttered, no line has he written during this long ordeal of patience, which fits not with the temper of all that he had said and written while wearing the triple stars and marshalling his great army for battle. From the dignified consistency of his civil record he speaks to-day to every American citizen as from the untarnished honor of his military career he speaks to every American soldier: "WE SHALL BE COMRADES IN SUPPORTING THE CONSTITUTION OF OUR COUNTRY AND THE NATIONALITY OF ITS PEOPLE."

With these words a deposed general, whom a faction in power sought in vain to disgrace, bade farewell to the grand army of the Union on the 7th of November, 1862. With these words a President elect, whom the nation has determined to honor, will greet the people of the Union regenerated and disenthralled, on the 7th of November, 1864!

WATCHWORDS FOR PATRIOTS.

MOTTOES FOR THE CAMPAIGN, SELECTED FROM GENERAL McCLELLAN'S WRITINGS.

The true issue for which we are fighting is the preservation of the Union and upholding the laws of the general government. — Instructions to General Burnside, January 7, 1862.

We are fighting solely for the integrity of the Union, to uphold the power of our national government, and to restore to the nation the blessings of peace and good order. — Instructions to General Halleck, November 11, 1861.

You will please constantly to bear in mind the precise issue for which we are fighting; that issue is the preservation of the Union and the restoration of the full authority of the general government over all portions of our territory. — Instructions to General Buell, November 7, 1861.

We shall most readily suppress this rebellion and restore the authority of the government by religiously respecting the constitutional rights of all. — Instructions to General Buell, November 7, 1861.

Be careful so to treat the unarmed inhabitants as to contract, not widen, the breach existing between us and the rebels. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

I have always found that it is the tendency of subordinates to make vexatious arrrests on mere suspicion. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

Say as little as possible about politics or the negro. — Instructions to General Burnside, January 7, 1862.

The unity of this nation, the preservation of our institutions, are so dear to me that I have willingly sacrificed my private happiness with the single object of doing my duty to my country. — Letter to Secretary Cameron, October, 1861.

Whatever the determination of the Government may be, I will do the best I can with the Army of the Potomac, and will share its fate, whatever may be the task imposed upon me. — Letter to Secretary Cameron, October, 1861.

Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organization of States, nor forcible abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a moment. — Letter to President Lincoln, July 7, 1862.

In prosecuting this war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject to the necessity of miltary operations. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist; and oaths, not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our present armies. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

If it is not deemed best to entrust me with the command even of my own army, I simply ask to be permitted to share their fate on the field of battle. — Despatch to General Halleck, August 30, 1862.

By pursuing the political course I have always advised, it is possible to bring about a permanent restoration of the Union — a re-union by which the rights of both sections shall be preserved, and by which both parties shall preserve their self-respect, while they respect each other. — General McClellan's Report.

I am devoutly grateful to God that my last campaign was crowned with a victory which saved the nation from the greatest peril it had then undergone. — General McClellan's Report.

At such a time as this, and in such a struggle, political partisanship should be merged in a true and brave patriotism, which thinks only of the good of the whole country. — General McClellan's West Point Oration.

WEST POINT ORATION,

BY

GEN. GEORGE B. McCLELLAN.

All nations have days sacred to the remembrance of joy and of grief. They have thanksgivings for success, fasting and prayers the hour of humiliation and defeat, triumphs and pæans to greet the living laurel-crowned victor. They have obsequies and eulogies for the warrior slain on the field of battle. Such is the duty we are to perform to-day. The poetry, the histories, the orations of antiquity, all resound with the clang of arms; they dwell rather upon rough deeds of war, than the gentle arts of peace. They have preserved to us the names of heroes, and the memory of their deeds, even to this distant day. Our own Old Testament teems with the narrations of the brave actions and heroic deaths of Jewish patriots, while the New Testament of our meek and suffering Saviour, often selects the soldier and his weapons to typify and illustrate religious heroism and duty. These stories of the actions of the dead have consequently survived, in the lapse of ages, the names of those whose fall was thus commemorated centuries ago. But, although we know not now the names of all the brave men who fought and fell upon the plain of Marathon, in the pass of Thermopylæ, and on the hills of Palestine, we have not lost the memory of their examples. As long as the warm blood courses the veins of man, as long as the human heart beats high and quick at the recital of brave deeds and patriotic sacrifices, so long will the lesson still incite generous men to emulate the heroism of the past.

Among the Greeks, it was the custom that the fathers of the most valiant of the slain should pronounce the eulogies of the dead. Sometimes it devolved upon their great statesmen and orators to perform this mournful duty. Would that a new Demosthenes, or a second Pericles, could arise and take my place to-day, for he would find a theme worthy of his most brilliant powers, of his most touching eloquence. I stand here now, not as an orator, but as the whilom commander, and in the place of the fathers of the most valiant dead. As their comrade, too, on many a hard-fought field against domestic and foreign foe, — in early youth and mature manhood, — moved by all the love that David felt when he poured forth his lamentation for the mighty father and son who fell on Mount Gilboa. God knows that David's love for Jonathan was no more deep than mine for the tried friends of many long and eventful years, whose names are to be recorded upon the structure that is to rise upon this spot. Would that his more than mortal eloquence could grace my lips and do justice to the theme!

We have met to-day, my comrades, to do honor to our own dead; brothers united to us by the closest and dearest ties, who have freely given their lives for their country in this war — so just and righteous, so long as its purpose is to crush rebellion, and to save our nation from the infinite evils of dismemberment. Such an occasion as this should call forth the deepest and noblest emotions of our nature — pride, sorrow, and prayer; pride that our country has possessed such sons; sorrow that she has lost them; prayer that she may have others like them; that we and our successors may adorn her annals as they have done, and that when our parting hour arrives, whenever and however it may be, our souls may be prepared for the great change.

We have assembled to consecrate a cenotaph, which shall remind our children's children, in the distant future, of their fathers' struggles in the days of the great rebellion. This monument is to perpetuate the memory of a portion only of those who have fallen for the nation in this unhappy war — it is dedicated to the officers and soldiers of the regular army. Yet this is done in no class or exclusive spirit, and in the act we remember with reverence and love our comrades of the volunteers, who have so gloriously fought and fallen by our sides. Each State will, no doubt, commemorate in some fitting way the services of its sons, who abandoned the avocations of peace and shed their blood in the ranks of the volunteers. How richly they have earned a nation's love, a nation's gratitude, with what heroism they have confronted death, have wrested victory from a stubborn foe, and have illustrated defeat, it well becomes me to say, for it has been my lot to command them on many a sanguinary field. I know that I but echo the feeling of the regulars, when I award the high credit they deserve to their brave brethren of the volunteers.

But we of the regular army have no States to look to for the honors due our dead. We belong to the whole country, and can neither expect nor desire the general government to to make, a perhaps invidious distinction in our favor. We are few in number, a small band of comrades, united by peculiar and very binding ties; for with many of us our friendships were commenced in boyhood, when we rested here in the shadow of the granite hills which look down upon us where we stand; with others the ties of brotherhood were formed in more mature years, while fighting among the rugged mountains and fertile valleys of Mexico — within hearing of the eternal waves of the Pacific, or in the lonely grandeur of the great plains of the far West. With all, our love and confidence have been cemented by common dangers and sufferings, on the toilsome march, in the dreary bivouac, and amid the clash of arms, and in the presence of death on scores of battle-fields. West Point, with her large heart, adopts us all — graduates and those appointed from civil life, officers and privates. In her eyes we are all her children, jealous of her fame, and eager sustain her world-wide reputation. Gener and private soldiers, men who have cheerfu offered our all for our dear country, stand here before this shrine, ever hereaf sacred to our dead, equals and brothers the face of the common death which aws us all, perhaps on the same field and at same hour. Such are the ties which un us, the most endearing which exist amo men; such the relations which bind together, the closest of the sacred broth hood of arms.

It has therefore seemed, and it is fittin that we should erect upon this spot, so sacr to us all, an enduring monument to our d brothers who have preceded us on the p of peril and of honor, which it is the desti of many of us to tread.

What is this regular army to which belong?

Who are the men whose death merits su honors from the living?

What is the cause for which they ha laid down their lives?

Our regular or permanent army is nucleus which, in time of peace, preser the military traditions of the nation, as w as the organization, science, and instruct indispensable to modern armies. It m be regarded as coeval with the nation. derives its origin from the old continen and State lines of the Revolution, when with some interruptions and many chang it has attained its present condition. fact, we may with propriety go even yond the Revolution to seek the roots our genealogical tree in the old Fren wars, for the Cis-Atlantic campaigns of t seven years' war were not confined to "red men scalping each other by the gr lakes of North America," and it was them that our ancestors first participat as Americans in the large operations civilized armies. American regiments th fought on the banks of the St. Lawren and the Ohio, on the shores of Ontario a Lake George, on the islands of the Car bean and in South America. Louisbu Quebec, Duquesne, the Moro, and Po Bello attest the valor of the provinc troops, and in that school were educat such soldiers as Washington, Putnam, L Montgomery, and Gates. These and m like Green, Knox, Wayne, and Steub were the fathers of our permanent arm and under them our troops acquired th discipline and steadiness which enabled th to meet upon equal terms, and often feat, the tried veterans of England. The udy of the history of the Revolution, and perusal of the despatches of Washing-n, will convince the most skeptical of the lue of the permanent army in achieving r independence and establishing the civil ifice which we are now fighting to pre-ve.

The war of 1812 found the army on a ting far from adequate to the emergency, t it was rapidly increased, and of the w generation of soldiers many proved ual to the requirements of the occasion. ndy's Lane, Chippewa, Queenstown, ttsburgh, New Orleans — all bear witness the gallantry of the regulars.

Then came an interval of more than thirty rs of external peace, marked by many nges in the organization and strength of the ular army, and broken at times by tedious l bloody Indian wars. Of these the most narkable were the Black Hawk war, in ich our troops met unflinchingly a foe as re-tless, and far more destructive than the lians — that terrible scourge, the cholera; l the tedious Florida war, where for so ny years the Seminoles eluded in their pes-ntial swamps our utmost efforts, and in ich were displayed such traits of heroism as t commemorated by yonder monument to de and his command, "when all fell, save ee, without an attempt to retreat." At t came the Mexican war, to replace Indian mbats and the monotony of the frontier ser-e, and for the first time in many years the ss of the regular army was concentrated, l took the principal part in the battles of t remarkable and romantic war. Palo to, Resaca, and Fort Brown, were the ievements of the regulars unaided, and as the battles of Monterey, Buena Vista, Vera uz, Cerro Gorda, and the final triumphs in valley, none can truly say that they could e been won without the regulars. When ce crowned our victories in the capital of Montezumas, the army was at once dis-sed over the long frontier, and engaged in rassing and dangerous wars with the In-ns of the plains. Thus thirteen long years re spent, until the present war broke out, l the mass of the army was drawn in, to be ployed against a domestic foe.

I cannot proceed to the events of the recent st and the present without adverting to the llant men who were so long of our number, t who have now gone to their last home, no small portion of the glory of which we ast was reflected from such men as Taylor, orth, Brady, Brooks, Totten, and Duncan.

There is a sad story of Venetian history that has moved many a heart, and often employed the poet's pen and the painter's pencil. It is of an old man whose long life was gloriously spent in the service of the state as a warrior and a statesman, and who, when his hair was white and his feeble limbs could scarce carry his bent form toward the grave, attained the highest honors that a Venetian citizen could reach. He was Doge of Venice. Convicted of treason against the state, he not only lost his life, but suffered beside a penalty which will endure as long as the name of Venice is remembered. The spot where his portrait should have hung in the great hall of the doge's palace was veiled with black, and there still remains the frame, with its black mass of canvas — and this vacant frame is the most conspicuous of the long line of effigies of illustrious doges!

Oh! that such a pall as that which replaces the portrait of Marino Faliero could conceal from history the names of those, once our comrades, who are now in arms against the flag under which we fought side by side in years gone by. But no veil can cover the anguish that fills our hearts when we look back upon the sad memory of the past, and recall the affection and respect we entertained toward men against whom it is now our duty to act in mortal combat. Would that the courage, ability, and steadfastness they display had been employed in the defence of the "Stars and Stripes," against a foreign foe, rather than in this gratuitous and unjustifiable rebellion, which could not have been so long maintained but for the energy of these, our former comrades.

But we have reason to rejoice that upon this day, so sacred and so eventful for us, one grand old mortal monument of the past still lifts high his head among us, and graces by his presence the consecration of this tomb of his children. We may well be proud that we have been commanded by the hero who purchased victory with his blood near the great waters of Niagara, who repeated and eclipsed the achievements of Cortez; who, although a consummate and confident commander, ever preferred, when duty and honor would permit, the olive branch of peace to the blood-stained laurels of war, and who stands, at the close of a long, glorious, and eventful life, a living column of granite against which have beaten in vain alike the blandishments and the storms of treason. His name will ever be one of our proudest boasts and most moving inspirations. In long-distant ages, when this incipient monument has become venerable, moss-clad, and perhaps ruinous, when the names inscribed upon it shall seem to those who pause to read them, indistinct mementoes of an almost mythical past, the name of Winfield Scott will still be clear cut upon the memory of all, like the still fresh carving upon the monuments of long-forgotten Pharaohs.

But it is time to approach the present.

In the war which now shakes the land to its foundation, the regular army has borne a most honorable part. Too few in numbers to act by themselves, regular regiments have participated in every great battle in the east, and in most of those west of the Alleghanies. Their terrible losses and diminished numbers prove that they have been in the thickest of the fight, and the testimony of their comrades and commanders show with what undaunted heroism they have upheld their ancient renown. Their vigorous charges have often won the day, and in defeat they have more than once saved the army from destruction or terrible losses by the obstinacy with which they resisted overpowering numbers. They can refer with pride to the part they played upon the glorious fields of Mexico, and exult at the recollection of what they did at Manassas, Gaines's Mill, Malvern Hill, Antietam, Shiloh, Stone River, Gettysburgh, and the great battles just fought from the Rapidan to the Chickahominy. They can also point to the officers who have risen among them and achieved great deeds for their country in this war; — to the living warriors whose names are on the nation's tongue and heart, too numerous to be repeated here, yet not one of whom I would willingly omit.

But perhaps the proudest episode in the history of the regular army is that touching instance of fidelity on the part of the non-commissioned officers and privates, who, treacherously made prisoners in Texas, resisted every temptation to violate their oath and desert their flag. Offered commissions in the rebel service, money and land freely tendered them, they all scorned the inducements held out to them, submitted to every hardship, and when at last exchanged, avenged themselves on the field of battle for the unavailing insult offered their integrity. History affords no brighter example of honor than that of these brave men, tempted, as I blush to say they were, by some of their former officers, who, having themselves proved false to their flag, endeavored to seduce the men who had often followed them in combat, and who had naturally regarded them with respect and love.

Such is the regular army; such its history and antecedents; such its officers and men. It needs no herald to trumpet forth its praise it can proudly appeal to the numerous fiel from the tropics to the frozen banks of the S Lawrence, from the Atlantic to the Pacif fertilized by the blood and whitened by t bones of its members. But I will not pau to eulogize it. Let its deeds speak for i they are more eloquent than tongue of min

Why are we here to-day?

This is not the funeral of one brave warrio nor even of the harvest of death on a sing battle-field, but these are the obsequies of t best and bravest of the children of the lan who have fallen in actions almost numberles many of them among the most sanguinary a desperate of which history bears record. T men, whose names and deeds we now seek perpetuate, rendering them the highest hon in our power, have fallen wherever armed r bellion showed its front — in far distant Ne Mexico, in the broad valley of the Mississip on the bloody hunting-grounds of Kentuck in the mountains of Tennessee, amid t swamps of Carolina, on the fertile fields Maryland, and in the blood-stained thickets Virginia. They were of all grades — fro the general officer to the private; of all ag — from the gray-haired veteran of fifty yea service to the beardless youth; of all degre of cultivation — from the man of science the uneducated boy. It is not necessary, n is it possible, to repeat the mournful yet illu trious roll of dead heroes whom we have m to honor. Nor shall I attempt to name all those who most merit praise — simply a fe who will exemplify the classes to which th belong.

Among the last slain, but among the fir in honor and reputation, was that hero twenty battles — John Sedgwick — gentle a kind as a woman, brave as a brave man c be, honest, sincere, and able — he was a mod that all may strive to imitate, but whom fe can equal. In the terrible battles which ju preceded his death, he had occasion to displa the highest qualities of a commander and soldier; yet after escaping the stroke of deat when men fell around him by thousands, he last met his fate at a moment of comparativ quiet, by the ball of a single rifleman. H died as a soldier would choose to die — wit truth in his heart, and a sweet, tranquil smil upon his face. Alas! our great nation po sesses few sons like true John Sedgwick.

Like him fell, too, at the very head c their corps, the white-haired Mansfield, aft a long career of usefulness, illustrated by h skill and cool courage at Fort Brown, Mo terey, and Buena Vista — John F. Reynold

d Reno, both in the full vigor of manhood d intellect — men who had proved their ility and chivalry on many a field in Mex-, and in this civil war, gallant gentlemen whom their country had much to hope, had pleased God to spare their lives. Lyon ll in the prime of life, leading his little army ainst superior numbers, his brief career fording a brilliant example of patriotism d ability. The impetuous Kearney, and ch brave generals as Richardson, Williams, rrill, Stevens, Weed, Strong, Saunders, d Hayes, lost their lifes while in the midst a career of usefulness. Young Bayard, like the most renowned of his name, that knight above fear and above reproach," as cut off too early for his country, and that cellent staff-officer, Colonel Garesché fell nile gallantly doing his duty.

No regiments can spare such gallant, de-ted, and able commanders as Rossell, avis, Gove, Simmons, Bailey, Putnam, and ingsbury, — all of whom fell in the thickest the combat, — some of them veterans, and hers young in service, all good men and ell-beloved.

Our batteries have partially paid their rrible debt to fate in the loss of such com-anders as Greble, the first to fall in this ar, Benson, Hazzard, Smead, De Hart, azlitt, and those gallant boys, Kirby, oodruff, Dimmick, and Cushing; while e engineers lament the promising and gal-nt Wagner and Cross.

Beneath remote battle-fields rest the corpses the heroic McRea, Reed, Bascom, Stone, weet, and many other company officers.

Besides these were hosts of veteran ser-eants, corporals, and privates, who had ught under Scott in Mexico, or contended many combats with the savages of the far Vest and Florida, and, mingled with them, oung soldiers who, courageous, steady, and ue, met death unflinchingly, without the pe of personal glory. These men, in their ore humble sphere, served their country ith as much faith and honor as the most il-strious generals, and all of them with per-ct singleness of heart. Although their mes may not live in history, their actions, yalty, and courage, will. Their memories ill long be preserved in their regiments, r there were many of them who merited as roud a distinction as that accorded to the first grenadier of France," or to that other ussian soldier who gave his life for his omrades.

But there is another class of men who have one from us since this war commenced, whose fate it was not to die in battle, but who are none the less entitled to be mentioned here. There was Sumner, a brave, honest, chivalrous, veteran, of more than half a century's service, who had confronted death unflinchingly on scores of battle-fields, had shown his gray head serene and cheerful, where death most revelled, who more than once told me that he believed and hoped that his long career would end amid the din of battle — he died at home from the effects of the hardships of his campaigns.

That most excellent soldier, the elegant C. F. Smith, whom many of us remember to have seen so often on this plain, with his superb bearing, escaped the bullet to fall a victim to the disease which have deprived the army of so many of its best soldiers.

John Bufford, cool and intrepid; Mitchell, eminent in science; Plummer, Palmer, and many other officers and men, lost their lives by sickness contracted in the field.

But I cannot close this long list of glorious martyrs without paying a sacred debt of official duty and personal friendship. There was one dead soldier who possessed peculiar claims upon my love and gratitude. He was an ardent patriot, an unselfish man, a true soldier, the beau ideal of a staff officer — he was my aid-de-camp, Colonel Colburn.

There is a lesson to be drawn from the death and services of these glorious men which we should read for the present and future benefit of the nation. War in these modern days is a science, and it should now be clear to the most prejudiced that for the organization and command of armies, and the high combinations of strategy, perfect familiarity with the theoretical science of war is requisite. To count upon success when the plans or execution of campaigns are intrusted to men who have no knowledge of war, is as idle as to expect the legal wisdom of a Story or a Kent from a skilful physician.

But what is the honorable and holy cause for which these men laid down their lives, and for which the nation still demands the sacrifice of the precious blood of so many of her children?

Soon after the close of the Revolutionary war, it was found that the confederacy, which had grown up during that memorable contest, was fast falling to pieces from its own weight. The central power was too weak; it could only recommend to the different States such measures as seemed best; and it possessed no real power to legislate, because it lacked the executive force to compel obedience to its laws. The national credit and self-respect had disappeared, and it was feared by the friends of human liberty throughout the world that ours was but another, added to the long list of fruitless attempts at self-government. The nation was evidently upon the brink of ruin and dissolution, when, some eighty years ago, many of the wisest and most patriotic of the land met to seek a remedy for the great evils which threatened to destroy the work of the Revolution. Their sessions were long, and often stormy; for a time the most sanguine doubted the possibility of a successful termination to their labors. But from amidst the conflict of sectional interests, of party prejudices, and of personal selfishness, the spirit of wisdom and conciliation at length evoked the Constitution, under which we have lived so long.

It was not formed in a day, but was the result of patient labor, of lofty wisdom, and of the purest patriotism. It was at last adopted by the people of all the States, — although by some reluctantly, — not as being exactly what all desired, but as being the best possible under the circumstances. It was accepted as giving us a form of government under which the nation might live happily and prosper, so long as the people should continue to be influenced by the same sentiments which actuated those who formed it, and which would not be liable to destruction from internal causes, so long as the people preserved the recollection of the miseries and calamities which led to its adoption.

Under this beneficent Constitution the progress of the nation was unexampled in history. The rights and liberties of its citizens were secure at home and abroad; vast territories were rescued from the control of the savage and the wild beast, and added to the domain of civilization and the Union. The arts, the sciences, and commerce, grew apace; our flag floated upon every sea, and we took our place among the great nations of the earth.

But under the smooth surface of prosperity upon which we glided swiftly, with all sails set before the summer breeze, dangerous reefs were hidden which now and then caused ripples upon the surface, and made anxious the more cautious pilots. Elated by success, the ship swept on, the crew not heeding the warnings they received, forgetful of the dangers they escaped in the beginning of the voyage, and blind to the hideous maelstrom which gaped to receive and destroy them. The same elements of discordant sectional prejudices, interests, and institutions, which had rendered the formation of the Constitution so difficult, threatened more than once to destroy it. But for a long time the nation was so fortunate as to possess a series of political leaders who, to the highest abilities united the same spirit of conciliation which animated the founders of the Republic, and thus for many years the threatened evils were averted. Time and long-continued good fortune obliterated the recollection of the calamities and wretchedness of the years preceding the adoption of the Constitution. Men forgot that conciliation, common interest, and mutual charity had been the foundation and must be the support of our government — as is indeed the case with all governments and all the relations of life. At length men appeared with whom sectional and personal prejudices and interests outweighed all considerations for the general good. Extremists of one section furnished the occasion, eagerly seized as a pretext by equally extreme men in the other, for abandoning the pacific remedies and protection afforded by the Constitution, and seeking redress for possible future evils in war and the destruction of the Union.

Stripped of all sophistry and side issues, the direct cause of the war, as it presented itself to the honest and patriotic citizen of the North, was simply this: Certain States, or rather, a portion of the inhabitants of certain States, feared or professed to fear that injury would result to their rights and property from the elevation of a particular party to power. Although the Constitution and the actual condition of the government provided them with a peaceable and sure protection against the apprehended evil, they preferred to seek security in the destruction of the government, which could protect them, and in the use of force against the national troops holding a national fortress.

To efface the insult offered our flag, to save ourselves from the fate of the divided republics of Italy and South America; to preserve our government from destruction, to enforce its just power and laws; to maintain our very existence as a nation — these were the causes that impelled us to draw the sword.

Rebellion against a government like ours, which contains within itself the means of self-adjustment, and a pacific remedy for evils, should never be confounded with a revolution against despotic power, which refuses redress of wrongs. Such a rebellion cannot be justified upon ethical grounds, and the only alternative for our choice are its suppression, or the destruction of our nationality. A ch a time as this, and in such a struggle, litical partisanship should be merged in true and brave patriotism, which thinks ly of the good of the whole country.

It was in this cause and with these tives, that so many of our comrades gave ir lives, and to this we are all personally dged in all honor and fidelity. Shall ch devotion as that of our dead com- les, be of no avail? Shall it be said, in er ages, that we lacked the vigor to com- ete the work thus begun? that, after all se noble lives freely given, we hesitated, d failed to keep straight on until our land s saved? Forbid it, Heaven, and give firmer, truer hearts than that!

Oh, spirits of the valiant dead, souls of r slain heroes, lend us your own indom- ble will, and if it be permitted you to mmune with those still chained by the mmels of mortality, hover around us in e midst of danger and tribulation, cheer e firm, strengthen the weak, that none ay doubt the salvation of the republic, and e triumph of our grand old flag!

In the midst of the storms which toss our ip of state, there is one great beacon ght, to which we can ever turn with con- dence and hope. It cannot be that this eat nation has played its part in history; cannot be that our sun, which arose with ch bright promises for the future, has ready set forever. It must be the inten- on of the overruling Deity that this land, so long the asylum of the oppressed, the refuge of civil and religious liberty, shall again stand forth in bright relief, united, purified, and chastened by our trials, as an example and encouragement for those who desire the progress of the human race. It is not given to our weak intellects to understand the steps of Providence as they occur; we comprehend them only as we look down upon them in the far distant past.

So is it now.

We cannot unravel the seemingly tangled skein of the purposes of the Creator — they are too high and far-reaching for our limited minds. But all history and His own revealed Word teach us that His ways, although inscrutable, are ever righteous. Let us then honestly and manfully act our part, seek to understand and perform our whole duty, and trust unwaveringly in the beneficence of the God who led our ancestors across the sea, and sustained them afterward, amid dangers more appalling even than those encountered by His own chosen people in their great exodus. He did not bring us here in vain, nor has he supported us thus far for naught. If we do our duty and trust in Him, He will not desert us in our need.

Firm in our faith that God will save our country, we now dedicate this site to the memory of brave men, to loyalty, patriotism, and honor.

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S LETTER OF ACCEPTANCE.

ORANGE, NEW JERSEY,
September 8, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter informing me of my nomination by the Democratic National Convention, recently assembled at Chicago, as their candidate for the next election for President of the United States.

It is unnecessary for me to say to you that this nomination comes to me unsought. I am happy to know that when the nomination was made the record of my public life was kept in view.

The effect of long and varied service in the army during war and peace, has been to strengthen and make indelible in my mind and heart the love and reverence for the Union, Constitution, laws, and flag of our country, impressed upon me in early youth.

These feelings have thus far guided the course of my life, and must continue to do so to its end.

The existence of more than one government over the region which once owned our flag is incompatible with the peace, the power, and the happiness of the people.

The preservation of our Union was the sole avowed object for which the war was commenced. It should have been conducted for that object only, and in accordance with those principles which I took occasion to declare when in active service.

Thus conducted, the work of reconciliation would have been easy, and we might have reaped the benefits of our many victories on land and sea.

The Union was originally formed by the exercise of a spirit of conciliation and compromise. To restore and preserve it, the same spirit must prevail in our councils, and in the hearts of the people.

The reëstablishment of the Union in all its integrity is, and must continue to be, the indispensable condition in any settlement. So soon as it is clear, or even probable, that our present adversaries are ready for peace, upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilized nations, and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interests of the country, to secure such peace, reëstablish the Union, and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace — we ask no more.

Let me add what, I doubt not was, although unexpressed, the sentiment of the Convention, as it is of the people they represent, that when any one State is willing to return to the Union, it should be received at once, with a full guarantee of all its constitutional rights.

If a frank, earnest, and persistent effort to obtain those objects should fail, the responsibility for ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards.

I could not look in the face of my gallant comrades of the army and navy, who have survived so many bloody battles, and tell them that their labors and the sacrifice of so many of our slain and wounded brethren had been in vain; that we had abandoned that Union for which we have so often periled our lives.

A vast majority of our people, whether in the army and navy or at home, would, as I would, hail with unbounded joy the permanent restoration of peace, on the basis of the Union under the Constitution, without the effusion of another drop of blo But no peace can be permanent with Union.

As to the other subjects presented the resolutions of the Convention, I ne only say that I should seek, in the Cons tution of the United States and the la framed in accordance therewith, the r of my duty, and the limitations of exe tive power; endeavor to restore econo in public expenditure, reëstablish the s premacy of law, and, by the operation of more vigorous nationality, resume our co manding position among the nations of t earth.

The condition of our finances, the d preciation of the paper money, and t burdens thereby imposed on labor and ca ital, show the necessity of a return to sound financial system; while the righ of citizens, and the rights of States, a the binding authority of law over Pre dent, army, and people, are subjects of n less vital importance in war than in peac

Believing that the views here expres are those of the Convention and the peop you represent, I accept the nomination.

I realize the weight of the responsibili to be borne should the people ratify yo choice.

Conscious of my own weakness, I ca only seek fervently the guidance of t Ruler of the universe, and, relying o His all-powerful aid, do my best to r store union and peace to a suffering peopl and to establish and guard their liberti and rights,

I am, gentlemen,
very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

and others, Committee.

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S

PENINSULA CAMPAIGN.

REVIEW OF THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE CONDUCT OF THE WAR RELATIVE TO THE PENINSULA CAMPAIGN,

BY

HIRAM KETCHUM,

OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK,

COUNSELLOR AT LAW.

1864.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The following numbers were published in the Journal of Commerce through several successive months, ending in May, 1864, under the signature of the Author. They were designed to show that the Report of the Committee on the Conduct of the War had done great injustice to MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE B. McCLELLAN. By request these numbers are now collected and published in pamphlet form, and the Author asks for them an attentive perusal, and a candid and impartial judgment.

HIRAM KETCHUM.

May 16, 1864.

REVIEW OF McCLELLAN'S CAMPAIGN.

The Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives on the conduct of the war have made an elaborate report, a part of which is calculated, probably intended, to impair public confidence in the military capacity of General McClellan. A report from a committee derived from so high a source as the Legislative Department of the government will, as it ought, command public attention, and influence to some extent the mind of the country. The publication of that report preceded, by some days, and even weeks, the publication of the evidence upon which it professes to be founded. The report has been published in many newspapers, and is industriously circulated in a pamphlet form. The opponents of General McClellan ought to be satisfied with the influence to his discredit which this document was diffusing, especially as he has not interposed one word to counteract that influence, and check its progress. The general has observed his characteristic silence; yet his persecutors are not content with the amount of influence already enlisted against him, but are constant and persevering in their efforts to destroy him. The New York Times, published yesterday, Friday, has a long and bitter article, in which, strangely enough, it resorts to rebel testimony taken from the Richmond Whig, to depreciate the military character of Gen. McClellan. Would the Times be willing to admit testimony in favor of his high military character from the same source? Such testimony the Times well knows is at hand, but I will not use it.

Now I have read the testimony annexed to the report of the War Committee with some care, and in my opinion that testimony, in connection with well known facts of public notoriety, does not authorize the conclusions, unfavorable to Gen. McClellan, made public by the committee in their report. It is evident to my mind that there is a concerted, a party effort, aided by the government, to pervert the truth, and by such perversion to destroy General McClellan. This effort shall not succeed if my opposition, in concert with other, can defeat it. When I see a combination of the strong against the weak, an exercise of the vast power and influence of the government against an individual citizen who is innocent of any offence against that government, my sympathies in every such case are with the weaker party, and in the present case, whatever of power and influence I can exert, by the open use of my own name, and such reputation and character as I happen to possess in a city where I have lived for more than fifty years, shall be put forth without fear and without stint to accomplish a fair administration of justice in the case under consideration.

I intend, with permission, through the columns of the Journal of Commerce, to submit, with as much brevity as is consistent with clear elucidation, a fair and impartial examination of the material points connected with the operations of General Mc Clellan, brought out by the evidence before the War Committee. There are very few persons that have that evidence at command, for it is very voluminous. The newspapers could not be expected to publish the whole of it, but in making selections they might manage to be impartial. Especially those who condemn McClellan ought to publish his testimony, but this they refuse to do.

NO. II.

My first proposition, which I mean to prove to the entire satisfaction of every reasonable man, is this:

If General McClellan's plan had not been interfered with; his plan settled and concurred in by the government before he left Washington for the peninsula, he would have captured Richmond certainly as early as the month of June 1862.

The evidence in support of this proposition, to which I invite the candid and careful attention of the reader, shall now be given.

The testimony of Prince de Joinville, under his own name, was not drawn forth by the committee, but it was given to Europe and the world, and must have been known to the committee. This was the testimony of a highly intelligent witness, who communicated the truth of what he knew himself, and none can question his truthfulness and impartiality. In quoting from the Prince's statement, I shall have to reproduce what has lately appeared in the editorial columns of the Journal of Commerce. When Gen. McClellan went to Yorktown, he had no thought of besieging that position. The siege of that place was rendered necessary by causes entirely unforeseen, and unexpected by the general. He had made ample provision for the turning of that position. Prince de Jonville says (page 41): "The enemy held the James with the Merrimac and his gunboats; the York was closed by the Yorktown and Gloucester Point batteries. Nevertheless, by a disembarkation on the Severn, beyond Gloucester, he might carry the latter position, and open the way of the Federal gunboats into the York River. A subsequent movement up the left bank, in the direction of West Point, would put us so far in the rear of the army charged with the defence of the lines of Yorktown that it would have been in a most perilous position. This accomplished, the Confederates must have abandoned Gloucester, and fallen back hastily upon Richmond. The execution of this coup de main had been left to a corps of the army commanded by Gen. McDowell. This corps was to be the last to embark at Washington, and it was calculated that it ought to reach Yorktown in a body on its transports at the moment when the rest of the army, moving by land, should appear before that post from Fortress Monroe." The Prince proceeds: "Instead of finding it, we received the inexplicable and as yet unexplained intelligence that this corps, 35,000 strong, had been sent to another destination. The news was received in the army with stupefaction, although the majority could not foresee the deplorable consequences of a step taken, it must be supposed, with no evil intention, but certainly with inconceivable recklessness. . . . . This step, taken when it was, deranged a whole system of machinery fairly at work."

Here then, when the army was before Yorktown, and before the idea of a siege had entered any man's head, was a sore disappointment. One of the foundations upon which the hope, nay, almost certainty, of speedy success had been reared, was suddenly, unexpectedly removed by a power which the leader of the army could not control. Let us pause here for a single moment to consider what the present position and fame of this commander would be at this moment if his just expectations had not been cruelly disappointed; but what is of infinitely more consequence, what, at this time, would have been the position of our country but for this fatal step! But disappointments do not stop here. After the siege of Yorktown, and after the army had reached the front of Richmond, another opportunity was supplied by the vigilance and skill of the commanding general to retrieve the great error of the past and to capture Richmond. By the command of Gen. McClellan, Gen. Fitz John Porter, with a portion of our army, marched in a furious storm to Hanover Court House, twenty miles north of Richmond, routed the enemy, some 8,000 or 10,000 strong, killed 200, took 700 prisoners, and captured one piece of artillery. The victory was gained on the 26th day of May. The advance guard of McDowell, says Prince de Joinville, "was then at Bowling Green, fifteen miles from that of Porter. It needed only an effort of the will; the two armies were united, and the possession of Richmond certain! Alas! this effort was not made. I cannot," says he, "recall these fatal moments without a real sinking of heart."

What loyal man in the country does not at this day join in the lament of the illustrious stranger? Here then another opportunity was lost to secure the great object of the peninsular campaign. It has long since been admitted that if this opportunity had been improved, Richmond must have been taken, and in that case McClellan would have been the idol of his country, for the rebellion against that country would have been crushed. Was it any fault of this general that the opportunity was not improved? Certainly not. Yet what man in the country has suffered so severely for the failure to seize an opportunity for certain success, which his sagacity as a military leader had created? Yet his sufferings bear no comparison to those of his beloved country, and I doubt not he grieves far less for himself, for the loss of immortal renown, than for that country. The Prince de Joinville adds:

"Not only did the two armies unite, but the order came from Washington, to burn the bridges which had been seized. This was the clearest way of saying to the army of the Potomac, and to its chiefs, that in no case could they count on the support of the armies of Upper Virginia." This statement of De Joinville is substantially confirmed by evidence given before the joint committee. General Franklin testifies at page 625 that the primary cause of the failure of the peninsula campaign was "the detachment of McDowell's corps from the army of the Potomac, at the particular time it was detached. I think the detachment of that corps left General McClellan on the peninsula with all his plans disarranged." Franklin was not questioned further on this point, but the committee immediately changed the course of inquiry. The question which called forth the above answer was put by Mr. Odell, and seemed quite accidental. General HENRY J. HUNT, chief in command of the Artillery of the Potomac, was a witness before the committee. He yet remains in the army of the Potomac, and is, I am informed, much relied upon, not only as an officer of great skill in his line of duty, but confided in as an intelligent, truthful man, receiving the respect of his brother officers.

Gen. Hunt fully concurs in the statement above quoted from De Joinville. The general says, (page 571):

"As I understood it, McDowell's corps, which was the last to embark, was to move across to West Point, or near to that place, a portion of it touching at Gloucester, so as to throw itself between the enemy's works at Yorktown and Richmond. Of course the withholding of that corps prevented the plan, if that was the plan, from being executed as intended." He further says: "The next cause for the failure of that campaign was this: I think if a junction of all our forces had been made after the battle of Hanover Court House, we should have made a sure thing of it."

Thus then it is made manifest by the testimony and statements above referred to, that if General McClellan's plans had been executed, Richmond would have fallen. I can find nothing in Part I. of the committee's Report, containing 754 pages of printed matter, to countervail this testimony. Now I confidently submit to every candid reader, was not General Mc Clellan entitled to the benefit of this fact in the report of the committee.? It might have been impracticable for the government to furnish the means promised, but even that should not have deprived him of the credit of having conceived and adopted those plans. It might be, that though his original plans were interfered with, and frustrated by those in authority over him, yet still the plans were creditable, as their execution was certain to lead to success.

In my future numbers I shall investigate, first, whether there were good and satifactory reasons for not allowing General McDowell's command to render the service which it was to perform; and second, whether, notwithstanding the abstraction of that command, General McClellan ought to have taken Richmond. The object of this paper is to show that the general's plans were right.

It appears by the evidence, as shown in my last number, that Richmond would have been taken a year ago, if Gen. McClellan had received the aid promised by the government. If there is any fallacy in the argument which reaches this conclusion, let it be shown. I do not stop to notice the theory of Gen. Ethan Allen Hitchcock; to that I may hereafter return, only remarking that the theory is a discovery of the General himself; he would be entitled, upon application, to receive a patent for it, as new, but it might fail of the other qualification required in a patentable discovery, that is in being useful.

The aid promised and withheld was the co-operation of Gen. McDowell's command. That this co-operation was promised and not given, are facts uncontradicted. The justification alleged for keeping back this command is, that it was required for the protection of Washington. Let us see how far this justification is supported by the evidence.

At the time when, contrary to public expectation, Gen. McDowell did not march to the assistance of the army on the Peninsula, he was much censured; but it now appears, from his full and apparently candid testimony before the committee, that such censure was unjust. From that testimony we learn that McDowell's command was the last to be embarked for the Peninsula, that the corps first sent down should have nothing to do with his comand, which was to go beyond Yorktown, while the first should go and threaten Yorktown. But after Gen. McClellan had moved with the army to Fortress Monroe, and written to McDowell that his corps should be the last to move, the President became apprehensive that if his command should go down below, the enemy might take advantage of the defenceless condition of Washington, and while our forces were going against Richmond, they might come against Washington. The President therefore ordered that McDowell's force should remain for the defence of the capital; it did not move to Yorktown as promised. General McDowell testifies without reservation, that he personally used no influence, nor in any way sought to be detached from Gen. McClellan's command. He remained to act purely on the defensive, for the defence of the capital. He afterwards, upon inquiry of the Secretary of War, ascertained that it would be within the scope of his defensive instructions to go to Fredericksburg. At Fredericksburg he could act for the defence of the capital. This was a decision of the War Department; let not this decision be forgotten. In accordance with this decision, McDowell went down opposite Fredericksburg, and afterwards, by permission of the War Department, put a small force, merely for a defensive purpose, across the Rappahannock into Fredericksburg. After lying some time in that city, the Gen. received information that the President intended to give nim authority to move down upon Richmond whenever Gen. Shield's division should join him. This division did join him, and the two generals were upon the eve of moving towards Richmond when a telegram came announcing the raid of the rebel general Jackson up the Shenandoah Valley. Thus it is related in Mc-Dowell's testimony:

"The President, or Secretary of War in the name of the President, telegraphed to send a division up after Jackson. I did so, although I replied that it was a crushing blow to us all. The President ordered another brigade to move up there, and then another brigade, and then another regiment. And finally the President put the question to me in this way—if I did not think that, as the department commander, it was my duty to be here in Washington. I replied that I had not so thought, or I should certainly have been here; that I thought my presence was most required down below, but as there was a doubt upon he matter I would come up. I had oped that I should not be diverted rom going to Richmond."

Gen. McDowell also informed the President, in answer to that telegram: "While I should be too late to effect ny good up there, I should lose the pportunity of doing any good down elow."

Just here let it be noted that Gen. McClellan testifies: "When I heard of the advance of Jackson upon Gen. Banks, I telegraphed to the President hat I believed the intention to be imply to prevent reinforcements be- ng sent to me. I had no idea it neant a serious threat upon Washing- on."

It is thus evident, without referring to other testimony, that General McDowell desired that his command should, in the first instance, go to Yorktown, and secondly that he should march from Fredericksburg to Richmond. As military men, McClellan and McDowell concurred in judgment as to the steps to be taken for the capture of Richmond. The alarm of the President for the safety of Washington prevented the taking of these steps. The next inquiry is,—was there any foundation for this alarm? This inquiry shall be pursued in my next.

The question now to be discussed is, Could McClellan have been sent to Richmond without endangering the safety of Washington? We have seen Generals McClellan and McDowell concur in the opinion that it could. The question was one to be decided by military men. I cannot find that this question was put by the committee to any witness, who from his military knowledge and experience was presumed capable of giving a reliable opinion—the opinion of an expert. The question should have been thus framed:—"Suppose the command of General McDowell was necessary to assure the taking of Richmond, could it have been sent either to Yorktown when McClellan went to that place, or afterwards to Hanover Court House to unite with Porter, without endangering the capital?" What must have been the answer to that question? In the first place, the strength of the enemy, and the force at his command, which under all the circumstances, he would probably bring against the capital, would have been considered. The command of McDowell, say 35,000 strong, it was proposed to send to Richmond. If it had been sent, the fact would have been well known to the enemy, and this would have compelled him to employ a larger force to defend Richmond. We know from reliable testimony that the enemy expected the junction of McDowell and Porter on the 26th of May, and McDowell's failure to come was ascribed by the enemy to a treasonable omission of duty on his part. The junction of those two commands would in the judgment of the enemy have resulted in the capture of Richmond. The testimony of the Prussian officer, then in the rebel service at Richmond, may be relied on for this statement. Assuming, then, that McDowell had moved down to Richmond, what force could the rebels have spared to assail Washington? Certainly not a large one, probably none at all. Then, secondly, what were the resources of the government for the defence of Washington, if McDowell's 35,000 troops had been sent to Richmond? I aver, without fear of contradiction, that if when McClellan went down to Fortress Monroe in March, 1862, or at any other time up to the first of June in that year, the President had seen fit to write the governors of New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts, throwing out all the other loyal New England States, and New Jersey, that he had been obliged to send away so large a force to assist in the capture of Richmond, that fifty thousand men would be required in the fortifications at Washington to make a perfect defence of the capital, that number, most of them well disciplined, well drilled, and well appointed troops, would have been in the capital in less than ten days from the date of the call, ready for immediate service. I know that 10,000 of this number from the city of New York alone would have responded to such a call in less than one week. There did come a call for troops from the War Department in the latter part of May. It was received by the 7th on the 26th day of that month, the day before the capture of Hanover Court House, in the evening of that day, Sunday, and on Tuesday morning this regiment, fully armed and equipped, fit for immediate service, was in Baltimore; the 22nd New York was there the next day, and several other regiments followed within a few days, when there came an order countermanding the call for troops, much to the disappointment and chagrin of other regiments in this city desirous and eager to march. It was not in this city only, but in Boston and elsewhere, that this disappointment was felt. I have spoken of troops not actually in the field, whose services could have been commanded by the government in an emergency for the defence of the capital. Let us now see what troops were, at the time when Gen. McClellan left Washington, actually in the service for this purpose. In his examination before the Committee on the conduct of the War, the following question was put to General McClellan:—"When you took the army to the Peninsula, how many troops were left for the defence of Washington; where were they stationed, and by whom were they commanded?" To which he gave the following answer:—"There has been published a letter which I wrote on board the steamer Commodore, on the first day of April last (1862), to the Adjutant General, giving the number of troops left and their stations. The numbers there given were furnished to me by my adjutant general, from the latest and most authentic returns in his possession. I recollect that the aggregate was something over 70,000, but I cannot give the details." This statement was also testified to by Gen. McC ellan before the McDowell Court of Inquiry. I am aware that General E. A. Hitchcock professed, in his testimony, before the committee, to be much "amazed and shocked at the testimony of Gen eral McClellan, because he included in this number of 70,000 not only the number in Washington, but also those troops employed to guard the approaches by the enemy to the capital, though stationed and acting at some distance from it. In the judgment of General Hitchcock, a force could not act for the defence of the capital unless posted in Washington, or on the opposite shore of Virginia, or somewhere in the immediate vicinity. Gen. McClellan took a different view of defensive forces; he included all those, wherever stationed, whose object was to intercept advances upon the capital, from which quarter soever those advances might be anticipated. If for instance, an advance on the city of New York was expected from an enemy in Canada, it might well be that a force posted at Albany, 160 miles distant, could act for the defence of this city. It was as I have shown, the decision of the War Department that General McDowell was acting within the scope of his orders to protect Washington, although his command was actually at Fredericksburg. The idea of General McClellan evidently was that all troops occupying and guarding the avenues leading to the capital, through which, or some of them, the enemy was expected to approach and assail the capital, in situations where they could be easily rallied to the capital itself, might, with propriety, be called troops for the defence of the capital. Who can dispute the soundness of this view? To show the actual location of those forces, I will transcribe the letter of the general, referred to in his answer above quoted. The letter is contained in the report of the committee.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, STEAMER COMMODORE, April 1, 62.
Brig. Gen. L. Thomas, Adj. Gen., U.S.A.

General:—I have to request that you will lay the following communication before the Hon. Secretary of War.

The approximate numbers and positions of the troops left near and in rear of the Potomac are about as follows:

Gen. Dix has, after guarding the railroads under his charge, sufficient to give him 5,000 for the defence of Baltimore, and 1,988 available for the Eastern Shore, Annapolis, &c. Fort Delaware is very well garrisoned by about 400 men. The garrisons of the forts around Washington amount to 10,600 men; other disposable troops now with Gen. Wadsworth being about 11,400 men.

The troops employed in guarding the various railways in Maryland amount to some 3,359 men. These it it designed to relieve, being old regiments, by dismounted cavalry, and to send them forward to Manassas.

Gen. Abercrombie occupies Warrenton with a force which, including Col. Geary at White Plains, and the cavalry to be at his disposal, will amount to some 7,780 men, with 12 pieces of artillery.

I have the honor to request that all the troops organized for service in Pennsylvania and New York, and in any of the Eastern States, may be ordered to Washington. I learn from Governor Curtin that there are some 3,500 men now ready in Pennsylvania. This force I should be glad to have sent to Manassas. Four thousand men from Gen. Wadsworth I desire to be ordered to Manassas. These troops, with the railroad guard above alluded to, will make up a force under the command of Gen. Abercrombie of something like 18,639 men.

It is my design to push Gen. Blenker's division from Warrenton upon Strasburg. He should remain at Strasburg long enough to allow matters to assume a definite form in that region, before proceeding to his ultimate destination.

The troops in the valley of the Shenandoah will thus (including Blenker's division, 10,028 strong, with 24 pieces of artillery; Banks' 5th corps, which embraces 41 guns, some 3,652 disposable cavalry, and the railroad guard, about 2,000 men) amount to about 35,468 men.

It is designed to relieve General Hooker by one regiment, say, 850 men, being with some 500 cavalry, 3,350 men on the Lower Potomac.

To recapitulate—

At Warrenton there is to be	-	7,780 men.
At Manassas, say	- - - - -	10 859 "
In the Valley of the Shenandoah		35.859 "
On the Lower Potomac	- - -	1,350 "
In all	- - -	55,456

There would thus be left for the garrisons and the front of Washington, under General Wadsworth, some 18,000 men, inclusive of the batteries under instruction.

The troops organizing or ready for service in New York, I learn, will probably number more than four thousand. These should be assembled at Washington subject to disposition where their services may be required.

I am, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,
GEO B. McCLELLAN,
Maj.-Gen. Commanding.

This topic shall be pursued in my next number.

I have shown, and the Committee on the conduct of the War had sufficient evidence before them to prove, that there was no cause for the alarm exhibited by the President, which kept him from sending McDowell's command to Yorktown, or to Hanover Court House. That this alarm was really felt by the President, I am bound to believe. The question now is, who awakened this feeling of apprehension? Who is responsible for it? I have no doubt that Generals James S. Wadsworth and E. A Hitchcock are the persons.

On the 21st day of April, 1862, Gen. Wadsworth made a report to the Secretary of War; the next day he testified before the committee and verified the accuracy of his report. This document states the number of men left under his command for the defence of Washington, to be 19,022 present for duty. This does not differ materially from Gen. McClellan's letter above copied; but the essential difference between these reports is this, one states only the number of troops in a very limited command, while the other defines the number, in other far more extensive commands, all for the defence of Washington. The President was led to believe that Wadsworth's 19,022 troops was the aggregate force left for the defence of the capitol. He says in a communication to Gen, McClellan dated April 9, 1862, "Do you really think I should permit the line from Richmond via Manassas Junction, to this city, [Washington] to be entirely open, except what resistance could be presented by less than 20,000 unorganized troops? This is a question which the country will not allow me to evade." Thus, it is proved that the President was fully possessed with the idea that there was no force for the defence of the capital but that reported to be under General Wadsworth. He supposed the whole line from Richmond via Manassas Junction to Washington to be entirely open, and that the enemy on that line would encounter no resistance except from Wadsworth's command. No wonder he felt some apprehension. It seems impossible that the President could ever have seen McClellan's letter dated April 1, then on file in the War Department. From that report he would have learned that at Manassas and Warrenton almost in front of Washington, and directly on the line to Richmond there were besides those under Wadsworth's, 18,639 troops, and twelve guns, or 36,639 men and 44 field guns directly applicable to the defence of Washington, without counting the 1,350 men on the lower Potomac, who could also have been drawn in if an attack was imminent. Besides all this there were 35,467 troops and 65 guns in the Shenandoah Valley ready to move to the defence of Washington if necessary. There were in fact all told 77,500 men and 103 field guns for the defence of Washington and its approaches, without counting the force under Gen. Dix at Baltimore, which amounted to ten regiments and two battalions of infantry, one regiment of cavalry, and five batteries. These numbers are from official returns.

Gen. Wadsworth testifies before the War Committee that he had within his jurisdiction "everything for the defence of Washington," and further testifies that the total amount of men present for duty under his command was 19,022. The general evidently left the impression upon the minds of the Committee that these troops were the sole reliance for the defence of the capital; the same impression must have been received by the President, and contributed to the delusion under which his mind labored. Wadsworth's report was brought to his attention, and, basing his suggestion upon this report, Hitchcock intimated to the Secretary of War that McClellan had left the capital defenceless; that he had violated his orders, and rendered himself responsible for all the consequences. Here was a mare's nest. Hitchcock says:—"When this state of things became known to the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, he required General Thomas and myself to make a report upon the execution of the President's order, the letter of Gen. McClellan of the 1st April, the report of General Wadsworth of the 2d April, and one or two other papers requiring us to give an opinion whether Gen. McClellan had complied, or not, with the requirements of the order of the President." Who made this state of things known to the Secretary of War? General Hitchcock himself, doubtless. A court of inquiry, in fact, though not in name, was thus instituted to report whether or not McClellan had obeyed orders. All that a court of inquiry has power to do, is to inquire and report to the power appointing it.

That court made a report to the War Department. Hitchcock testifies: "The report went of course to the President, and, on the next day, if I mistake not, the 3d of April, the President came to the war office and held quite a long conversation with the chiefs of the various bureaus of the War Department, the Secretary of War being present. At the conclusion of that consultation the President himself ordered that one of the Corps of the Army of the Potomac which were then in front of Washington should be detained for the defence of the capital. The selection was left with the Secretary of War who designated the Corps commanded by McDowell. I will mention," says Hitchcock, "that Gen. McDowell himself was not present, and I believe knew nothing of the steps which led to his detention here until after the order was issued. As soon as General McClellan heard of this he complained of it. He wished the whole of McDowell's Corps sent to him."

Now I call upon every officer of the army, and upon every American eitizen to give his attention for a brief space of time to the scenes here described.

George B. McClellan, a young general with little experience in actual service, without any solicitation on his part, is called by his government to a post of the highest responsibility. He is placed in command of the largest army by far ever brought together in his native land, an army organized for the purpose of suppressing an insurrection the most formidable the world has ever beheld, an insurrection which threatened the overthrow of the government, and the extinction of popular liberty. At a distance from the capital; in the very face of the enemy, anxious beyond all expression for success; excited and agitated by the consciousness that the eyes of his country, and the whole civilized world are eagerly fastened upon him, scanning and criticising all he does, and all he leaves undone. This is one scene in the drama. Now turn to another. At the capital of his country this same young commander, in his absence is charged with having disobeyed the order of his superior in command, in neglecting to secure the safety of that capital against an invading foe; a grave offence. A court or commission of inquiry is instituted before which he has no notice to appear, of its very existence he is not apprised. Ignorant of any charge brought against him, with no counsel or friend to speak for, or defend him, he is tried before the court, a report condeming him is brought in. The President and all the officials of the War Department are assembled to hear and cogitate upon this report; the Commander-in-Chief approves of it and passes sentence upon the absent accused. The stiletto has been thrust into his back, and he is ignorant of the assault until he finds himself fainting from the loss of blood That sentence is that he shall be denied the co-operation of a corps which had been promised him, and which he deemed essential to success, because he had violated express directions in neglecting the safety of the capital.

Now let us see whether General McClellan was in truth guilty of the charge preferred against him. The charge was that he had violated an order "that Washington should be perfectly secure." But who shall say in what "security" consists? The President says: "My explicit directions that Washington should, in the judgment of all the commanders of corps, be left entirely secured, had been entirely neglected." The commanders of corps were therefore made sole judges of what was required for security. These commanders were Generals Keyes, Heintzelman, Mc Dowell and Sumner. They were absent, with the exception of McDowell, on the peninsula, with McClellan. We have seen what McDowell's opinion was. All these commanders of corps were examined before the War Committee, but none of them was asked whether he considered the forces actually left by Gen. McClellan, sufficient to ensure the safety of the capital. The testimony of neither of them was before Generals Hitchcock and Thomas, and there is little doubt that every one of them would have admitted the force, actually left there, to be sufficient to secure the safety of Washington. There was therefore no authority for the decision that in the judgment of commanders of corps Washington was left unsafe.

General Hitchcock testified that Gen. McClellan complained of that decision made in the office of the Secretary of War on the 3d of April. Yes, he did complain: his letter to the President is in the following words:

NEAR YORKTOWN, April 5, 7 1-2. P.M

"The enemy are in large force along our front, and apparently intend making a determined resistance. A reconnoisance just made by Gen. Barnard shows that their line of works extends across the entire peninsula from Yorktown to Warwick river. Many of them are very formidable. Deserters say they are being reinforced daily from Richmond and from Norfolk. Under these circumstances I beg that you will reconsider the order detaching the first corps from my command. In my deliberate judgment the success of our cause will be imperiled by so greatly reducing my force when it is actually under the fire of the enemy, and active operations have commenced. Two or three of my divisions have been under fire of artillery most of the day. I am now of the opinion that I shall have to fight all the available force of the rebels not far from here. Do not force me to do so with diminished numbers; but whatever your decision may be, I will leave nothing undone to obtain success. G. B. MCCLELLAN,

Major General.

A LINCOLN, President.

This letter speaks for itself, it needs no comment.

The report and testimony of Gen. James S. Wadsworth might be subjected to severe animadversion. His statements are contradicted by reliable testimony. The report of Col. William B. Green to General Barry, Inspector of Artillery, has been extensively published. It shows conclusively the gross inaccuracy of General Wadsworth. Moreover, the opposition, if not bitter hostility of General Wadsworth to General McClellan is well known in military circles at Washington; it can be shown that Wadsworth did not wish Richmond to be taken by McClellan. But I shall not dwell upon this topic; my object in these communications is single, and I shall not be diverted from its pursuit.

Now I submit to all men whether these two points have not been established by the testimony contained in the report of the Committee on the conduct of the war.

1. If General McDowell's command had not been denied General McClellan, he would have taken Richmond a year ago.

2. There was no justifiable reason for withholding that command.

Beyond all controversy, the Committee were authorized by tha evidence, to report these conclusions, and in failing to do so, they have done General McClellan signal injustice. I arraign that committee, collectively and individually, at the bar of public opinion, and charge them with that injustice.

I shall next proceed to show that General McClellan did the best he could with the forces under his command.

YORKTOWN.

The next duty is to inquire whether, although deprived of the co-operation of McDowell's command, McClellan ought, under all the circumstances, to have taken Richmond with the force under his command. It has been asserted with great confidence that he ought; the Committee on the Conduct of the War unanimously censure, nay condemn him for not having taken the rebel capital, and captured the army which defended it. It is obvious that this condemnatory sentence cannot be met successfully by a general denial; the grounds upon which it rests must be carefully examined, step by step, first at Yorktown, then from Yorktown to Richmond, then before Richmond, &c. I shall pursue this inquiry in the light of such evidence as was furnished by the state of things existing at the times respectively when the movements of the army were made. It would be unfair to view these movements in the light of information supplied since General McClellan was ordered to leave the Peninsula, and not accessible before that time. I shall be pardoned, it being unavoidable, for giving some details of evidence which may seem dry and tedious to such of

y readers as are in a hurry and can ly read short paragraphs. There e some of my countrymen, even in ese times of agitation and bustle, ho are willing to be at pains to inestigate, and ascertain, if they can, e truth on a subject like that under nsideration. To such I must be con-nt to address myself. The first potion to be examined is Yorktown.

It is admitted that Gen. McClellan ppeared before Yorktown with an my consisting of 107,000 troops, ell equipped, well drilled, well sup-lied, and composed of men of physil, intellectual, and moral power, ich as have never been surpassed in y military organization. This army eserves the highest wrought eulogy at has ever been passed upon it.
his eulogy has been recorded by the ommanding General of the Army of e Potomac, and history will transit it to future generations.

Let it be remembered, for the fact eems to have been kept studiously ut of mind, that the army which this oyal and ever to be honored host ent to subdue were composed of American citizens, most of them naive born, numerically equal, probably uperior to our own, well officered, ell drilled, under strict discipline, ighting behind entrenchments, on soil laimed to be their own, and animated vith a zeal which the resistance of an nvading enemy alone can inspire.
Now although the loyal army sur-assed the rebels in the material of war, this was counterbalanced by the ard lessons they had learned in the school of privation and suffering;
hey were at home fighting on the lefensive, in positions chosen by themselves, behind ramparts of their own construction. Men versed in the art of war have learned from the records of former military conflicts, to compute with mathematical accuracy the advantages and disadvantages of armies in such circumstances, composed of the same race of men, neither superior to the other in spirit or military prowess. With such an enemy in front discharging his fire, well might McClellan implore the President, do not force me to fight with diminished numbers.

General McClellan in all his military operations has acted under the inspiration and guidance of two general principles.

1. The rebellion had assumed a character so formidable as to place the country in a state of civil war. Army was arrayed against army in the field. The rules for the government of belligerent parties which modern civilization furnishes, were of binding force. General McClellan had received the education of a soldier; he was well-instructed in these rules. He had before him the example of Gen.
Scott, who had always conducted warfare in conformity to these rules, never for an instant departing from their injunctions, and this great General had received the approbation of his country for his course. On no consideration, to gratify no man, or set of men, would Gen. McClellan violate these rules and deviate from the path pursued by his illustrious predecessor under whom he had learned the art of war. Such a violation, such a departure, would fix a stain upon his character as a soldier, which no success could efface; besides it would dishonor the flag of the Christian nation which he served. To do this was impossible for George B. McClellan.

2. McClellan, while he meant to do what he could to put down the rebellion, to exert every nerve to accomplish this object, yet was anxious to do it without any unnecessary loss of life of the soldiers led by him; he knew who these soldiers were, whence they came, how they were connected in their respective homes and neighborhoods, and what value to set upon their lives.

These were his principles; and, besides these, as a matter of fact, he had the conviction that the enemy was a very formidable one; others could afford to despise him, but he could not.
He could have wished it otherwise, but his personal knowledge of the officers who led that enemy, and the spirit and prowess of the troops led by them, forced this conviction on his understanding; he could not ignore it, but as a soldier he felt his obligation to act upon it.

All these composed the creed of Gen. McClellan; and if the tirades of abuse amounting almost to the ravings of lunatics, which have been spoken and written against him, from Senator Chandler's speech on the floor of the Senate, down to the late editorial article in the New York Times, shall be closely analyzed and examined, it will be seen that this creed is that which mainly stirs up the ire of his opponents.

McClellan marched from Fortress Monroe towards Yorktown on the 4th of April 1862, and soon reached the fortified position which was evacuated by the enemy in great precipitation on the 4th day of May, one month thereafter. The retreat of the enemy from a very strong and well fortified position was compelled by our army in one month.

The charge against the commanding general is that he spent too much time before Yorktown—that he should have taken it immediately on his arrival before it by assault, and not waited the operations of a siege.

What is the testimony upon this point? It shall be fairly given. The Prince de Joinville, an eye witness, says:—"We reached the Confederate lines which opened on us at once, with a sharp fire of artillery. We replied, but without making any impression on the well defined works which covered the hostile cannon. The creek had been reconnoitered and found impassable by infantry, both on account of the depth of water, and of its marshy borders, in which the troops would have been under a cross-fire of numbers of sharpshooters concealed in the woods and behind the embankments.

"Throughout the seven miles of Confederate lines he encountered the same attitude of alert defence. Every where cannon and camps. Of course the inference was that we were arrested by forces apparently formidable, and before a position not easily carried."

General McClellan before the committee testifies: "Question. Could not the line of works have been assaulted when you arrived before them in full force with a fair prospect of success?—Answer. I think not. I resorted to the operations of a siege after a more careful personal examination than a commanding general gives to such things; and I was fully satisfied that the course I adpoted was the best under the circumstances."

"Question.—You did not open your batteries as they were finished, one by one, but waited until all were ready, did you not?—Answer. We did, and expected to open fire from them all on Monday morning. A few shots were fired for a special purpose from battery No. 1 against vessels landing at the wharf."

"Question. Would it not have been better to have opened your batteries as they were completed, without waiting for the completion of all of them?—Answer. I think decidedly not; because they would probably have been overwhelmed by the concentrated fire of the enemy. The object was to wait until we had such an overwhelming force at our disposal as would crush everything before us."

General John. C. Barnard, chief of General McClellan's engineer corps, who next to the general commanding, is the highest authority, reported at the time:—"It was not deemed practicable considering the strength of that line and the difficulty of handling our forces (owing to the impracticable character of the country), to break the line across the isthmus, and too hazardous to attempt the reduction of the place" (Yorktown) "by assault."—"The forcing of such a line with so little loss, in itself is an exploit less brilliant, perhaps, but more worthy of study than would have been a murderous assault, even if it had proved successful." These are extracts from the engineer's report now made public, I believe, for the first time, but that report was accessible to the committee.

General Erastus D. Keyes commanded a division in the Army of the Peninsula. He was before Yorktown. His advance was stopped by a line of defence nine or ten miles long, fortified by breast works, erected, nearly the whole distance behind a stream, or succession of ponds, nowhere fordable; one terminus behind Yorktown, and the other ending in the James River which is commanded by the enemy's gunboats. He says:—"Yorktown is fortified all around with bastioned works, and on the water side, it, and Gloucester, are so strong that the navy are afraid to attack either. The approaches on our side are generally through low, swampy or thickly wooded grounds; over roads which we are obliged to repair or make before we can get forward our carriages. The enemy is in great force, and is constantly receiving reinforcements from the two rivers. The line in front of us is therefore one of the strongest ever opposed to an invading foce in any country. Independently of the strength of the lines in front of us, and of the force of the enemy behind them, we cannot advance until we get command of either York or James River."

General Fitz John Porter who commanded the advanced corps and who also conducted the siege of Yorktown, reported: "Personal recognizances confirmed by the reports of engineer officers, and the troops, showed the Yorkstown defences to be strong, and well armed, and connected with those on the Warwick by field works for artillery and infantry; that the bridges were destroyed and the approaches to the dams which had backed up the water to overflow the banks were obstructed by abbatis and defended on the right bank by stone forts, which were well armed and manned and connected by infantry parapets."—"Offieers on picket reported the enemy apparently in great numbers and very active, while deserters stated that troops at Yorktown and vicinity, originally about 15,000, had been greatly increased by arrivals from Norfolk and Richmond, and were confident of successfully defending the place."

In opposition to this is the testimony, 1st, of Gen. Silas S. Casey. He says: "That part of the army that went to Yorktown, I think, should have stormed the works, as from the information I received afterwards there were but about 7,000 or 8,000 men on the arrival of the first corps on the peninsula." This is all this witness says about storming the works. If General Casey had commanded the army, he would not have acted on information received afterwards.

2. General Samuel P. Heintzleman. The following testimony transcribed from the report was read by the General; "Question. If there was only about 7,000 men in Yorktown, and you had so large an army, what military objection had you to isolating the place and attacking further up the Peninsula? Answer. By the time we got to Yorktown their army had been largely reinforced there, though nothing like as fast as ours. Question What was the estimated strength of our army there? Answer. I never heard. I was always of opinion that we could have forced their lines; and from information that I got at the Adams House, about two miles from Williamsburgh, the day before the battle there, I was satisfied we could have done so."

3. General Joseph Hooker testified: "From my examination of the works at Yorktown, and reaching away beyond the position that I occupied, I felt that their lines could be pierced without any considerable loss by the corps with which I was on duty—Heintzleman's corps. We could have gone right through, and gone to the rear of the enemy. They would run the moment we got to their rear, and we could have picked up the prisoners. Right there at Yorktown the enemy had expended a great deal of labor. But I would have marched right through the redoubts which was a part of the cordon they had, and got on the road between Yorktown and Richmond and thus compelled the enemy to fight me on my ground, and not have fought them on theirs." This testimony is characteristic of this witness; and he would undoubtedly have marched right through the redoubts, always provided the enemy had not prevented him. He would, too, have compelled the enemy to fight him on his own ground, provided he could have got possession of the ground, and kept it.

So then it will be seen that the witnesses in favor of beseiging Yorktown are: 1. Prince de Joinville, 2. General McClellan, 3. Gen. Barnard, 4. Gen. Keyes, and 5. Gen. Porter. In favor of storming the works, Generals Heintzelman, Casey, and Hooker. This being a question to be decided by the opinions of military men. I take into consideration such opinions only, the opinions of what the law terms experts; other opinions are not competent evidence. It ought perhaps to be stated in this connection that General Barnard, although he gave the opinion above quoted from his report made at the time of the siege, yet afterwards changed his mind. The evidence of this change was furnished by a most extraordinary report made by him to General McClellan long after the siege of Yorktown; after it was well understood what testimony the committee sought in respect to General McClellan, and, strange to say, even after this general had been relieved of his command, and when it was supposed he was not in favor with the administration. It must have been painful to General Barnard to feel himself compelled to attempt the ruin of a brother officer at such a time. and under such circumstances; but let the veteran engineer console himself with the assurance I now give him, that General McClellan is not ruined in reputation; he is not dead. He may be annoyed, but he is not in disgrace, nor is he friendless,

BEFORE YORKTOWN.

I did suppose that what had been said in my last number would have been sufficient to show that General McClellan was deserving of commendation, rather than censure, for deciding to besiege the enemy's works at Yorktown in preference to carrying them by what, in the opinion of General Barnard, would have been a murderous assault even if successful. The country has since had some experience of such assaults at Fredericksburg. The sole consolation for our disasters in these conflicts is found in the fact that, although we lost many thousands in killed and wounded, yet perhaps the enemy suffered as severely as ourselves. But, on referring again to the report of the committee, I see that a strong point is attempted to be made against the general for what is termed his "delay before Yorktown." The following paragraph is taken from the pamphlet edition of the committee, published and sold in the office of the New York Tribune. The capitals and italics are also copied:

"DELAY BEFORE YORKTOWN.

"All the testimony goes to prove that when our troops first landed on the Peninsula the force of the enemy there consisted of Magruder's command, variously estimated at from 7,000 to 12,000 men, except by General McClellan, who estimated it at from 15,000 to 20,000. The Hon. Lemuel J. Bowden, U. S. Senator from Virginia—then living within the rebel lines, near Williamsburg,—testifies that the rebels did not determine to reinforce Magruder until it was apparent that our forces intended to stop before Yorktown, and intended to commence a regular siege o the place. It is now evident, whatever may have been the opinion of our officers at the time, that our forces when they first appeared before Yorktown could have pierced the line of works across the Peninsula there without much difficulty, isolating Yorktown and cutting off reinforcements, when the place must have fallen in a very short time. Some of our generals expected and desired that that should be done. Gen. Heintzelman forwarded to Gen. McClellan the application of Gen. Hamilton, commanding a division, for permission to force the enemy's lines. No answer was received to the application."

I shall refute these statements in their order. It is not true that the rebels did not intend to reinforce Magruder until it was determined to commence a regular siege of Yorktown.

PROOF.

General McClellan did not contemplate the necessity of a siege when he first advanced (April 4th) upon Yorktown, after landing on the Peninsula; he then expected to be joined by McDowell's command. On the 4th of April he issued orders for the continued march of the army at an early hour the next morning. General Keyes', General Couch's, and General Smith's divisions were ordered to positions on the Yorktown and Williamsburg road, which would enable them to prevent the escape of the garrison at Yorktown, and to intercept reinforcements coming in. But General Keyes reported the impossibility of carrying those orders into effect, specifying, among other things, that "the enemy is in great force, and is constantly receiving reinforcements from the two rivers. The line in front of us is their new one of the strongest ever opposed to an invading force in any country." This report bore date April 7th. On the 5th and 6th of April he had previously reported that the enemy's works (Lee's Mills) in front of Smith, cannot be carried by assault. General Keyes was not before Yorktown, but in front of the enemy, on the Warwick. General McClellan himself testified: "We did not know, before we landed on the Peninsula, of the line of works along the Warwick. We knew that Yorktown was surrounded by a continuous line of earthworks, but we did not know of the line of the Warwick."

General Casey, who it will be remembered, acted under General Keyes, and did not join for several days after Keyes, says:

"From information I received afterwards," (that is after the evacuation of Yorktown), "there were but 7,000 or 8,000 men there on the arrival of the five corps" (not before Yorktown, but) "on the Peninsula" General Heintzelman says: "By the time we got to Yorktown their army (the enemy's) had been largely reinforced." General McClellan, in answer to the inquiry, "What was the force of the enemy when Heintzelman landed on the Peninsula?" says: "I do not know positively; but my belief is that there was not at that time much more than Magruder's original command, which, I think, we had always estimated at from 15,000 to 20,000 men. Movements of troops had been going on across the James River to the Peninsula some days before my arrival. I remember that immediately upon my arrival at Fort Monroe, I was told that quite a large number of troops had been crossed over to Yorktown from the south bank of the James. I therefore hurried my own movements, and started from Fort Monro sooner than I would have done. From the best information that I have been able to get, I think that large masses of reinforcements arrived at Yorktown from one to two days before I reached its vicinity. Johston himself arrived there the day before I did."

Thus much for the proof in opposition to the testimony quoted from Hon. Lemuel J. Bowden (United States Senator!) The senator says he practiced law for a number of years, from Willimsburg down to Hampton, including Yorktown. He is asked by the committee: "In your judgment what would have been the result had a vigorous attack been made upon Yorktown proper, or a flank attack made?" The law gives value to the judgment of none but experts; it does not allow such judgments or opinions to be given in evidence, except perhaps when the witness is clothed with the dignity of "a Senator," and I freely admit that the "judgment" of Senator Bowden is of as much value as the judgment of Senator Chandler, or Senator Sherman; Senators all! But let us hear the reply of the witness. He could not forget that though a senator, he had practiced law; he therefore says: "I have very little skill, if any, in military affairs, but my decided impression is," &c. This answer was a rebuke as severe as could have been given, for putting such a question to such a man. If there had been any honest lawyer on that committee, with even the elementary knowledge of the law of evidence, he would have said to the witness: "You are excused from giving any further answer; if you are not a military man, your opinion is no evidence, and if you are a military man, your impression would not be evidence." But the witness was not interrogated, and he proceeds to tell, not what he knew but what he had heard from other Union men, better qualified to judge than himself; he concludes his narration of hearsay testimony in these words: "This I gathered from others, for I did not myself go to Yorktown after the Confederates took possession of it until they evacuated it." If any one of my readers desires to know what, in particular, Senator Bowden "gathered from others," I will refer him to the report of the committee, page 583. I beg leave to take leave of the Senator, with commendation for his modesty, and I will say for him that I regard his judgment in military matters as highly as I do any other lawyer of my acquaintance.

But the committee say:—"It is now evident, whatever may have been the opinion of our officers at the time, that (here come the italics) our forces, when they first appeared before Yorktown, could have pierced the line of works, &c."

I have just shown what the officers at the time thought, but I do not find in the report that any, but General Heintzelman, were as wise after the time as the committee represent. This General says, I was always of the opinion that we could have forced their lines, and from information I got at the Adams House, about two miles from Willimsburg, the day before the battle there, I was satisfied we could have done so. The veteran general does not tell the committee from whence he derived this information; perhaps it was Senator Bowden, for he lived up there. If the general did get his information from this source, he certainly shows proper respect for the "civil authority," a commendable trait in a military man.

The report at the conclusion of the paragraph quoted says:

"General Heintzelman forwarded to General McClellan the application of General Hamilton, commanding a division, for permission to force the enemy's lines. No answer was received to the application." This passage of the report is founded on the following testimony given by General Heintzelman: "We were willing to try to force the lines with a single brigade. General Hamilton made the application, and I forwarded it to the commanding general."

On the 16th April Brigadier General Hamilton reported that the line of rebel works for three quarters of a mile could have been carried by a single brigade, with very little loss, and "I further report that I believe I can carry these works and hold them without much loss." This is the application made by Gen. Hamilton Gen Hamilton, when he made this report, was under the impression that the artillery in our batteries Nos. 7 and 8 had driven the enemy from Winn's Mills works, which was erroneous. No answer or direction was given to Gen. Hamilton in reply to his suggestion, because it was well known, and it had been reported by the general conducting the siege, that it had been found impracticable to cross the Warwick anywhere in the vicinity of Winn's Mills, this river not being fordable and the bridges destroyed; also that "a close and thorough reconnoissance on the 25th made by that excellent officer of the army, Col. Jesse Gove, with his regiment, the Twenty-Second Massachusetts Volunteers, confirmed his former report of the 5th and 11th, that the Warwick was not fordable, the bank swampy, and the dams near its headwaters, on account of artificial obstructions, unapproachable in face of the enemy on the opposite banks."

Gen. Grover, part of Heintzelman's command, after carrying a small work, defending a dam east of the Warwick, near Winn's Mills, drew off his forces because the Warwick could not be crossed, the narrow dam at that point being defended by several strong works well manned. Winn's Mills were near the headwaters of the Warwick. Gen. Barnard says in his report: "The first group of works (the enemy's) is at Winn's Mills, where there is a dam and a bridge. This bridge the enemy destroyed."

Thus I have examined and refuted sentence by sentence—the reader will see that this detail was necessary—the italicised libel of the committee which has been circulated by thousands and tens of thousands, by the aid of a metropolitan press, and the machinery of the United States government, and all for what? to destroy the reputation, as a soldier, of Geo. B. McClellan.

I have seen a copy of General Barnard's report, bearing date May 6, 1862, and of Gen. Barry's, bearing date May 5, 1862, and of General Fitz John Porter, bearing date May 8, 1862. These reports seem to me to give evidence of professional talent of a high order. The words in which this report of Gen. Barnard concludes have been quoted, and shall not be repeated. But the following additional quotations from the same report may be aptly given here. "If we could have broken the enemy's lines across the isthmus, we could have invested Yorktown, and it must, with its garrison, soon have fallen into our hands. It was not deemed practicable, considering the strength of that line and the difficulty of handling our forces (owing to the impracticable character of the country) to do so. If we could take Yorktown, or drive the enemy out of that place, the enemy's line was no longer tenable. This we could do by a single operation It was deemed too hazardous to attempt the reduction of the place by assault." Perhaps General Hooker would not have deemed it "too hazardous;" but here let me say what I declare upon reliable authority, that this same general never saw the defences of the enemy behind the Warwick. General Barry, fully confiding in the artillery placed and pointed under his command, reported that our batteries, when opened, "would have compelled the enemy to surrender in 12 hours." But the committee did not call Barry and Porter to the witness' stand,—they selected their own witnesses; yet it must have been known to them that these generals knew a great deal about the siege of Yorktown. The enemy did not give General Barry an opportunity to try his well-placed guns, and demonstrate the power and efficiency of his batteries, but directly decided to evacuate before they were opened. What a tribute was this evacuation to the unsurpassed skill and generalship of McClellan! A force of equal, if not superior number retires, precipitately, from their own chosen and deliberately constructed fortifications, without firing a gun. Who for a moment imagined that Major General McClellan would, under similar circumstances, have retired from fortifications erected for the defence of any loyal city under his command? This young general would never have evacuated had he been behind such fortifications with an army numerically equal in his front. It cannot be denied that this siege and its result was an eminent military success. Why was not that great captain, Lieut. Gen. Winfield Scott, asked his professional opinion of the operations before Yorktown? The reply is easy—because the committee well knew he would not give an answer to suit their purpose. Yet while the siege of Yorktown, as a military enterprise, is regarded with admiration by distinguished soldiers at home and abroad; while it illustrates in a remarkable degree the proficiency of our country in the science and art of war, a committee of an American Congress make it a theme of censure, and strive by the most studied arts to defame and degrade their own illustrious countryman who suggested the plan and supervised the whole conduct of that siege. Shame! shame!

The joint committee must have intended to rebuke the action of the House of Representatives, which on the 9th May, 1862, passed the following resolution of thanks:—"Resolved,

That we receive with profound satisfaction intelligence of the recent victories achieved by the armies of the Potomac, associated from their localities with those of the Revolution, and that the sincere thanks of this House are hereby tendered to Major General George B. McClellan, for the display of those high military qualities which secure important results with but little sacrifice of life.

I have done with Yorktown, unless the committee or some of its members see fit to reply to what is here recorded. I do not wish to be considered the defender of General McClellan. He needs no defence. The simple unvarnished narrative of what he has done, and what he has left undone, in the service of his country, and his reasons for his action and non-action, will form not only his defence but his eulogy. My office is to arraign before the American people and the world, the joint committee of Congress. It will afford me sincere gratification to be convinced that this committee does not deserve the marked reprobation of all intelligent and honorable men.

Since I sent my last number to the press I have been addressed by a merchant of high position and respectability, substantially as follows: "Well! I see you have turned military man, and are engaged in the discussion of military questions." My reply to such a question is—I am no military man, and am no judge of military matters; that is to say, my judgment is not the result of such theoretical and practical knowledge as entitles my opinions to be received as evidence to guide the judgment of others. I am not an expert. But I do profess to some knowledge of the rules of evidence, and also to some acquaintance with the Constitution of my country, and to the duties imposed upon public officers by that Constitution.

1. As to the rules of evidence. Every witness may testify to facts which have fallen under his own observation, or which he personally knows; but information derived from others is hearsay evidence, and is open to many objections. It is very unsafe to form conclusions from such testimony.

As I have before shown, opinions can only be received as evidence when they proceed from witnesses who have, from theory and practice, peculiar knowledge of the subject upon which they testify. These rules are the result of long experience in the practical business of mankind, especially in controversies brought before courts of justice, and they have been established with the view to aiding the human mind in the endeavor to arrive at truth through the medium of human testimony. Another rule is, that leading questions shall not be put to a witness; that is to say, a question shall not be asked which suggests to the witness the answer which is desired and expected. Considering that the joint committee was composed of members, a large majority of whom were known to be unfriendly to McClellan, and were intent upon his degradation, and considering too, that most of the witnesses were dependent for their positions, and especially for their promotion, upon the favor of the Administration, leading questions would not be likely to elicit the truth. Witness the single case of General Barnard, in illustration of this remark. Now I affirm, from a thorough and attentive perusal of the evidence contained in No. 1 of the committee's report, that all these rules have been grossly and repeatedly violated by the committee in taking testimony. To speeify: A great deal of improper and hearsay evidence has been received in answer to questions put by the committee. Numerous opinions have been drawn forth and recorded, from witnesses whose opinions were not evidence. The report abounds with leading questions which plainly suggest to the witnesses the answers desired, and the answers are, for the most part, given as desired.

2. As to the Constitution, and duties of official agents of the government:

The President, the chief of these official organs, is by virtue of his office, commander in chief of the army, but that of itself, does not qualify him to take command of the army or to interfere in military operations. The idea, that because he is the constitutional conmander in chief of the army, he shall take command in fact, is absurd, according to the theory of our constitutional government. The country has been engaged in three wars with foreign nations since the Revolution. The short war with France, under John Adams, second President of the United States, the war with Great Britain, under Mr. Madison's Administration, and the war with Mexico, under Mr. Polk's Administration. Neither of these Presidents ever for a moment undertook to interfere directly with troops or regiments in the field. The idea of John Adams, or James Madison, eminent statesmen as they were, bestriding a horse and reviewing an army, would strike any American citizen of their day as ridiculous. A President may put in office, by consent of the Senate, the incumbents of the War Department; but when duly filled with officers, constitutionally chosen, this department must manage and control military operations in time of war. The like is true of every other department. Who expects the President to control the operations of the Treasury Department? Would Mr. Chase allow for a moment such interference or control? Certainly not. President Lincoln has practically violated this established theory of our government. He has interfered directly, in his own proper person, with military operations; he has personally directed generals in command what they ought to do, and what they ought to leave undone. What has been the result? Nothing but evil and disaster. I have shown, beyond the possibility of refutation, that but for the interference of the President, General McClellan would have taken Richmond a year ago. Unless this war is conducted by military men, upon military principles, it needs no prophet to tell us it can never succeed. It is a well known fact that the General-in-Chief at Washington does not control the military operations of the country, but he is constantly interfered with and controlled by the constitutional Commander-in-Chief, and this constitutional commander is constantly under an outside pressure, not directed by military science, which he has more than once acknowledged his utter inability to resist. Is it possible that our cause should prosper when these things exist? My remedy is:—Let George B. McClellan be made General-in-Chief and Acting Secretary of War, and then let him control the operations of the war, without interference, just as Mr. Chase now controls the operations of the Treasury Department without interference. Then success will follow, and confidence will be felt that military operations will be properly conducted.

This number is an episode suggested by the question casually put to me as above stated. I shall accompany the Army of the Potomac from Yorktown to Williamsburg in my next number.

FROM YORKTOWN TO WILLIAMSBURG.

Yorktown was evacuated on the 4th of May, 1862; suddenly, unexpectely, precipitately evacuated. What, then, was the duty of General Mc Clellan, and did he perform that duty? It is obvious that fresh, hot, and vigorous pursuit was one branch of that duty. By this means the enemy, or a part of his force, might be encountered and captured. Another and more important branch of his duty was, if posaible, to intercept the retreat of the enemy by throwing a force between him and Richmond. Let us see what the general actually did; his own testimony on this point is too clear and comprehensive to require elucidation or abridgment. Here it is: "As soon as I knew that the enemy had evacuated Yorktown. I ordered the cavalry under General Stoneman, with the horse-artillery in pursuit. I directed the divisions of Kearney and Hooker to move by the direct road from Yorktown to Wil liamsburg, while the divisions of Smith, Couch, and Casey, were ordered by the road from Warwick Court House to Williamsburgh. Franklin's division, which was on the Transports, was ordered up to Yorktown, with the intention of moving it to the vicinity of West Point, in order to intercept the retreat of the enemy. The divisions of Richardson, Sedgwick, and Porter were moved to the immediate vicinity of Yorktown, ready either to support the troops who had advanced by land, or to go by water, as circumstances might render advisable. The general instructions given to the troops ordered in pursuit were to overtake the enemy and inflict as much damage as possible. This was on Sunday. That night I heard that the cavalry had come up with the enemy in the vicinity of Williamsburg, and that the infantry were within a half hour's march, rapidly approaching, and would undoubtedly carry the position. Gen. Sumner was in command of the troops ordered to the front. I remained at Yorktown on Sunday, and on Monday morning engaged in arranging for the forwarding of Franklin's division to West Point, and in consultation with the naval commander, as well as other duties incident to my position.

I heard nothing from the front on Monday morning that gave me any idea that there was anything serious involved. I heard nothing from General Sumner. The first intimation I had that there was anything at all serious was from Governor Sprague, who came to me at Yorktown and told me that things were not going on well in front. This was, I think, about noon; it may have been half an hour or an hour one way or the other. He told me that things were not going well, and that my presence in front was necessary. As soon as I heard that I took a boat, went down to camp where my horses were, and immediately left for the front, meeting on the way the Prince de Joinville, and an aid of General Sumner, who had been sent back to hurry me up. Up to this time I had had no information from General Sumner or any one in command, that there was anything at all serious in front. I arrived on the ground, I should think, about an hour or an hour and a half before dark. I acquainted myself, as rapidly as possible, with the state of affairs, and immediately ordered reinforcements to General Hancock, who was heavily engaged when I arrived, and I endeavored to communicate with General Heintzelman, who was on the left of our position. I was told that it was impossible to communicate directly with our left under General Heintzelman. I sent an officer, Capt. Alexander, with a company to endeavor to open communication with General Heintzelman, that I might learn the state of affairs there. He returned after dark with the information that it was impracticable to get through the marsh. I tnen went round some seven or eight miles, by way of the rear, to communicate.

During the night I heard from General Heintzelman that Hooker's division had been badly cut up, and could not be relied upon for very heavy work in the morning; that Kearney's division, although it had suffered severely, could be fully relied upon to hold its own; and that no advance could be made in that quarter without having reinforcements.

I felt satisfied, from what I knew of Hancock's position, that the battle was won; that he had occupied the decisive point, and gained possession of a portion of the enemy's line; and that they must make a night retreat or we would have greatly the advantage of them in the morning. So fully was I satisfied of that, that I countermanded orders that I had given in the afternoon, for the advance of Richardson's and Sedgwick's divisions to the front and sent them back to Yorktown to go by water; feeling sure that the battle was won." Here is the whole story, uncontradicted by any reliable testimony. The committee make no open and direct attack upon General McClellan for failure of duty in pursuing the enemy to Williamsburg, but they make insinuations by which they mean to leave an impression that he was remiss in duty. The most salient of these indirect attacks are italicised by the Tribune in his edition of the report. The passages thus made prominent are these: "Gen. McClellan remained behind in Yorktown to superintend the sending of two divisions up the York River to West Point." * * "He" (Gov. Sprague) "testifies that when Gen. McClellan was told the condition of affairs at the front, he remarked that he had supposed 'those in front could attend to that little matter.'" The report of the committee adds: "After some time General McClellan started from Yorktown, and reached the vicinity of Williamsburg about 5 o'clock in the afternoon."

The charges are, then: 1. General McClellan remained behind, &c. The committee mean to imply that he ought to have been in front, facing the danger. 2, Upon being informed of the collision at Williamsburg, he made light of it; and 3. He was slow, when informed there was trouble in front, in giving relief.

1. General McClellan, instead of going himself in pursuit of the retreating enemy, sent several of his corps commanders, men of high military reputation, and of experience, while he remained at Yorktown to dispatch a body of troops by water to intercept the retreat of the enemy, by getting between him and Richmond. Before the evacuation of Yorktown it was impracticable for our naval force to go up York River. At a narrow pass in this river, between Yorktown and Gloucester Point, there were very formidable fortifications and armaments on both sides—on the side of Yorktown and on the side of Gloucester Point; these were under the control of the enemy before the evacuation. If either of these positions was in our hands the obstacle in the way of our naval operations up York River would have been removed. The original purpose was that McDowell's force should take Gloucester Point, when Yorktown could not have failed to be evacuated, and a free passage to Richmond made for our army not only by land, up the Peninsula, but also up the York River. The execution of this purpose having been defeated, as we have seen, the next thing to be done was to gain the works on the Yorktown side, and the same result would have been brought about. After the evacuation York River was unobstructed, and now it became a very desirable object to embark a force at Yorktown, send it up York River to West Point, and thus intercept the retreat of the enemy to Richmond. For this purpose it became necessary to make suitable arrangements with the naval commander, and get the troops on board and under way. McClellan judged that the best interests of the service required him to remain, and personally supervise the accomplishment of this work, for there were difficulties in the way which required to be removed. Who can question the soundness of this decision? Yet this prevented the general from being at or near Williamsburg when an actual collision occurred. When he was sent for, and apprised of the danger, he went promptly. But because a collision did occur—and it would not have occurred if Gen. Stoneman had been more tardy in pursuit—and because there was danger which General McClellan was not present to share, the committee most unfairly, most unmanfully, think a proper opportunity is afforded, which they are prompt to improve, to insinuate that the general shrinks at the prospect of danger, and is deficient in personal courage. I say an "insinuation" is made; it would have been imprudent, probably unsafe, for the committee to make a direct charge of cowardice; they therefore find it convenient to deal in insinuations; "unsafe," not that Gen. McClellan would have noticed it, but there are probably many brave men in the army less discreet, exercising less self-control than the general, who might have resented it by chastising the authors of such a charge. Similar insinuations are made in other parts of the committee's report, intended to wound the sensibilities of a soldier, which shall be noticed hereafter.

The committee seem to think that the commander-in-chief of 100,000 men can best prove his fitness for his high position by rushing into danger, and exposing his own life; the Joint Committee of Congress need instruction on this point, and any corporal in the army could give them that instruction.

2 The general "made light of it." That expression is incorporated in the report, being extracted from the testimony of Governor Sprague, who testifies: "With one orderly I left the advance at 12 o'clock to go to Yorktown and communicate the condition of affairs to General McClellan, who was supposed to be at Yorktown, though no communication had been received from him since early the day before. I reached Yorktown in about one hour and a half, and found General McClellan with General Fitz John Porter and General Franklin. I communicated to him the condition of affairs at the front, and urged him to go up there at once. His reply was that he thought they could take care of this little matter, but he said he would immediately leave for the front." "I afterwards ascertained that General McClellan arrived at the front about five o'clock."

This testimony of Governor Sprague was thought worthy of being incorporated in the report, and of being made prominent in the Tribune's edition, and yet the committee could hardly have relied on the accuracy of the witness Sprague, for according to his testimony the general must have been with the army in five hours after he, Sprague, left Williamsburg, a distance of twelve miles, and traveled over a road almost impassable. Yet the committee say, "after some time Gen. McClellan started from Yorktown, &c." Yet it did so happen that after the general had arrived at Williamsburg, reinforcements were sent in the proper direction, order and confidence were restored. He saw at once that the enemy had been whipped, and immediately ordered several generals to return at once to Yorktown and embark with Franklin. This will do for Williamsburg.

FROM WILLIAMSBURG TO CHICKAHOMINY.

It has been shown in these papers that General McClellan would have taken Richmond a year ago, if he had been permitted to execute the purposes he had formed with the concurrence of the Administration. This is not denied by the opponents of Gen. McClellan; but they say, first, that there were good grounds for the withholding of McDowell's command, and, secondly, that, without the aid of this command, there were several opportunities for taking Richmond, which the general failed to improve. Among other opportunities neglected was that which occurred immediately after the battle at Williamsburg, when, it is said, our army could have entered Richmond.

The first of these grounds has been replied to. I now come to the second, which shall be examined in the light of the testimony and contemporaneous history, with as much candor, fairness and impartiality as I can exercise.

After describing the battle of Williamsburg, in which he bore a conspicuous part, General Hooker is asked by the committee this question: "Is it your judgment that you could have gone into Richmond then?" To which he answers: "I think we could have moved right on, and got into Richmond by the second day after that battle without another gun being fired." General Keys is asked: "Do you know why there was not an immediate and general pursuit of the enemy after the battle?" He replied: "I do not." Again: "In your judgment, as a military man, should or should not there have been an immediate pursuit?" Answer—"My opinion, as a military man, is that the most vigorous and immediate pursuit should have been made after the battle of Williamsburgh." Question—"In your judgment, if an immediate and vigorous pursuit had been made, what would have been the result?" Answer—"If an immediate and vigorous pursuit of the enemy had been made, I think we should have overtaken portions of his troops, and have been able to capture such baggage as he took with him. I think also it would have hastened our arrival in the neighborhood of Richmond, and we should have been able to attack the enemy before he had made the preparations for defence and obtained the reinforcements which our delay gave him an opportunity of doing."

General McClellan testifies that it is about fifty miles from Williamsburg to the Chickahominy, that is to New Bridge. He is then asked: "It has been stated that some two weeks were occupied in the movement from Williamsburgh to the Chickahoiminy; will you explain the reason for that?" Answer—"I do not remember the exact time; I can only say that we were very much delayed after the affair at Williamsburg by the condition of the roads, and the diffiulty in bringing up supplies. We had a great deal of trouble of that kind before reaching the Chickahominy. I think the movemeht was made as rapidly as possible under the circumstances." Question—"After leaving Williamsburg you met with no serious resistance from the enemy until after crossing of Bottom's Bridge, did you?" Answer—"Merely cavalry affairs. There were some sharp cavalry affairs, but no resistance in large force."

The committee say in their report: "Several of the generals testify that, had the enemy been promptly followed up after the battle of Williamsburg, they could be followed into Richmond—one of them says without firing a gun. Gen. McClellan says that the roads were so bad in consequence of the rains, that it was impracticable to make a vigorous pursuit."

All the testimony bearing upon the point under review, and the reference of the committee to the same, is here transcribed. General McClellan is at issue with Generals Hooker and Keyes, and the committee evidently favor the testimony against McClellan. I hope my readers will patiently follow me while I investigate the question—is the bias of the committee in the right direction?

It is true that the roads were bad in consequence of the rains, and that made it impracticable to pursue the enemy vigorously. On the night when the rebels evacuated Williamsburg, Prince de Joinville says "that the rain was falling in torrents," and, before that time, and ever since the leaving of Yorktown, there had been copious rains. On the night before the battle at Williamsburg, General Hooker says "that the roads had become so very muddy—raining very hard—the mud was knee-deep, and my men had become so fatigued that I halted right in the road, intending to renew the march at the dawn of day in the morning." But the condition of the roads was not the only cause why General McClellan could not proceed on the morning after the battle. He says he was prevented "by the condition of the roads, and the difficulty in bringing up supplies." It will be remembered that the base of supplies for our army was Yorktown, and the base of supplies for the rebel army was Richmond.

We were marching from our base of supplies, and the enemy was marching to his base of supplies. Our army left Yorktown in great haste to pursue the retreating enemy; it took as small an amount of provisions and ammunition as conld be conveniently transported in a rapid march—the roads being in a wretched condition for travel. General Casey testifies: "On the morning of the 4th of May, when there was some evidence that the enemy was about evacuating their lines, I was ordered at a half hour's notice to go to the river and leave everything behind—tents, blankets, knapsacks and everything. When I got there the enemy had evacuated their works. I then intended to send back for the tents, blankets and knapsacks for my men. But I got a peremptory order from General Sumner to push on after the enemy, without waiting for anything. The consequence was that my division—a great many of them—were without blankets and knapsacks for severl weeks. It was raining terribly all the time, and the consequence was that I lost a great many men from that exposure, as they were obliged to lie down in the mud, exposed to the rain, without any protection whatever." Gov. Sprague says: "We had started off to Yorktown so hurriedly that no preparations for rations had been made, and many of the regiments had nothing to eat." Gen. Heintzelman says: "Most of the troops were out of ammunition." Heintzelman, as I am informed, reported on the 5th of May that all his provisions would be exhausted that night, and that Hookers's and Kearney's commands were so much exhausted and injured by the contest as not to be reliable for service the next morning. Kearney's ammunition and provisions were mainly exhausted. These being the facts, who can fail to see that it was utterly impracticable to pursue the enemy immediately after the battle of Williamsburg. On the 4th of May about 45,000 troops started from Yorktown by land in great haste to pursue a retreating enemy, carrying with them such ammunition and supplies only as could be carried on a rapid march. Generals Franklin, Sedgwick and Porter went up the York River with their commands to West Point, at which place Franklin with his 11,000 troops arrived on the evening of the 6th and the morning of the 7th of May. After the retreat from Williamsburg, Johnson, the rebel commander, marched rapidly to West Point to prevent the landing of Franklin's command before Sedgwick and Porter should arrive with their commands. It must be obvious that in this condition of things Gen. McClellan could not march upon Richmond until he had established a base of supplies nearer to Richmond than Yorktown, and brought up his commissary stores asd ammunition for the supply of his army to such base of operations. These supplies had to be brought up the York River, and landed at Elton, on the side of the Pamunkey River opposite West Point. Elton was the first temporary depot for these supplies, and the next temporary depot was Cumberland, situated on the Pumunkey about fifteen miles from West Point, while the main base of supplies was finally fixed at White House on the Pamunkey River, where the railroad from West Point to Richmond crosses the Pumnnkey, and about thirty miles from Richmond. To make these necessary arrangements required all the time that was taken to prepare the Army of the Potomac to proceed on its march to the Chickahominy.

The testimony, therefore, of Generals Hooker and Keyes is very loose and unreliable. The Prince de Joinville, who has given to Europe and the world the most clear, accurate and soldierlike history of the campaign on the Peninsula that has yet appeared, after describing the capture of Williamsburg, proceeds:—"The mass of Federal troops was detained by the necessity of waiting for provisions from Yorktown, the arrival of which was retarded by the state of the roads. They came at last, and as the fine weather dried the roads up very fast, a two days' march brought us up with the corps which had disembarked and established a depot at the head of York River. The whole army was collected around this point, and then resumed its march to Richmond, along the Pumunkey, a navigable affluent of the York.

How evident therefore it is that the testimony of Hooker is utterly incredible, when he says, "I think we could have moved right on and got into Richmond the second day after the battle without another gun being fired." Fifty miles' march from Williamsburg to the Chickahominy in two days, the roads being in the worst condition imaginable for travel, the army being without food, short of ammunition, and a portion of it exhausted after severe fighting—who can believe such a witness? But this is the opinion of General Hooker—the professional opinion—and all distinguished men of his profession acquainted with the character of General McClellan will put as much confidence in this opinion as in that other opinion which he has uttered under oath: "I do not hesitate to say that the failure of the Peninsula campaign is to be attributed to the want of generalship on the part of our commander." While that record remains, General Joseph Hooker will never have the confidence of the Army of the Potomac, for that army will never believe that he can be a safe and reliable leader "who bears false witness against his neighbor." This general, whom the Prince de Joinville styled "an admirable soldier," has, since he gave his testimony against General McClellan, been placed at the head of a larger army than that commanded by McClellan on the Peninsula—an army well clad, well supplied, and well appointed in every respect, and he has had the opportunity of meeting the enemy; how he improved that opportunity the country knows, the world knows, and especially do the officers and soldiers who fought under him know; they are capable of instituting a comparison between him and the general whom he has defamed, and I greatly err if that general will shrink from the comparison.

Gen. McClellan is not the only military chief who has been assailed in the testimony of Hooker, who says "that Gen. Sumner was in command (at Williamsburg) with a large force, certainly not less than 30,000 men. He could have advanced through the line of defences across the Peninsula at Williamsburg without losing ten men. The enemy could not fire for I had him in a vice. I wanted him to advance, and until three o'clock of that day I expected he would advance and march through the line held by the enemy, and go to picking up prisoners. During this time my own troops were engaged with not less than three or four times my number. Gen. Kearney, who was the last of all the army to leave Yorktown—except Porter's division, which was left to garrison Yorktown—was the first to come to my assistance. If General Sumner had advanced, the rebellion would have been buried there. He did not advance at all! Here, then, it would seem that that veteran General Sumner lost a glorious opportunity to finish the rebellion." But it happens that the old general was there before the committee also to testify. He says that none of his own corps were there. It was ten miles in the rear. He was in command there by virtue of his seniority in rank. He occupied the centre. Question by Mr. Odell—"What was the number of troops under your command at the centre?" Answer—"My impression now is that before General Peck arrived there was not to exceed a brigade and a half of infantry at that point, or about two-thirds of Smith's division. There was a large body of cavalry there, but I did not look upon them as available troops to hold that point against an attack from the woods." Question.—"About how many men were there in that brigade and a half?" Answer.—"I do not think there could have been to exceed 3,000 men; all the rest of the forces under my control were in the rear, coming up." It will be seen that the number of troops under Gen. Sumner's command differs from the statement of Gen. Hooker as three to thirty. General Sumner further testifies: "An application was made to me for reinforcements for Gen. Hooker; I think I complied with the application by sending my staff officers to the rear to hurry up the troops from the rear. I did not deem it safe to send any more troops from the centre, and the result showed that it was fortunate I had not done so. I allude to the attack made by the enemy in the afternoon at the centre." Thus much for Gen. Hooker, the present commander of the army of the Potomac.

But what shall be said of Gen. Keyes? He has a reputation in the army differing widely from that of Gen. Hooker; he is regarded as a reliable man—how could this general give the professional opinion that "the most vigorous and immediate pursuit should have been made after the battle of Williamsburg?" How could that distinguished general have answered the following questions if they had been put: Was it practicable for the army to have moved when their provisions were exhausted? When they were short of ammunition, to have moved at all before a base of supplies was established? From the facts above stated, all of which are of the most reliable character, it will be seen how Gen. Keyes must have answered these interrogatories if they had been put to him. It is melancholy to think that men who never lack courage on the field of battle should fail to speak their honest convictions when they have reason to suppose that the utterance of undisguised truth will give offence to those in power. We have seen a melancholy exemplification of this truth in the case of General Barnard, and we fear a similar illustration is exhibited in the case of General Keyes; he knew what kind of testimony the committee wanted. General Keyes gave this testimony, it will be recollected, when Gen. McClellan was no longer at the head of an army, but supposed to be in disgrace. He was examined on the 26th March, 1863. We think there is some foundation for the fear above expressed—not as to the physical courage of General Keyes, for he is no coward, but as to the higher quality of moral courage, in the following statement: On the 16th of April, 1862, General Keyes sent a report, from which we have before quoted, to the Assistant Adjutant General of the Army of the Potomac. We take the following extract from this report: "I was thus enabled in the first day to comprehend with tolerable clearness the position of the enemy from a short distance above Lee's Mills down to James River. He is in a strongly fortified position behind Warwick River, the fords in which have been destroyed by dams, and the approaches to which are through dense forests, swamps and marshes. No part of his line, as far as discovered, can be taken by assault without an enormous waste of life." Other quotations have been given from General Keyes in former numbers.

This was the opinion of General Keyes, officially expressed, when he was with the army before the lines at Yorktown; but before the committee, after General McClellan was relieved of his command, he says, among other things, "My impression now is, that if the whole army had been pressed forward we could have found a point to break through But I give this simply as my impression." After stating that Yorktown was very strongly defended, and if we made an assault on it we should have met with severe loss, he says: "I will not say if we had pressed on immediately on arriving in front of their lines, we might not have found a point where we could have broken the line, and then have invested Yorktown on two sides, when the fall of it, of course, would have been hastened. It is my opinion that if we had pressed on rapidly when we first arrived, we might have found a point through which we could have broken."

Thus it will be seen that the general makes a distinction between Yorktown proper and the lines of the enemy on the Warwick, extending to James River. He was not before Yorktown with his command, but on the lines, and it is as to the practicability of assaulting the lines that he speaks in the report above referred to.

BEFORE RICHMOND.

These numbers are resumed after an interim of intense public anxiety, and, I may add, of great joy, in which the popular mind and feeling have been too much engrossed to give any attention to historical events. The Army of the Potomac, after sad experience at Fredericksburg, and a signal and most important victory at Gettysburg, is now where it was after the not less important victory at Antietam, when General McClellan was relieved of his command. Had the Administration not seen fit to remove General McClellan, the officers of the Army of the Potomac, with almost entire unanimity, always excepting Major General Joseph Hooker, would, it is believed, bear testimony that in their judgment our army would not have been defeated in Virginia on the two occasions referred to, and, certainly, the rebel army of General Lee would not have ventured a second invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania. That invasion has, however, been made, attended with immense destruction and loss of property, the most frightful alarm of peaceable citizens, and very serious loss of life. Shall there be no day of reckoning for these things? We shall see when the ballot boxes receive the votes of the American people. Until then let us be patient, and be especially careful that no previous irregularities change the character of the issue then to be decided.

When the enemy retreated from Williamsburg he returned to his capital and his base of supplies. Our army had not established a base of supplies between Yorktown and Richmond. It requires not a military man to say that a large army cannot carry on its proper operations, nay, tnat it cannot exist, without being in near and easy communication with its depot of daily food, ammunition, and other indispensable supplies. The capital of the enemy was fortified; before General McClellan pursued the enemy to his capital with a view to assault it, he must of course establish a base of supplies for his own army, and store it with the necessary articles of consumption. That base of supplies was established at the White House, on the Pamunkey River, a stream rising in a region of country north of Richmond, and discharging its waters in the Charles River at West Point. The Pamunkey River is navigable from the Charles to the White House, so that this base of supplies was accessible by water. The White House, too, was in direct communication with Richmond by a railroad running from West Point to that capital. So soon as this base of supplies was fixed and stored, General McClellan moved his army on Richmond. General McClellan was asked before the committee—Question. It has been stated that some two weeks were occupied in the movement from Williamsburg to the Chickahominy; will you explain the reason for that? Answer. I do not remember the exact time; I can only say we were very much delayed after the affair at Williamsburg by the condition of the roads and the difficulty in bringing up supplies. We had a great deal of trouble of that kind before reaching the Chickahominy. I think the movement was made as rapidly as possible under the circumstances.

This answer cannot fail to satisfy all reasonable persons. The enemy retreated to Richmond; he could have entered his fortified capital had he chose to do so, and certainly General McClellan could not divine whether he would enter or not. It was a reasonable supposition that he would. What defense the enemy could have made behind his fortifications at Richmond is not known to this day; we never assaulted those fortifications, and have no certain knowledge of their construction or their strength, But this we know—the city of Richmond is capable, from its position and surroundings, of being fortified so as to repel the assault of an invading army. For one whole year before, the enemy was apprised of our intention to capture Richmond, and during all that time he was laying out and constructing fortifications to resist an assault. He had officers skilled in the art of engineering aud the art of defence. These facts are certainly known. What we should have found Richmond if we had attempted an assault can only be conjectured; but the probability is that we should have been required to operate by siege, as was done at Yorktown and at Vicksburg, and in both instances successfully, one without loss, and the other at a great sacrifice of life. We say it is probable we should have besieged it, because it is certain the rebel force behind the fortifications exceeded in number our troops in front of them. This fact is capable of proof, and I call upon the opponents of General McClellan to consider it, to ponder it, and then confess their error in assailing his conduct and his character.

General Barnard testified before the committee as follows: "No less an authority than Napoleon says that, aided by fortifications, 50,000 men, and 3,000 artillerymen can defend a capital against 300,000 men, and he asserts the necessity of fortifying all national capitals." What reply can you make to these facts, gentlemen? Can you join the President of the United States and others in censuring General McClellan for calling for reinforcements?

Had the Chickahominy and the margins of that river been in their usual condition, our army could have crossed that stream and followed the enemy as near to Richmond as it would have been safe to approach his fortifications. But the Chickahominy was not in its usual condition, nor was it in the condition it was when Gen. McClellan began to change his base of operations. Thus, this stream is described with professional accuracy in the testimony of General Barnard: "A word is proper here respecting the Chickahominy, which, at the season we struck it, was one of the most formidable obstacles that could be opposed to the advance of our army—an obstacle to which an ordinary river, though it be of considerable magnitude, is comparatively slight. The Chickahominy, considered as a military obstacle, consists of a stream of no great value, a swamp, and bottom lands. The stream flows through a belt of heavily timbered swamp, which averages three or four hundred yards wide. A few hundred yards below New Bridge is a short length of the stream not margined by swamp timber; but everywhere else between New and Bottom's Bridges the belt of swamp timber is continuous and wide. The tops of the trees rise just about to the level of the crests of the high lands bordering the bottom, thus perfectly screening from view the bottom lands and slopes of the high lands on the enemy's side. The disappearance, in the place indicated of swamp timber near New Bridge, and the dwindling away of the same at some points above the bridge to isolated trees, gave us some glimpse of the enemy's side near this point. Through this belt of swamp the stream flows sometimes in a single channel, more frequently divided into several; and when but a foot or two above its summer level, overspreads the whole swamp." * * * "It was currently reported at the time of our arrival that the stream was nowhere fordable." * * * "Although it was thus shown that the stream was no obstacle for infantry, the swamp and the bottom lands were impracticable to cavalry and artillery. It was necessary to provide bridges, and, except at the site of the New Bridge, to corduroy a certain length of road on each margin."

Now at this distance of time, when space has been given for cool reflection, it is hoped that General McClellan will be pardoned by his enemies for the condition in which he found the Chickahominy, and the swamps and submerged lands consequent upon that condition. It has been reproachfully charged by a member of the War Committee, on the floor of the Senate, long before the report of that committee was made, that we went to digging. "We found the worst swamp there was between Richmond and Williamsburg, and sat right down in the centre of it and went to digging." Who was it that made the swamp? How came it in the way of our army? Could a major general, in full command, have prevented it by a general order? "Who hath divided a water course for the overflowing of water, or a way for the lightning or the thunder? Hath the rain a father, or who hath begotten the drops of dew?" There was indeed a "swamp" and more than a swamp, as we have seen, a complete submersion of a most formidable character. This overflow was so sudden and unexpected that some persons conjectured that sluices had been cut above Richmond, and water let in from other sources to increase the volume of the stream. The rebels said it was an interposition of Divine Providence to save their capital. Certain it is that General McClellan had no power to prevent this overflow. Nor ought the general to be censured with extreme severity by his radical fellow-citizens, because there went up from these surcharged swamps a miasm which poisoned the atmosphere and caused sickness in the camps. The general could not help it; all he could do was to remain at his post, faithful in the discharge of duty, and inhale the same poisoned atmosphere inhaled by those under his command. He was not censured by the privates in the ranks of his army, nor by the officers either, until some of them were called to swear before the War Committee. The army of the Potomac at that time was composed of men capable of judging of the qualifications and the merits of their commanders. That army did not censure their chief commander, but they loved him. The most affecting anecdote I ever heard was related to me by a member of the N. Y. 7th regiment. This regiment was stationed for three months in the summer of 1862 in Baltimore. It was a part of their duty to assist the wounded soldiers coming daily from the Army of the Potomac to land, and aid them to the hospitals, or in the further prosecution of their journey. These wounded and sick soldiers expressed an ardent attachment for General McClellan. One young man, very feeble, was assisted to land by the person who related to me the anecdote; he summoned up his remaining strength, raised his head, rested on his elbow, cheered for General McClellan, and died.

General Howard, an educated and accomplished soldier, a graduate of West Point, and afterwards a professor in that celebrated institution, made a speech to his fellow-citizens in Portland, Maine, from which the following is an extract:

"My friends, much has been said in regard to the general intrusted with the command there—much adulation and much abuse. I believe in my heart that General McClellan is worthy to be trusted. You can trust him, but you must submerge political parties, however, in the good of the country. You sent me forth to one of your institutions, without any special politics except love of country. This war is educating us up to that standard of patriotism. When we shall have shed a little more blood, we shall learn to live more in accordance with the spirit of our fathers. I know that I am no worshipper of men. I do not believe that General McClellan has passed through the campaign thus far without a mistake, but for one I trust him and urge you to. Trust him, not as a god, but as a general. He has shown at every movement great ability and caution; too much so, perhaps, for some who are inclined to doubt him; but whether so or not is to be tested by results. I hope we don't need the instruction of another Bull Run to teach us to be cautious. It is best to be. The old men say so, and when you find a young man combining ability with caution, you may trust him, for you have there the sprightliness of youth combined with the considerotian and reflection of age."

The general, at the time of making that speech, had lost an arm in one of the battles before Richmond. He has since done distinguished service in the field at Chancellorsville and at Gettysburg. He adds to his high military qualifications the character of a sincere and enlightened Christian. He was not called to testify before the War Committee.

[The previous matter was contained in eleven numbers, which through inadvertance, have been run together. Hereafter we shall give the numbers as in the original publications.]

NO. XII.

We have seen what was the condition of the Chickahominy on the arrival of our army at the stream and the formidable obstacles thereby interposed to our military operations. General McClellan cannot, of course, be responsible for this condition of things; he could not use his artillery or his cavalry, as we have seen by the testimony of General Barnard. It was impossible in that condition of the ground to make any aggressive demonstrations upon Richmond; before those were attempted, as he was compelled to wait until the waters which had swelled the streams and saturated the bottom land on its borders, should subside, and the ground become dry and hard. In the mean time all he could do was to prepare to repel assaults on his own level before Richmond by the rebel forces operating on their own grounds. But it was certain that General McClellan needed reinforcements, and he had not yet despaired of being joined by McDowell's forces collected at Fredericksburg. "They covered nothing at this place," says the Prince de Joinville, and were so notoriously useless to the Federal cause, that in the Confederate journals they were spoken of as the "fifth wheel of the coach." The Prince proceeds: "It was known that McDowell desired ardently to give the lie to these railleries by bringing at the decisive moment, his assistance to the cause of the Union. Accordingly, McClellan had no sooner arrived before Richmond than he undertook to discover what he had to hope for from this quarter. No official advices either from Washington or from Fredericksburg had informed him of McDowell's presence at that point, but rumor and probability agreed so well in placing him there that the General-in-Chief resolved to make an attempt to establish a communication with him. On the night of the 26th (May 1862) "he sent forward General Porter's division, with a few squadrons of cavalry, in a furious storm to Hanover Court House, a village about twenty miles north of Richmond, where the railway to Fredericksburg crosses the Pamunkey. The troops of Porter moved rapidly, and about mid-day on the 27th came upon the hostile division of Branch at Hanover Court House. This they assailed with vigor, dispersed it, and took one of its guns. Assailed in their turn by Confederate troops who had suffered them to pass by the woods where they lay hidden, turned on their new enemies and scattered them also. This brilliant affair cost the Federals 400 men, and left General Porter in possession of a cannon, of 500 prisoners, and of two bridges, one on the Fredericksburg, and one on the Virginia Central Railroad. The advance guard of McDowell was then at Bowling Green, fifteen miles from that of Porter. It needed only an effort of will; the two armies were united, and the fall of Richmond certain! Alas! this effort was not made. I cannot recall those fatal moments without a real sinking of the heart. Seated in an orchard in the bivouac of Porter, amid the joyous excitement which followed a successful combat, I saw the Fifth Cavalry bring in whole companies of Confederate prisoners, with arms and baggage, their officers at their head.' May I be pardoned so far to digress as to say, which it has no doubt, greatly pained the foreign prince to hear, that his friend Porter, has been stripped of his bivouac, and turned out upon the world, with every mark of disgrace that his government could stamp upon him; but the prince and the world may rest assured that these marks shall be effaced from a character as radiant of military honors as any in his native land, by a grateful country, and the patriotic soldier shall yet be restored to the rank of which he has been unjustly deprived. This opinion and prediction I venture after a careful study of the official record of General Porter's trial.

This battle at Hanover Court House has been adverted to in those numbers, but cannot properly be omitted here in describing the progress of the campaign in chronological order, although liable to the charge of repetition. I shall notice the battles before Richmond in future numbers.

NO. XIII.

FAIR OAKS.

There can be no just judgment formed of the measures adopted and executed by General McClellan in the conduct of his campaigns, except by consideriug them first in their general plan, and then examining them in detail. The general outline of his operations, as dictated by himself alone, or as agreed upon in council with others, shall be fairly and fully stated; for the present, let every day's work be csrutinized, and the questions put be fairly answered,—What could the general have done to-day which he did not do? What has he left undone to-day which he might have done?

In answering these questions it is not only right but indispensable that the unforeseen and natural obstacles interposed in the way of his operations should be duly regarded. For instance, who could have foreseen, what human power could have prevented the copious and unexpected showers of rain which poured down and swelled the Chickahominy, and submerged the margins of this stream—a wide area of bottom land—rendering the ground unfit for military movements? In addition to this natural occurrence, the general was met by a military array of the most formidable character. These were the forces to be conquered, and the eye of the fair critic must be kept constantly upon them, as well as upon the force subject to our own command.

It has been shown that the junction of McDowell had been prevented "at the moment," says the Prince de Joinville, "when the junction would have been decisive of the campaign." "Henceforth," adds the Prince, "the army of the Potomac could only rely upon itself. No time was to be lost before acting, for every day augmented the disproportion between the forces of the adversaries, and it was to be feared the Federals encamped amid the marshes of the Chickahominy would suffer severely from the great heats now setting in. We had been for some days face to face. The Federal advance was but five miles distant from Richmond. Skirmishes were of daily occurrence, and with the feelings on both sides, a general action was inevitable. Gen. McClellan waited for two things before making the attack. He waited for the roads, which the rain had swamped, to become solid and practicable for his artillery, and for the completion of the numerous bridges which he was throwing over the Chickahominy." The character of the localities, the impossibility of quitting the railway by which the army was supplied, and the necessity of keeping on his guard against any attempt of the enemy to turn his position, had forced the general to divide his troops into two wings, on the opposite banks of the river. It was consequently most important to be able to mass them rapidly, either on the right bank for an offensive movement against Richmond, or on the left bank against any attempt to turn the position. Here it will be seen that the side of the stream towards Richmond is called the right bank, while the opposite side is called the left bank. "The danger of turning the position was much to be feared, for the Confederates had retained possession of several bridges on the upper Chickahominy, which would permit them to occupy the excellent positions that are to be found on the left bank, just so soon as the Northern army should abandon these positions. To make this more plain, the Confederates could cross the stream in its upper part, and come down and get between our forces on the right, and our base of supplies, the White House, if we failed to guard the left bank with a sufficient force to intercept such a movement. In this way they would have shut us up upon the right bank blockaded, starved, and reduced to an extremely critical position. "The roads," says the same intelligent and impartial witness, "were long in drying, the bridges were long in building." "Never have we seen so rainy a season,' said the oldest inhabitant. "Never did we see bridges so difficult to build," said the engineers. The abominable river laughed at all their efforts; too narrow for a bridge of boats, too deep and too muddy for piers; here, a simple brook some ten yards wide flowing between two pieces of quicksand, in which the horses stuck up to their girths, and which offered no bearing; there, divided into a thousand tiny rivulets spread over a surface of three hundred yards, and traversing one of those woody morasses which are peculiar to tropical countries, changing its level and its bed from day to day, the river in its capricious and uncertain sway annulled and undid to-day the labors of yesterday, carried on under a burning sun, and often under the fire of the enemy." These quotations are testimony of unbiased and highly intelligent eye witnesses of what they relate, far beyond the influence of hope or fear of the United States or Confederate Governments. I say "witnesses," for this statement is the result of the joint personal observation of the Prince de Joinville and his two nephews.

In this condition of things what was to be done? The enemy, as we have seen, did not find it necessary to retreat behind the intrenched and fortified works of his capital, but he showed himself on elevated and advantageous positions outside of those works. Thus posted we could not—it was entirely impracticable, in the state of things then existing, for Gen. McClellan to make an offensive demonstration. All he could do was to wait, and safety required that, while waiting, he should fortify his own position to enable him to resist attacks of the enemy. This he did, and the necessity of so fortifying was soon demonstrated, as we shall see.

The left wing of our army had crossed the river at Bottom Bridge, and the right wing remained on the other side to repel a flank movement of the enemy, as has been shown. The left wing proceeded on the railway leading from our base of supplies to Richmond, about half the distance from the river to the capital, to a station called Fair Oaks. A short distance south of the railway, and running in the same general direction, was the country road leading from Williamsburg to Richmond. On this road, south of Fair Oaks, and no great distance therefrom. is a place called Seven Pines. The left wing was formed of four divisions encamped on the Richmond side of the river, along the railway on either side. On the opposite side of the river lay the right wing of the army, consisting of five divisions and the resources. To pass from one end to the other would have made a journey of something like fifteen or twenty miles, but in so passing there was only one bridge to be crossed, and that was Bottom Bridge The distance in a direct line between the extremities of these two wings was short. It was to unite the two arms of our forces that three or four bridges across the river were commenced. One alone was fit for use on 31st May, 1862. To defend the encampments of the left wing, entrenchments and rifle pits were dug at Fair Oaks and Seven Pines. General Heintzelman with his two divisions crossed the Chickahominy at Bottom Bridge on the 25th May. This General says; "The next day I rode to the front and saw how the troops were posted. Engineers were sent over, and were directed to fortify a position about the Seven Pines. In making this forward movement there were frequent skirmishes that did not amount to much. We commenced two or three lines across the road and country there before we finally got located."

The commencement of a series of lines and fortifications furnishes the foundation for the charge brought by Senator Chandler, of Michigan, one of the War Committee, against General McClellan, in the utterance of which this Senator made the Senate Chamber ring on the 16th July, 1862. The charge was: "We found the worst swamp there was between Richmond and Williamsburg, and sat right down in the centre of it and went to digging. We sacrificed thousands and tens of thousands of lives of the bravest troops that ever stood on the face of God's earth, digging in front of the intrenchments and before the whipped army of the rebels." The state of facts which preceded this digging, and rendered it necessary, has been truly and faithfully described in plain prose, and now that the poetic muse of the Michigan Senator has had time to rest after her daring flight, I would ask him—were you authorized to make an attack so gross, and so utterly groundless upon a soldier who was doing what he could in circumstances most trying, to put down the rebellion against his government by all the means of civilized warfare? Was it manly to assail one who could not reply? Whose mouth was closed by the proprieties of his position, as well as by the rules established for the government of that position. Mr. Chandler, you ought to be ashamed of this rude, and, I may add, vulgar assault. All the harm I wish you is that you should be tried and punished at their discretion, by the soldiers from Michigan, so highly eulogized by all who have fought under Major General McClellan.

On the 31st of May, only six days after Gen. Heintzelman had crossed the river, the enemy commenced in large force the attack upon the left wing of our army at Seven Pines; on that day and the next, there was fought at Seven Pines and at Fair Oaks one of the most sanguinary battles of the war, in which our arms repelled a force of the enemy greatly superior in numbers, and were on the last day victorious over that enemy.

In the record contained in a work recently published, entitled "War Pictures from the South, by B. Estvan, Colonel of Cavalry in the Confederate Army," the state of things among the Confederates which led to this attack is thus described: "In the meanwhile disease spread among our (the Confederate) forces to a considerable extent; virulent, obstinate fevers, caused by the miasma of the neighboring swamps, prevailed to a great extent, and the ravages that ensued became so great as to cause much anxiety to General Johntson. The deaths, indeed, were so numerous that sufficient persons could not be procured at Richmond to undertake the task of burying the bodies, which lay exposed in the church-yards by hundreds, spreading pestilence around. The medical faculty anticipated fearful consequences from this state of things, and General Johnston contemplated gloomily the inroads disease was hourly making in his brave army, which almost seemed as if it were doomed to sink altogether into an inglorious grave. In this dire emergency he resolved at all costs to attack his intrenched opponents."

What credit ought to be given to this record others can form their own judgment, I have no opinion to give.

It is not my object to give a description of the battle of Fair Oaks; no charge has been made against General McClellan for the conduct of this battle; it was every way honorable to our arms and the result furnished good ground for rejoicing on our part. But it is charged against General Mc Clellan, that immediately after this battle he lost an opportunity which fairly offered to enter Richmond. The report says: "The officers engaged in that battle who have been examined testify that the army could have pushed right into the city of Richmond with little resistance; that the enemy were very much broken and demoralized, throwing away arms, clothing, &c., that might impede their flight."

This I understand to mean that our soldiers composing the left wing of the army were bound to follow the rebels immediately after the battle of Fair Oaks into Richmond. So understood, the report of the committee is not supported by evidence, as I shall show. General Heintzleman says: "The next morning I learned that the enemy had retreated in great confusion, and on Sunday we gained nearly all the ground we had lost the day before. I sent General Hooker's half division forward, and sent an officer to General Richardson, who commanded one of General Sumner's divisions, and asked him to co operate with us, and find out what the enemy was doing. He saw General Sumner, but he said he could make no reconnoissance without orders from General McClellan. I sent my troops forward, and they got within about four miles of Richmond. They sent back word how far they had got, and I sent word to General McClellan. He ordered me to stop, and fall back on the old line. From information we got from the rebels I had no doubt we might have gone right into Richmond." This is the testimony of an officer engaged in the battle, and it hardly sustains the declaration of the committee. General Sumner, also engaged in the battle, gives no testimony whatever to support the committee's report. General Joseph Hooker is asked by the committee: "Suppose that the next day after the repulse of the enemy at Fair Oaks, General McClellan had brought his whole army across the Chickahominy, and made a vigorous movement upon Richmond, in your judgment, as a military man, what would have been the effect of that movement?" To this question he replies: "That at no time during the whole of the campaign did I feel that we could not go to Richmond." The witness preferred to testify as to his "feeling," and not to give his judgment "as a military man," General Hooker is a wholesale swearer. But the general must be understood as giving it as his opinion that both wings of the army could have entered Richmond: for he is not inquired of as to "one wing.' General Keyes, who took a conspicuous part in the battle of Fair Oaks, and has testified in relation to it with great precision and deliberation says: "It would have been necessary, in my judgment, to have had a portion of the right wing of the army to enable us to follow the enemy into Richmond."

So, then, it is very clear that according to the testimony of the generals engaged in the battle who were examined as witnesses, that it was only by joining the right and left wings of the army that it would have been authorized to pursue the enemy into Richmond after the battle of Fair Oaks.

It will be recollected that there was but one bridge, Bottom Bridge, over which the right wing could have passed, and the wings of this line were so extended, that it would have taken all of two days to enable the right wing to pass over this bridge, and that such a movement if made, would have been attended with danger of having our whole army cut off from its base of supplies. It must be concluded, therefore, that it was impracticable, with the means at our command, to follow the enemy into Richmond after the battle of Fair Oaks. General McClellan's own testimony on this point is very conclusive: "Question. Immediately after the battle of Fair Oaks could you not have advanced on Richmond" If not, why not?" To which the general answers: "I do not think it would have been possible at that time to have taken our artillery with us. The result of which, independent of all other considerations, would have been to have brought us in front of the enemy's works at Richmond, without artillery, where they had heavy guns. That and the condition of the bridges were the principal reasons for not advancing at that time."

Ought not the committee to have been satisfied with that answer, especially as they failed in embarassing the general by the next question they put, which was: "The enemy retired, after taking with them their artillery, after their defeat, did they not?" A very adroit question this; but the general was too used to strategy to be caught; he therefore defeats the object of the committee by telling the simple truth in the most artless manner: "Answer. They had very few guns in action. I am not sure they had any guns. It was on their part almost entirely an infantry affair." I have done with Fair Oaks.

GROSS INJUSTICE OF THE COMMITTEE.

The Tribune edition of the committee report italicizes the following sentence: "Gen. McClellan was with the main part of the army on the left bank of the Chickahominy. After the fighting was over he came across to the right bank of the river."

Questions like the following were put to the witnesses examined by the committee.

Question—Where was Gen. McClellan during the fight at Williamsburg?

Answer—He remained at the camp near Yorktown.

Question—How far was that from the field of battle?

Question—Why was not the commanding general nearer at hand then?

Question—To General Sumner—Where was General McClellan during those battles? (Seven Pines and Fair Oaks.)

Question—Where was General McClellan during your second fight at Malvern?

The committee was appointed to inquire into "the conduct of the war." Questions like those quoted in respect to battles where success crowned our arms, and where, of course, the conduct of the war had been fully and satisfactorily shown, clearly manifest the intention of the committee to inquire into the conduct of General McClellan—to put him on trial. Senator Chandler's speech, already quoted, makes this intention still more palpable. Now, I know not but a committee might have been appointed by both Houses of Congress to inquire into the conduct of General McClellan or of any other officer in the army, and that such committee would not have been competent to pursue such an investigation. But it is clear that a committee thus constituted would, though not nominally, but really, have been in the nature of a judicial tribunal—a Court of Inquiry at least. Before a committee, or any tribunal of this character, the party whose conduct and character were subjects of investigation, ought to have a hearing, or, at least, to indicate the names of persons to be called as witnesses on his behalf. This seems to me a plain requirement, according to all fair and honorable proceedings. The report of such a committee against a general in the army would, in the eyes of many, of most persons, be regarded as a conviction, and popular condemnation would follow as an almost necessary consequence. Nothing more unjust can be well conceived than such a condemnation upon exparte testimony, without allowing the party most interested an opportunity of defending himself.

Now let us see what course was actually pursued by this committee. They called what persons they chose as witnesses, and they omitted to call such persons as they chose to exclude. The committee did not call Major General Fitz John Porter, who was as active and efficient before Yorktown and in the battles before Richmond as any general in the army. General Howard, as we have before shown, was not called; nor Generals Meagher and Sickles, very intelligent and highly educated gentlemen, all of whom had personal acquaintance with the doings of our army on the Peninsula. Why were they not called? They had all expressed publicly their high admiration of Gen. McClellan. General McClellan himself was examined. If the committee really desired to know why this leader of the army did not personally mingle in the fights of his troops, or either of them, why was not the general himself questioned? Can it be doubted that he would have given a reason satisfactory to all military men. Very lately I met an officer of the American army whom I first knew when he was a mere youth of great promise in the celebrated academy at Jamaica, Long Island, and who has been in the military service of his government nearly fifty years, and, as a thoroughly educated military officer, has no superior in the country, if he has in the world, and he volunteered the declaration to me that in every situation in which he had been placed, General McClellan had done as well as he could, and that was as well as any other man could have done. I would give more for that piece of testimony, coming as it did from a gentleman of stainless integrity, and undoubted moral as well as physical courage, than for as many reports as the "War Committee" could write.

SUMMARY REVIEW.

It has been shown that General McClellan did right in not attempting to carry Yorktown by assault before he had laid siege to it, and that after the siege operations were completed, the post was evacuated without waiting for an assault. It has been shown that when the enemy evacuated he was pursued with great promptness and rapidity until he reached his next fortified position at Williamsburg, and that, after a short but severe conflict there, he was compelled to retreat in all haste to his capital. It has also been shown that as soon as General McClellan had taken sufficient time to establish a base of supplies at the White House, he followed his retreating foe to the Chickahominy and beyond it, that he attacked and captured Hanover Court House, but failed, by no fault of his own, to form a junction with McDowell's command at the latter place; that he fought the battles of Seven Pines and Fair Oaks, and repulsed the enemy in force vastly superior to his own on the second day of the fight, and that he was not prepared after these contests to enter Richmond for several reasons, and especially because he could not move his artillery against the fortifications of that capital.

Since the appearance of my article on "Yorktown" my attention has been directed to certain passages contained in a recent publication, entitled "The First Year of the War, by Edward A. Pollard," printed in Richmond. These passages are here transcribed.

'General Magruder, the hero of Bethel, and a commander who was capable of much greater achievements, was left to confront the growing forces on the Peninsula, which daily menaced him with an army of seventy-five hundred men, while the great bulk of the Confederate forces were still in motion in the neighborhood of the Rappahannock and the Rapidan, and he had no assurance of reinforcements. The force of the enemy was ten times his own; they had commenced a daily cannonading upon his lines; and a council of general officers was convened, to consult whether the little army of 7,500 should maintain its position in the face of tenfold odds, or retire before the enemy. The opinion of the council was unanimous for the latter alternative, with the exception of one officer, who declared that every man should die in the intrenchments before the little army should fall back. 'By G—, it shall be so,' was the sudden exclamation of General Magruder, in sympathy with the gallant suggestion. The resolution demonstrated a remarkable heroism and spirit. Our little forces were adroitly extended over a distance of several miles, reaching from Mulberry Island to Gloucester Point, a regiment being posted here and there, in every gap plainly open to observation, and on no other portions of the line, the men being posted at long intervals to give the appearance of numbers to the enemy. Had the weakness of General Magruder at this time been known to the enemy, he might have suffered the consequences of his devoted and self-sacrificing courage; but as it was, he held his lines on the Peninsula until they were reinforced by the most considerable portion of General Johnston's forces, and made the situation of a contest upon which the attention of the public was unanimously fixed, as the most decisive of the war."

From this historical record, it appears that Magruder's small force of 7,500 men, was spread out from Mulberry Island, in the James River, across the Peninsula to Yorktown, and beyond to Gloucester Point, on the York River, opposite Yorktown. The 7,500 troops must therefore have needed the garrison in Yorktown. This is hardly credible, but he was enabled to hold his lines until they were reinforced by the most considerable portion of Gen. Johnston's forces. It follows, then, that after this reinforcement, Magruder was able to cope with our forces. The question is then—at what time was this reinforcement brought up? Fortunately we are able to ascertain this point of time without the aid of Mr. Pollard's history. I am compelled to reproduce here some extracts from the testimony heretofore given. Gen. McClellan testifies: "Movements of troops had been going on some days before my arrival. I remember that immediately upon my arrival at Fort Monroe, I was told that quite a large number of troops had been crossed over to Yorktown from the south bank of the James. I therefore hurried my own movements, and started from Fort Monroe sooner than I would have done. From the best information that I have been able to get, I think the large masses of reinforcements arrived in Yorktown from one to two days before I reached its vicinity. JOHNSTON HIMSELF ARRIVED THERE THE DAY BEFORE I DID. Gen. Heintzelman says: "By the time we got to Yorktown their army (the enemy's) had been largely reinforced."

I am not quite sure that Mr. Pollard's statements were entitled to so extended a notice; but the radical enemies of General McClellan would not scruple to use even the enemy's testimony to injure the general upon whose destruction they are intent, therefore this battery I trust has been silenced.

No. XV.

BEFORE RICHMOND.

After the battle of Fair Oaks, fought on the 1st day of June, 1862, our army remained before Richmond until General McClellan decided to change his base of operations by retiring across the Peninsula to James River, where the supplies of the army could be furnished by our navy. This decision was made on the evening of June 26th. Of the intermediate time between the battle of Fair Oaks and the movement towards the new base, I propose to treat in this number.

The committee bring no distinct charges against the General for misconduct of any sort except that they intimate strongly that the right division of our army should have been crossed over the Chickahominy, and formed a junction with the left division, on the Richmond side of this stream. Indeed, the committee seem to have been convinced that, without a junction of these two divisions, an attack on Richmond would have been inexpedient. The reasons for retaining one divisiion on the left side of Chickahominy have been already given. It was to prevent a movement of the enemy whereby our army would have been cut off from its base of supplies, the White House. Just here it seems to me that a portion of the testimony of General Henry T. Hunt will greatly enlighten the mind of the reader. He is asked: "But at Fair Oaks the enemy had been routed and been driven from their position, had they not?" Answer—"No sir, they had driven us from our position, and we re-took it. The country there was low and swampy, and the few lines which we could have advanced were those which had been prepared by the enemy, in the same way as the lines of our own position had been prepared by us. We were enabled, by means of an inferior force to hold our own against their combined attack. Being upon our own ground, we finally repulsed them. Had we changed positions and attacked them upon their own ground, being restricted by the nature of the ground to certain lines of attack which they had prepared, I think the result would have been different; probably a reverse to us. During the whole of that campaign, I considered that a serious reverse to us there would, in all probability, lead to the destruction of the army as an organized force." One cannot but be forcibly struck with the similarity of our position at Fair Oaks and the more recent great battle at Gettysburg. Had our army attacked the enemy's lines here, instead of being attacked on our own ground, who can be free from the apprehension that the "result would have been different, most probably a reverse to us"

"Question—Is it, then, your opinion that we were not strong enough at any time before Richmond to have coped with their army there?" Answer—"I cannot say that; we might have been successful, or might not have been, if we attacked. But I should have thought it imprudent or improper to have attacked, where there was not a fair prospect or a certainty of making the attack a sure thing. In that, however, I am merely giving my own judgmeat about the matter. The point is this; with the information we had of the strength of the enemy's forces; knowing that he had been preparing the ground, and had that advantage, that he was on-encumbered with sick, his hospital being behind him: with all the advantage of an interior position and lines; the two armies were so much on terms of equality, as I judged from all I could learn from those whom I thought were well informed, that an attack of that kind would have been in the highest degree doubtful; and as long as there was a force within accessible distance, and there was any hope that it might join us, and enable us to bring the combined force to bear, I would have considered it imprudent to have made an attack." Question—"I did did not mean that the enemy, after the battle of Fair Oaks, should have been followed up by the same force that had defeated them, but that our whole force should have been brought across the Chickahominy directly after that battle, and moved on to Richmond." Answer—"I have known intimately the rebel commander at that place—General Johnston—and I think that would have been exactly what he wanted and desired."

General Keyes is asked—"Why the army remained so long as it did with one portion on the right and the other on the left bank of the Chickahominy?" To which he answered—"Without being able to answer definitely, as I should if I had command of the army, I can state that I always supposed that the enemy would be able to cross the Chickahominy above where we were, and come down in the rear, and cut off our communication with the White House, which was the depot and base of our supplies, unless we had left a very strong force on the left bank of the Chickahominy." Gen. Keyes also testifies that he can give no military reason for permitting the army to remain after the battle of Fair Oaks inactive for so long a time; but he very properly adds: "I consider that the fact that I am not able to give a reason is very inconclusive, as I was not in a position to know what reasons influenced the commanding general to keep the army in such a condition.'

General McClellan is asked—"Did not the want of communication between the right and left wings of our army prevent you reaping those advantages which you might have otherwise obtained from the defeat of the enemy at Fair Oaks?" Answer—"I think that if there had been reliable communication between the right wing and the centre and left wing, we could have gained greater advantages by the battle."

These quotations from the evidence, and they could be multiplied, show conclusively that the committee utterly failed to convict General McClellan of want of professional ability or skill in not uniting the two wings of the army before they were united.

The testimony discloses copies of telegrams between the President, the Secretary of War, and General McClellan during the time under review, a summary statement of which shall be given.

On the 7th June, McClellan to the Secretary of War, informing that the Chickahominy River had risen so as to flood the entire bottoms to the depth of three or four feet. The men were working night and day up to their waists in water to complete the bridges. "The whole face of the country is a perfect bog, entirely impassable for artillery, and even cavalry, except directly in the narrow road, which renders any general movement, either of this or the rebel army, utterly out of the question at present until we have more favorable weather." June 13—The same to the same: "The enemy are massing their troops near our front, throwing up earthworks on all the approaches to Richmond, and giving every indication of fight." June 14—"I hope two days more will make the ground practicable. I shall advance as soon as the bridges are completed, and the ground fit for artillery to move; would be glad to know whether troops can be sent here;" urges the necessity of placing the troops sent from McDowell's command under his control, saying, "If I cannot fully control all his troops I want none of them. In no other way can they be of any assistance to me. The indications are, from our balloon reconnoissances, and from all other sources, that the enemy are intrenching, daily increasing in force and determination to fight desperately." June 18—Gives notice to the Secretary that rebel troops have left Richmond to reinforce Jackson. June 18.—Same day.—The President telegraphs that Jackson has been reinforced by ten thousand from Richmond. The President adds—"If this is true it is as good as a reinforcement to you of an equal force." Same day McClellan rejoins—"If ten or fifteen thousand men have left Richmond to reinforce Jackson, it illustrates their strength and confidence. After to-morrow we shall fight the rebel army as soon as Providence will permit. We shall await only a favorable condition of the earth and sky, and the completion of some necessary preliminaries." June 20—The President again telegraphs the General that a despatch had been received from Gen. Sigel corroborating the report that Jackson is being reinforced from Richmond—suggesting that it may not be true; if he knew it was not true more force could be sent to McClellan, but as the case stood this could not safely be done.

There follows a detailed statement from the Adjutant General's office, showing that on the 20th June, 1862, McClellan's army contained as follows—"aggregate present for duty, 115,102; on special duty, 12,225; absent, 29,511. Total aggregate of present and absent, 156.808.

June 25.—McClellan to the Secretary of War, desiring particular information as to the position and movements of Jackson.

June 25–McClellan telegraphs: "I incline to think that Jackson willl attack my right and rear. The rebel force is stated at two hundred thousand, including Jackson and Beauregard. I shall have to contend against vastly superior odds, if these reports be true, but the army will do all in the power of men to hold their position, and repulse any attack. I regret my great inferiority of numbers, but feel that I am in no way responsible for it, as I have not failed to represent repeatedly the necessity for reinforcements; that this was the decisive point, and that all the available means of the government should be concentrated here. I will do all that a general can do with the splendid army I have the honor to command, and if it is destroyed by overwhelming numbers, can at least die with it, and share its fate; but if the result of the action, which will probably occur to-morrow, or within a short time, is a disaster, the responsibility cannot be thrown on my shoulders. It must rest where it belongs. I feel that there is no use in again asking for reinforcements."

June 26.—The President to General McClellan: "The despatch suggesting the probability of your being overwhelmed by two hundred thousand, and talking of where the responsibility will belong, pains me very much. I give you all I can, and act upon the presumption that you will do the best you can with what you have, while you continue, ungenerously, I think, to assume that I could give you more if I would. I have omitted, and shall omit, no opportunity to send you reinforcements whenever I possibly can.

"P.S.—General Pope thinks if you fall back, it would be much better towards the York River than towards the James. As Pope now has charge of the capital, please confer with him through the telegraph.

"A. Lincoln."

I shall defer comments upon these facts (and this extraordinary postscript, too), briefly but fairly stated, until my next number; we have arrived at a most important point in the progress of the campaign. In the meantime, will the reader please direct his attention to the following inquiries:

1. Could General McClellan possibly have done anything more or better before Richmond than he actually performed?

2. Had he been reinforced, could he have taken Richmond?

3. Ought he not to have been reinforced?

I shall endeavor to discuss these questions with fairness and candor in my next.

CHANGE OF BASE.

My notice of the progress of the Army of the Potomac has been brought down to June 26th. On the next day, June 27th, 1862, the battle of Gaine's Mill was fought. Fair Oakes, it will be remembered, is on the right bank of the Chickahominy, the side towards Richmond; Gaines's Mill is on the left bank of this stream. At Gaines's Mill our forces were led by Gen. Fitz John Porter. The number of our forces engaged in that battle is variously estimated by the witnesses who have testified. Some put their number below, others above 30,000. The general in immediate command on our side puts our number above 30,000, and so would have stated had he been examined as a witness, but, strange to say, he was not called. It was evidently the theory which the committee endeavored to make out, that Porter's command should have been united to the command on the opposite side of the river before the battle of Gaines's Mill. On the other hand, Gen. Porter entertains the opinion that had he been reinforced by several regiments from the right bank of the Chickahominy he could have succeeded in effectually repelling the greatly superior numbers that assailed him, and, as a consequence, our troops could have assaulted the fortifications before Richmond. Indeed he does not hesitate to say that had he been furnished with 500 axes at the time when he sent for them by General Barnard, he might have successfully defended his position. But through some misapprehension or negligence, the request, which should have been delivered by Gen. Barnard at headquarters, was not delivered, and the necessary aid was consequently withheld. But it should be remembered that the generals in command on the Richmond side of the Chickahominy were expecting an attack, and were therefore reluctant to part with any part of their respective commands. General McClellan is asked: "As soon as you had reasonable cause to believe that the enemy proposed to attack you in force, should not the two wings of your army have been united to repel the attack? And was this done? And if not, why not?" Answer—"The right wing was drawn to the immediate vicinity of the bridges as soon as was practicable under the circumstances, after we knew definitely of Jackson's approach. The intentions of the enemy were difficult to divine. He appeared in force on both banks of the Chickahominy, and made several sharp attacks on the right bank as well as the left. So that I do not think more troops could wisely have been sent to the support of Porter than were actually sent." Question—"Whatever might have been the intentions of the enemy, as an attack was to be made by him, would it not have been better to have placed both wings of our army on the same side of the Chickahominy prior to the battle of Gaines's Mills?" Answer—"I do not think they ought to have been brought to the same side of the river before they actually were." This course of inquiry was closely pressed upon the general through a number of other questions, but he persists in testifying—"We had great difficulty in ascertaining the intentions of the enemy. I do not see that, under the circumstances at the time, we could have done differently from what we did do."

After the conclusion of this battle, which was as bravely and obstinately fought as any battle during the war, it was finally decided by Gen. McClellan to change his base of operations to the James River, and our whole force, on the night of this battle, was withdrawn to the right bank of the Chickahominy; the last troops left about daybreak of the succeeding day. The trains commenced moving to James River that night, June 28, 1862. On the 27th June, 12M., McClellan telegraphs the Secretary of War: "My change of position on other side is just in time. Heavy attack now being made by Jackson and two other divisions. Expect attack also on this side." Same day, 3 P.M., Gen. McClellan's chief of staff telegraphs the Secretary of War: "We have been fighting all day against greatly superior numbers." "Our men fight like veterans, and will do all that men can do." At 20 minutes past midnight, morning of June 28th, McClellan telegraphs the Secretary of War: "I know the full history of the day. On this side of the river (the right bank) we repulsed several very strong attacks. On the left bank our men did all that men could do—all that soldiers could accomplish; but they were overwhelmed by vastly superior numbers, even after I brought my last reserves into action. The loss on both sides is terrible. I believe it will prove the most desparate battle of the war. The sad remnants of my men behave as men. Those battalions who fought most bravely and suffered most are still in the best order; my regulars were superb, and I count upon what are left to turn another battle, in company with their gallant comrades of the volunteers.

"Had I twenty thousand, or even ten thousand fresh troops to use to-morrow, I could take Richmond; but I have not a man in reserve, and shall be glad to cover my retreat and save the material and personal of the army. If we have lost the day, we have yet preserved our honor, and no one need blush for the Army of the Potomac.

"I have lost this battle because my force was too small; I again repeat I am not responsible for this; and I say it with the earnestness of a general who feels in his heart the loss of every brave man who has been needlessly sacrificed to-day. I still hope to retrieve our fortune; but to do this the government must view the matter with the same earnestness that I do; you must send me very large reinforcements, and send them at once. I shall draw back to this side of the Chickahominy, and think I can withdraw all our material. Please understand that in this battle we lost nothing but men, and those the best we have. In addition to what I have already said, I only wish to say to the President that I think he is wrong in regarding me as ungenerous when I said that my force was too weak. I merely reiterated a truth which to-day has been too plainly proved. I should have gained this battle with ten thousand fresh men. If at this instant I could dispose of ten thousand fresh men, I would gain a victory to-morrow; I know that a few thousand men more would have changed this battle from a defeat to a victory. As it is, government must not and cannot hold me responsible for the result. I feel too earnestly—I have seen too many dead and wounded comrades to feel otherwise than that. The government has not sustained the army. If you do not do so now, the game is lost."

Let this letter be read with care. It exhibits an earnestness which, if it had been properly met by the War Department, would have ensured the capture of Richmond; but it failed, as all previous appeals since the battle of Williamsburg had failed, to excite that vigor and activity on the part of the government which, beyond all peradventure, could have furnished, as before shown, the required reinforcements. Had there been the same earnestness manifested that has since been exhibited to take Vicksburg, or Charleston, or to repel the late invasion of Lee's army of the States of Maryland and Pennsylvania, General McClellan would have fulfilled his promise to take Richmond, and won the approbation and applause of his country and the world, and, more than that, would ere this time have suppressed the great insurrection. Why has the Army of the West been more successful than the Army of the Potomac? That army has not conquered superior numbers behind their own fortifications, which General McClellan was expected to do, and which he has been censured for not doing. General Grant has not been thwarted and overruled in his plans, and in their execution, as McClellan was.

An hour before the letter above copied was sent by telegraph, General McClellan conferred with Gen. Heint zelman. This officer testifies: "About 10 o'clock, P.M., June 27, I got a telegram that Gen. McClellan wished to see me immediately, about a mile and a half off. He had, in the meantime, established his headquarters on my side of the Chickahominy. I went over there, and found them all packed up, ready to move. The general stated the situation of affairs, and what he proposed to do. One thing was to move across to the James River. The other plan was to collect all the troops from my side of the Chickahominy and have a battle the next day, and throw everything upon the result of that battle. I asked him what would be the result if we lost. He said that if we were defeated the army would be lost, but that he was inclined to risk everything on that battle. I told him it was of vital importance to the country, I thought, to save that army; that we would be ruined if that army was lost; and I thought it would be better for us not to fight that battle, but to fall back from there to James River; that we could reach there with a loss of perhaps a few pieces of siege artillery and some wagons, and then we could receive reinforcements. He said that was his opinion; still he felt inclined to risk everything on a battle. The next day we commenced to retreat." Col. Alexander, of the engineer corps, on the 28th June, received instructions from Gen. McClellan to conduct a reconnoissance to James River for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was any enemy on the road, and for ordering up supplies to the army, for he intended to march there. Thus it is evident that the commanding general did not rely exclusively on his own judgment in deciding on the important step he proposed to take, and that preliminary measures were carefully taken for the removal of the army.

The President sent a telegraphic reply to Gen. McClellan's letter: "June 28, 1862. Save your army at all events. Will send reinforcements as fast as we can. Of course they cannot reach you to-day, to-morrow, or next day. I have not said you were ungenerous for saying you needed reinforcements; I thought you were ungenerous in assuming that I did not send them as fast as I could. I feel any misfortune to you and your army quite as keenly as you feel it yourself. If you have had a drawn battle or a repulse, it is the price we pay for the enemy not being in Washington. We protected Washington, and the enemy concentrated on you. Had we stripped Washington, he would have been upon us before the troops sent could have got to you. Less than a week ago you notified us that reinforcements were leaving Richmond to come in front of us. It is the nature of the case, and neither you nor the government is to blame."

The last sentence in the President's telegram I have italicised, and shall comment upon it in my next number.

No. XVII.

"IT IS THE NATURE OF THE CASE, AND NEITHER YOU NOR THE GOVERNMENT IS TO BLAME."

This is the declaration communicated by the President of the United States to General McClellan on the 28th day of June, 1862, immediately after the battle of Gaine's Mill. The commander-in-chief acquits his subordinate general of all blame. With this the general might, so far as he was personally concerned, have been satisfied. But he did not concur in opinion with his superior officer; he thought that "the nature of the case" might have been entirely altered by supplying him with reinforcements, and that it was clearly within the power of the government to supply the reinforcements called for. The conclusion arrived at by the President prolonged the rebellion. The conclusion of General McClellan favored the immediate suppression of the rebellion. How came the President to arrive at his conclusion? He was led to believe that if he sent the reinforcements asked for, he would leave Washington unprotected. So he consoles himself and tries to console the general by saying: "If you have had a drawn battle or a repulse, it is the price we pay for the enemy not being in Washington." That the President was wrong in his conclusion has been fully shown in these numbers. There was not a day after the army reached the Peninsula when General McClellan could not have been reinforced by more than 20,000 troops in addition to those already sent him without at all weakening the defences of Washington. The general could safely leave his whole military reputation to the decision of a competent military tribunal on this point. Indeed, it may well be doubted whether there was any better way to defend Washington than by sending troops directly to Richmond to assault it.

The President is not a military man, and was not a competent person to decide what force was required for the protection of Washington, nor how this force should be divided, nor where its divisions should be placed to effect this object. This is said with no intention of underestimating his abilities as a statesman. It is manifest that he did not rely on his own unassisted judgment in this particular; then the question arises, who misled him? who gave him bad advice?

It will be remembered that General McClellan began to call for reinforcements immediately after Yorktown was evacuated. On the 28th day of May he says: "It is the policy and duty of the government to send me by water all the well-drilled troops available. I am confident that Washington is in no danger." Who in the whole army better understood what defences were required for the protection of Washington? Who could give a more reliable professional opinion on this point than General McClellan? General McDowell saw and urged the necessity of sending reinforcements. It has been stated recently in the newspapers that General Wadsworth was in favor of sending reinforcements.

The testimony of General Ethan Allen Hitchcock shows conclusively, I think, that he first gave the President the alarm in respect to the defences of Washington, and that too in the absence of Gen. McClellan. He may be regarded as the military authority upon whose advice the President acted in keeping back the reinforcements. General Hitchcock was not a general having any command, but was a cabinet adviser of the President in military matters. It may well be asked, ought the President to have any such irresponsible adviser? The Secretary of War and the General-in-Chief are at the head of the military department of the government, subject to the general supervision and control of the President himself, but not a particle more subject to such supervision and control than any other department of the government. The President is just as much entitled to select a private adviser in matters of finances, overlooking and ignoring the Secretary of the Treasury, as he has to select a secret adviser in military matters. There is no authority furnished by the testimony for saying that any of the commanders in the field dissented from the view above expressed by Gen. McClellan in reference to the defences of Washington, or concurred in the opinion upon which the President acted.

It thus appears that but for General Hitchcock, McDowell's corps would have been sent to the Peninsula—that reinforcements would have been sent sufficient to have effectually repulsed the enemy at Gaines' Mill, and had he been there so repulsed, there would have been no necessity for changing the base of operations, but the wing of the army on the right bank of the Chickahominy would have been able to enter Richmond.

It is easy for fancy to conjecture what effects would have followed had this result been reached at that time, more than a year ago. What an amount of treasure would have been saved to the country; what a number of valuable lives would have been preserved; what apprehensions, and fears, and alarms, and fearful forebodings we should all have been spared! Can any man say that General McClellan is to blame for not reaching this result? What more could he have done than he did? Yet, strange to say, this joint committee have made him the subject of their censure. The country will judge between them and him

No. XVIII.

The autumnal elections, even down to the Municipal election of the City of New York, are over. These numbers will now be resumed. I have felt an invincible reluctance to write or say anything in connection with the name of General McClellan with a view of influencing the elections of 1863, and my communications have therefore been for a time suspended.

The last conflict of the Army of the Potomac which has been noticed is the battle of Gaines' Mill. Since that battle was the subject of comment, Major General Fitz John Porter has published under his own signature important testimony in relation to it. No man is more capable of furnishing reliable testimony relative to this battle than General Fitz John Porter, since he was the principal actor in it on the side of our government. There can be no room for doubt, in a candid view of all the testimony, that if at that time General McClellan had been reinforced with the troops which he implored his government to send him, he could have taken Richmond.

Let us pause to contemplate the state of things on the Peninsula at the moment when General McClellan was forced to change his position in front of the rebel capital. I speak not now of the interference by the War Department with his original plan of operations, approved and sanctioned by that department, by withholding McDowell's force while our army lay before Yorktown, nor of preventing the junction of McDowell's and Fitz John Porter's commands at Hanover Court House; but if, after these omissions or blunders, twenty or even ten thousand fresh troops had been placed under McClellan's command, this general could have entered Richmond, in the face of superior numbers fighting behind their own intrenchments. Improbable as this may have seemed at the time, yet McClellan knew what his brave followers were capable of performing; and that he did not overestimate their power is proved by what they actually accomplished before the arrival of our army at Harrison's Landing. Although the enemy had the advantage of a defensive position behind their own intrenchments, yet even ten thousand fresh troops at Gaines' Mill, or at Malvern Hill, could have ensured the conquest of Richmond.

The excuse for not sending reinforcements is that all the troops in Virginia, not before Richmond, were required for the defence of Washington. It has already been shown that such an excuse is not a valid one. If there were not sufficient troops before Washington, or near it, for its protection, the whole country knows that one call from the President could have collected in one week from the loyal cities and States more than twenty-five thousand true and valiant men ready and eager to defend the capital of the country. Zeal for the cause of loyalty was at its highest pitch of fervor at the time when General McClellan commanded the Army of the Potomac.

Reinforcements were not sent, and Richmond was not taken. The omission to send these reinforcements was so clearly wrong that the conviction has forced itself upon many minds that the President, influenced by the advice of unwise or unpatriotic counselors, did not wish to take the rebel capital at that time by the instrumentality of General McClellan. But suppose this judgment to be an uncharitable one; suppose there was only an error of judgment on the part of the War Department, why should the blame for a failure of the Peninsular campaign be cast upon Gen McClellan? Why should he be held up to the country as the cause of this failure? Why should he be hunted, as he has been hunted, like a deer upon the mountains? He has been called a traitor—no soldier—a coward! What justification, what apology can be given for such persecution? Amidst all this manifestation of hatred and magnity, the subject of it has remained lent; when reviled he has not reviled gain, but with care, industry, and patience he has written a history of his campaigns, fortified by official documents and correspondence, in a report made to the War Department. This report it is said he has asked permission to make public, so that the people, his fellow-citizens, may have all the evidence before them, to enable them to form a judgment upon his military career. But that permission is denied him, yet he remains silent; the articles of war will not permit him to speak; he acknowledges his obligation to obey those articles. The day cannot be far distant when justice shall be done this accomplished soldier and true patriot. All his declarations have been inspired by the loftiest patriotism. In a conversation with him, not public, he informed me that no peace with the rebels should be thought of until their military organizations were put down, nor until Northern men conld be permitted to travel, visit or settle in the South, and have all their constitutional rights respected. This conversation was prior to the State election in Connecticut in April last, and in reference to that election.

Many months since Gen. McClellan was deprived of the command of the Army of the Potomac, that army which he loved, and which loved him. Little but disaster has befallen that army since he left it; thousands and tens of thousands of the brave men composing it, when he left the army, now fill honored graves. I feel confident that the impartial judgment of the country, when the full time arrives for the expression of that judgment, will be that these disastrous results would never have been beheld if George B. McClellan had been continued in command. Let this fact be pondered by all those who have been bereaved of relatives and friends in the disastrous battles which have been fought since the father of the Army of the Potomac was torn from his children. But these bereaved fathers, and mothers, and sons, and wives, and daughters are not the only persons who have cause of complaint and lamentation. All the soldiers of the Northern and Eastern and Middle States which composed the Army of the Potomac, and their friends and fellow-citizens at home, have just cause of complaint. They have been placed in a false position; they have been injured; the section of country in which they dwell has been made to suffer by a comparison with the inhabitants of another section; their reputation for valor and prowess has been breathed upon; their honor has been tarnished. If McClellan had taken Richmond; if McClellan had been left in command of the Army of the Potomac, no inference unfavorable to the valor and skill and manhood of Northern and Eastern troops would have suggested itself to any mind. Then the President of the United States would have had no occasion to write to a meeting of his fellow-citizens in the city of New York:

"You purpose also to celebrate our Western victories. Freed from apprehension of wounding the just sensibilities of brave soldiers fighting elsewhere, it would be exceedingly agreeable to me to join in a suitable acknowledgment to those of the great West, with whom I was born and have passed my life."

He had reason to be proud of his birth-place, "THE GREAT WEST," and but for his own interference he could have been spared the fear of wounding "the sensibilities of brave soldiers elsewhere."

No. XIX.

CHANGE OF BASE.

In my previous numbers I have not commented on the progress of our army after the battle of Gaines' Mill, when General McClellan decided to change the base of operations of that army. Since the appearance of Gen. McClellan's report there is no longer a necessity of continuing a narrative of the march of the army or its conflicts; they are all contained in that report, which I hope will be consulted by every citizen of the country. The campaign of the Peninsula is an item so important in the conduct of the civil war in which the country is engaged, that without a full and accurate knowledge of it no citizen can pass an intelligent and just judgment upon the character of the present Administration. In view of the fact that this Administration seeks a continuance of its rule by the sufferages of the people, the report of Gen. McClellan should be carefully studied. It is a document so clear in its statements, bearing on its face the impress of truth, and verified by official correspondence and reports, that it may be relied upon as an authentic history. I wish it were possible that every voter in the country could be made acquained with the contents of this report—that it could be read by every citizen, or read to him, if from any cause he cannot give it a personal perusal.

That the Army of the Potomac did make a successful change of its base, and by an effectual resistance did repel all attacks made by the rebel army to prevent this change, and beat back with terrible slaughter the assailants; that the movements of our army on its march were by night, and the battles were through seven continuous days, are facts not disputed. The report shows that these movements and sanguinary conflicts, terminating in the arrival at the position sought to be reached, were not unpremeditated, accidental or fortuitous, but were planned and ordered and supervised by the general commanding the vast host comprising the army of the Potomac, George B. McClellan. Never before on the American soil was such a fete performed; there is no passage in the military history of our country so luminous as that which records the doings of our army during those seven days. It is doubtful whether any act or series of acts has shed such lustre on our arms in the view of scientific and experienced military men in Europe as the movements of our army in retiring from the Chickahominy to the James, in the face of a foe superior in numbers and led by able commanders. No one military exploit in the progress of this civil war has done more to admonish foreign powers that it would be dangerous to interfere with the operations of the lawful government of the country to suppress the rebellion, and therefore to prevent such interference.

Even Pollard, the Confederate historian of the war, is compelled to admit with reluctance, that "the skill and spirit with which McClellan had managed to retreat was indeed remarkable, and afforded no mean proofs of his generalship. At every stage of his retreat, says this author, he had confronted our forces with a strong rear guard, and had encountered us with organized lines of battle and regular dispositions of infantry, cavalry and artillery. His heavy rifled cannon had been used against us constantly on his retreat. A portion of his forces had now effected communications with the rivers at points below City Point. The plan of cutting off his communication with the river which was to have been executed by a movement of Holmes' division between him and the river, was frustrated by the severe fire of the gun boats, and since that the situation of the enemy appeared to be that of division or dispersion of his forces, one portion resting on the river, and the other to some extent involved by our lines."

"It had been stated to the public of Richmond, with great precision of detail, that on the evening of Saturday the 28th of June, we had brought the enemy to bay on the south side of the Chickahominy, and that it only remained to finish him in a single battle. Such in fact appeared to have been the situation. The next morning, however, it was perceived that our supposed resources of generalship had given us too much confidence that the enemy had managed to extricate himself from the critical position, and, having massed his forces, had succeeded under cover of the night in opening a way to the James River."

"Upon this untoward event, the operations of the army on the Richmond side of the Chickahominy were to follow a fugitive army through a country where he had admirable opportunities of concealment, and through the swamps and forests of which he had retreated with the most remarkable judgment, dexterity and spirit of fortitude."

Thus much for the testimony of our enemy. The commander and historian of the Army of the Potomac was fully authorized to say:—"The seven days are classical in American history; those days in which the noble soldiers of the Union and Constitution fought an overwhelming enemy by day, and retreated from successive victories by night, through a week of battle, closing the terrible series of conflicts with the ever memorable victory of Malvern, where they drove back beaten and shattered the entire Eastern army of the Confederacy, and thus secured for themselves a place for rest and a point for a new advance upon the capital from the banks of the James."

Hear the testimony from Europe. Mr. Motley, our Minister at the Court of Vienna, thus writes to Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, in October, 1862. The letter will be found in the diplomatic correspondence communicated to Congress by the Secretary of State, pages 569 and 570. Extract: "In this connection I deem worthy of your notice a brief extract from a remarkable series of papers in the principal military journal of this empire, in which the course of our campaigns is criticised, sometimes severely, but never ungenerously; always with talent, and with thorough knowledge of the subject, topographically and strategically, and with a firm disposition to do justice. You will be interested to read the comments of so able a writer upon the withdrawal of our armies from the James River.

"It is not to be wondered at, then, if the general-in-chief of the Army of the Potomac was in haste to save the army intrusted to him from the dangers surrounding it, even from certain destruction; from a noose, in fact, which required only to be draw a little closely together in order to suffocate the soul of the Union. The manner in which he acquitted himself of this most difficult of all military tasks redounds to his infinite honor, and places him at once in the ranks of those memorable commanders whose name history treasures for posterity; men who, if they have perhaps, not had the art to chain victory to their banners, possessed, at any rate, the fortitude, the audacity, and the circumspection to rescue their armies from impending ruin * * * The American general has made a thorough study of war in the swamps of the Chickahominy, and has made himself a complete master in that most difficult of professions. * * * He has manifested the unquestioned talent to save his army, in a manner not sufficiently to be admired, out of the most desperate of situations. Moreau made himself immortal by his famous retreat from the Iller to the Rhine in the year 1796. What is due to the American general-in-chief who conducted, with a morally and physically exhausted army, through a swampy pathless country, covered with ancient forests, and in face of an enemy outnumbering him two to one the most classical of all retreats recorded in military history, without a single disaster?"

No doubt this criticism, from a high military source, in an empire thoroughly instructed in the art of war, must have been highly gratifying to our distinguished ambassador himself, the author of histories which are classics in our language. Similar emotions must have swelled the hearts of all our loyal countrymen in Europe at the time. With far different feelings, however, were the commendations of our American general regarded by the Committee on the Conduct of the War; they could easily sacrifice their country's renown to gratify their personal dislike for General McClellan.

It is a fact familiar to the student of history that the military renown of armies and the nations they served, has been often as much heightened by skilful and well-ordered retreats from situations of peril as by successful assaults. The famous retreat of the ten thousand Greeks under their leader Xenophon, needs only to be mentioned in this connection. The hardly less famous retreat of Moreau in 1796 has been adverted to by Mr. Motley. In the war between this country and Great Britain in 1812-15, our navy performed exploits highly distinguished, and greatly elevated our national character.

In the early months of that war, when we had experienced little but disasters on the land, it was truly said "Our little navy has dragged up by the locks the drowning honor of our country." But of all the feats of that navy in this memorable war, there was not one that reflected greater honor upon the naval arm of the service than the masterly escape of Captain Isaac Hull when in command of the frigate Constitution from a squadron of British vessels, consisting of a razee of sixty-four guns and four frigates, after a close pursuit of three days and nights. This display of American seamanship was viewed with admiration and astonishment by the greatest naval power in the world.

I purpose to conclude this series of articles in two more numbers; one, on the order of the General-in-Chief (Halleck), to General McClellan, to remove the Army of the Potomac from the Peninsula, and the protest of the latter general against this order. The other number on the letter of General McClellan to the President, dated July 7, 1862, concluding in these words, remarkable for their solemnity: "I may be on the brink of eternity, and, as I hope forgiveness from my Maker, I have written this letter with sincerity towards you and from love for my country."

When these numbers arecompleted they will, in compliance with numerous and urgent requests from distinguished persons in many parts of the loyal States, be collected and published in pamphlet form for general circulation. To some extent the distribution of these pamphlets must be gratuitous. Persons wishing to contribute to the expense of such distribution, will please communicate with the Journal of Commerce, which has consented to receive such contributions.

No. XX.

ORDER TO LEAVE THE PENINSULA.

On the 3d of August, 1862, General Halleck ordered General McClellan to withdraw the Army of the Potomac from the Peninsula. On the next day, while making preparation for this important movement, General McClellan sends a remonstrance to the general-in-chief, entreating him, in the strongest terms afforded by our language, to rescind this order. In this remonstrance, couched in language most respectful, he argues the point with great earnestness and power and concludes in these words: "If my counsel does not prevail, I will, with a sad heart, obey your order to the utmost of my power, directing to the movements, which I clearly foresee will be of the utmost delicacy and difficulty, whatever skill I may possess. Whatever the result may be—and may God grant that I am mistaken in my forebodings, I shall at least have the internal satisfaction that I have written and spoken frankly, and have sought to do the best in my power to avert disaster from my country."

This entreaty was unavailing—the order was not rescinded.

Now the country well knows what has been the sad experience of the Army of the Potomac since, in obedience to this fatal order, it marched from the Peninsula. In every great battle, on the soil of Virginia, this army has been defeated with immense loss in killed and wounded. At Bull Run under Pope; at Fredericksburg under Burnside; at Chancellorsville under Hooker, thousands and tens of thousands of our bravest and most loyal troops have been slain or disabled. Families without number have been bereaved of husbands and fathers, of sons and brothers and kindred, or have been compelled to see them crippled or maimed. These are sad results—were they inevitable? Might they not have been avoided by following the counsel of General McClellan?

The counsel was to reinforce the army where he was, and from that point, with the reinforced army, march on Richmond. Hear what he says: "This army is now in excellent discipline and condition. We hold a debouche on both banks of the James River, so that we are free to act in any direction; and with the assistance of the gunboats, I consider our communication as now secure.

"We are twenty-five miles from Richmond, and are not likely to meet the enemy in force sufficient to fight a battle until we have marched fifteen (15) to eighteen (18) miles, which brings us practically within ten (10) or miles of Richmond.

"At Aquia Creek we would be seventy-five (75) miles from Richmond, with land transportation all the way.

"From here to Fort Monroe is a march of about seventy (70) miles, for I deem it impracticable to withdraw this army and its material except by land.

"The result of the movement would thus be a march of one hundrend and forty-five miles (145) miles to reach a point now only 25 miles distant and to deprive ourselves entirely of the powerful aid of the gunboats and water transportation.

"Add to this the certain demoralization of this army which would ensue, the terribly depressing effect upon the people of the North, and the strong probability that it would induce foreign powers to recognize our enemies; and these appear to me sufficient reasons to make it my imperative duty to urge in the strongest terms afforded by our language that this order may be rescinded, and that far from recalling this army, it may be promptly reinforced to enable it to assume the offensive.

"It may be said that there are no reinforcements available. I point to Burnside's force; to that of Pope, not necessary to maintain a strict defensive in front of Washington or Harper's Ferry; to those portions of the army in the West not required for a strict defensive there. Here, directly in front of this army, is the heart of the rebellion; it is here that all our resources should be collected to strike the blow which will determine the fate of the nation.

"All points of secondary importance elsewhere should be abandoned, and every available man brought here; a decided victory here and the military strength of the rebellion is crushed. It matters not what partial reverses we may meet with elsewhere; here is the true defence of Washington, it is here on the banks of the James that the fate of the Union should be decided."

True, this army has retrieved its tarnished reputation at South Mountain and Antietam under McClellan, and at Gettysburg under Meade. But let it be remembered that in these conflicts it was defending the soil of loyal States, not invading the region of rebellion. This army was repelling and driving back the rebel hosts who had the audacity to invade the territory of the loyal States. We only prevented by these victories, and barely prevented, the States which had been true to the lawful government of the country from being overrun, and their cities, including the national capital itself, from being assaulted and sacked. Were these results caused solely by the order to abandon the Peninsula? Not entirely. It should be remembered that McClellan was not only ordered to march from Harrison's Landing to Aquia Creek, but was deprived of his command of that army when it joined the Army of Virginia. If he had been directed when he left the Peninsula to unite the Army of the Potomac, with the Army of Virginia under Pope, and take command of the two armies united, the disaster of Bull Run would not, it is believed, have occurred. This is a question which the military men in those armies are most competent to decide; but I have no doubt their decision would conform to the opinion above given. One thing is very certain, that the officers and privates of these armies knew and had confidence in McClellan; they did not know, and to a large extent had no confidence in Pope.

This fact is proved by the evidence of General Burnside, given before a court martial. Why was this command withheld from General McClellan? He outranked General Pope. For the same reason, I fear, that the original plans of McClellan, when he went to the Peninsula, were interfered with and defeated; for the same reason that McDowell was kept back from joining Porter at Hanover Court House; for the same reason that reinforcements, repeatedly called for, were not sent to the Peninsula. There was no desire on the part of irresponsible military advisers of the President, inferior in rank to McClellan, that this general should capture Richmond, and gain the credit and influence that such a victory was sure to give him. Hence the mind of the President was kept, by generals at Washington, in a state of constant apprehension, not to say alarm, as to the safety of the capital. One call from the War Department requiring volunteers for the defence of Washington, issued at any time during the months of April or May 1862, would have filled all the garrisons in and about the capital with some of the best and well drilled volunteers in the States of New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Jersey, within ten days after making the call. It is a notorious fact that such volunteers in large numbers were not only willing but desirous—eager for such a service. This, from what I saw here in New York, I affirm without fear of contradiction.

It will be observed that my comments refer solely to the consequences of occurrences on the Peninsula. What General McClellan could have done in command of the united armies before the battle of Bull Run was demonstrated by what he actually did with these armies after they were demoralized by defeat. When even the President of the United States said that the troops defeated under Pope would not fight, those troops were collected, organized, and led on to victory under the general they loved. It is not my purpose to speak of what might have been done by General McClellan if he had not been separated from his command, after the battle of Antietam.

But it may be enquired—"Why remind the country of these things now? It is not patriotic to allude to the errors or mistakes of the past, while the rebels are yet unconquered, and even confident of success; the country even now has need of United sentiment and action to put down the great rebellion." Admitted; yet it is nevertheless useful to examine and criticise the past, in order to prevent the recurrence of errors in the future. Let us all hope that now a more wise and efficient policy will be pursued.

There are few citizens of the loyal States who do not concur in the sentiments long since uttered and published by General McClellan in these words: "I am in favor of the prosecution of the war with all the means at the command of the loyal States until the military power of the rebellion is destroyed." When the military power is destroyed there may be a wide difference of opinion as to the policy to be inaugurated and pursued as to the States in rebellion. One party it is feared will advocate a vindictive policy inspired by hatred and revenge. The other party, which is is hoped and believed will be the prevailing one will temper mercy with justice—will endeavor by all the means practicable one more to unite the whole people of these United States in cordial support of the Constitution made by their fathers. Let us not now, in anticipation of the coming conflict of opinion to be settled, it is hoped, at the ballot box, be seperated upon the question of present duty. That duty is plain.

In order to overcome military power, military power must be resorted to. This power can only be wielded with any hope of success by those trained to its exercise. The profession of arms must be learned by study and drill and experience. The qualifications of a great military commander are most graphically sketched and eloquently described by Edmund Burke:

"The fortitude required of him is ery different from the unthinking acrity of the common soldier or ommon sailor in the face of danger nd death. It is not a passion, it is ot an impulse, it is not a sentiment, is a cool, steady, deliberate prinple, always present, always equable, aving no connection with anger, mpering honor with prudence, inted, invigorated, and sustained by a enerous love of fame; informed, oderated, and directed by an enrged knowledge of its own great ublic ends; flowing in one blended ream from the opposite sources of ie heart, and the head, carrying in self its own commission, and provng its title to every other command y the first and most difficult comand, that of the bosom in which it esides. It is a fortitude which unites ith the courage of the field the more xalted and refined courage of the ouncil; which knows as well how to etreat as to advance; which can conuer as well by delay as by the raidity of the march or the impenosity of an attack; which can be ith Fabius, the black cloud that owers on the tops of the mountains, r, with Scipio, the thunderboalt of ar; which, undismayed by false hame, can patiently endure the everest trial that a gallant spirit can ndergo, in the taunts and provocaions of the enemy, the suspicions, the old respect, and 'mouth honor' of hose from whom it should meet a heerful obedience, which, undisturbed y false humanity, can calmly assume hat most awful moral responsibility of leciding when victory may be too deary purchased by the loss of a single life, nd when the safety and honor of their country may demand the certain sacrifice of thousands."

When a military leader is found mbodying the characteristics here described, he must not be interfered with, much less controlled; he must be let alone to work out his own plans by subordinate officers and agencies of his own selection. President Lincoln is a professional man; he is a lawyer, and has, no doubt, in the course of his professional practice, been entrusted by his clients with very important cases, involving large amounts of property, great public interests, as well as the liberty and life of the citizen. In every such case I can readily imagine that, after making himself thoroughly acquainted with the facts and the law applicable to the same, he has insisted upon his professional right to manage the controversy in his own way, without the interference even of his client. Such interference is I know, never permitted by any lawyer of reputation; no such counsellor will be responsible for the result of a cause unless committed to his sole control. These principles are equally applicable to the profession of arms. Let us hope that in General Grant the country has found a military commander worthy of the high trust committed to him. This general has by the nomination of the President, and the concurrence of Congress, been placed at the head of the armies of the country. In making this selection the whole constitutional duty of the President in this regard has been performed. If General Grant fails, no censure will attach to the President, unless he has attempted to interferfere with the discharge of the general's professional duty. The President may certainly congratulate himself that he is relieved from all the care and anxiety of managing the armies in the field. The President never made a greater mistake than to assume, because he was commander-in-chief under the Constitution, that, therefore, he was required to direct the military operations of the armies. He has, however, more than once made just this mistake. Should it be repeated, no weight of odium is too heavy to cast upon the President, for he too is none other than the agent of the people not the government, but the chief executive officer selected by the people to administer a government whose powers are prescribed and defined by a written Constitution. There are not a few intelligent citizens who prediet that General Grant is called to Washington to be made instrumental in advancing party objects, as well as to control the armies. Such, it is not to be believed is the purpose of the general himself, but he may nevertheless be made subservient to party purposes. If General Grant is determined to destroy the military power of the rebellion, and perseveres in that determination, and is not interfered with by the President or War Department, he will, beyond all doubt, succeed. If however, he allows himself to become a tool of party, his success in putting down the rebellion cannot be relied on, and he will, personally, be disgraced and ruined in reputation.

THE NEW YORK TIMES.

I had proposed to finish this series of communications in this number, but an editorial article in the New York Times of the 15th March, numbered six of a series published in that paper, reviewing the report of General McClellan, requires a notice, and I am therefore prevented from executing my original purpose.

The "New York Times" supports the Administration. To this there can be no objection if that support is rendered fairly and ingenuously. There are two modes of misrepresentation and giving false coloring to facts; one by allegations that are not true, and the other by suppressing the truth what in legal technicality is called suggestio falsi and suppressio veri. Both of these maxims have been violated by the Times in the article referred to, and another maxim adopted which has not found a place in any approved code of morality: "All is fair in politics."

The first great wrong done to Gen. McClellan, after it was decided that he should move on Richmond by the way of the Peninsula, was the withholding of Gen. McDowell's corps, which had been promised him, as has been previously shown in these numbers. Had not that corps been kept back, and the good faith of the Administration thereby violated, the result of the Peninsular campaign would have been widely different from what it was. Had the fact been disclosed to General McClellan, before he embarked for Fortress Monroe, that he was not to have the aid of McDowell's command, he doubtless would never have embarked—would have regarded the enterprise of taking Richmond as impracticable. But this fact was not communicated to the General till he arrived at Yorktown, when it was too late to recede. All the plan of his campaign, deeply to his regret and I may add grief, was thereby deranged. These facts are well known to the Times, and the only way in which the Administration can relieve itself of public censure is by showing that it had been previously deceived by Gen. McClellan. This has been attempted before by Ethan Allen Hitchcock, a brigadier general of volunteers, who held staff relations with his Excellency the President and the Secretary of War. I have heretofore commented at large on this attempt made by Hitchcock; it is now renewed by the Times, with what success we shall see.

The charge against General McClellan is, that when he embarked with his army at Alexandria for the Peninsula he violated the President's order "to leave Washington entirely secure." That order was issued by the President, and bears date March 13th, 1862, and is in these words:

To Maj.-Gen. GEO. B. McCLELLAN:

"The President, having considered the plan of operations agreed upon by yourself and the commanders of army corps, makes no objections to the same, but gives the following directions as to its execution:

"1st. Leave such force at Manassas Junction as shall make entirely certain that the enemy shall not repossess himself of that position and line of communication.

"2d. Leave Washington entirely secure.

"3. Move the remainder of the force down the Potomac, choosing a new base at Fortress Monroe, or anywhere between here and there; or at all events move such remainder of the my at once in pursuit of the enemy some route.

"EDWIN M. STANTON,
"Secretary of War."

This order is not given in the Times ticle, an omission which could not ve been made by a fair and candid viewer, sincerely desirous of estabhing the truth, especially when he oted in full a previous order bear-g date the 8th of March. By every proved rule of construction the orr of the 8th of March was supersed-d by the order of the 13th of March.
y this order the plan of operations hich had been agreed upon by the mmanders of army corps was not obcted to, neither was it expressly ap-roved, but the direction to General cClellan personally in the order of e 13th of March was: "LEAVE ASHINGTON ENTIRELY SECURE; this as mandatory to the commanding eneral. What should constitute se-rity is left to his judgment, and he not concluded by the judgment of is corps commanders before exressed, or thereafter to be expressed;
ut the plain import of the order is:
I look to you, the general-in-chief, to ave Washington entirely secure."

The preparations of General Mclellan, he informs us, were at once egun in accordance with directions the order of March 13th. He shows y official documents what he did. A air judgment deduced from these ocuments must decide whether he xecuted the order with sound judg-ent and in good faith. These docu-ents are not given, nor are their ontents stated in the Times' article, ut they are adverted to as "a shufling attempt which General McClelan makes to explain this matter."

The first of these documents is an rder dated March 16th, 1862, and ssued to Maj.-Gen. N. P. Banks, con-aining specific directions what that eneral should do, and stating the eneral object of the order to be "to over the line of the Potomac and Washington."

The second is directed to Brigadier General Wadsworth, bearing the same late, March 16th, 1862. There are various other orders and official communications bearing on the safety of Washington in the report of General McClellan, but they may all be summed up in the following paragraph in the same report:

Without including Gen. Blencker's division, there were left 67,428 men and 85 pieces of light artillery, which, under existing circumstances, I deemed more than adequate to insure Washington against any force the enemy could bring against it. The general gives at large the reasons for this opinion. Among these reasons is the following, which I think no one but "The New York Times" would regard as "a shuffling attempt to explain away this matter." (The charge of having left Washington unprotected.)

"It was clear to my mind, as I reiterated to the authorities, that the movement of the army to the Peninsula would have the effect to draw off the rebel army from Manassas to the defence of their capital, and thus free Washington from menace. This opinion was confirmed the moment the movement commenced, or rather as soon as the enemy became aware of our intentions; for, with the exception of Jackson's force of some 15,000, which his intructions show to have been intended to operate in such a way as to prevent McDowell's crops from being sent to reinforce me, no rebel force of any magnitude made its appearance in front of Washington during the progress of our operations on the Peninsula; nor until the order was given for my return from Harrison's Landing was Washington again threatened."

So anxious was the general to satisfy the President and Secretary of War, that he was about to leave Washington in a state of perfect security, so as to relieve their minds from all anxiety or apprehension on this point, that he was at pains to see General Hitchcock, the only military man who held staff relations with these high officials. Here what the General says in his report:

"It is proper to remark, that just previous to my departure for Fort Monroe, I sent my chief of staff to General Hitchcock, who at that time held staff relations with his Excellency the President and Secretary of War, to submit to him a list of the troops I proposed to leave for the defence of Washington, and the positions in which I designed posting them. Gen. Hitchcock after glancing his eye over the list, observed that he was not the judge of what was required for defending the capital, that Gen, McClellan's position was such as to enable him to understand the subject much better than he did, and he presumed that if the force designated was in his judgment sufficient, nothing more would be required. He was then told by the chief-of-staff that I would be glad to have his opinion, as an old and experienced officer. To this he replied, that as I had had the entire control of the defences for a long time, I was the best judge of what was needed, and he declined to give any expressions of opinion at that time."

General Hitchcock at that time—before the General embarked—took the right view of the matter—that Gen. McClellan was a better judge of the requirements for the safety of the capital than himself, and that his judgment must control. Who has been found from that day to this, to impeach the correctness of General McClellan's decision? The capital was not put in danger while the army remained on the Peninsula, nor was the retention of McDowell's command necessary for its protection. This is the testimony of actual experience, one of the best witnesses. Before the war committee General McClellan was asked: "Was it not almost certain beforehand that the withdrawal of your army to a position where it did not cover Washington would cause the enemy at least to make a threat or feint of an attack upon Washington which would lead to a panic, and perhaps to a recall of your army, or a portion of it? Answer—I think not; I do not think that anything occurred, prior to the battle of Cedar Mountain, which should have justified a panic in Washington. The only advance of the enemy that I remember at all was that of Jackson upon Gen. Banks. When I heard of that I telegraphed to the President that I believed the intention simply to be to prevent reinforcements being sent to to me. I had no idea that it meant a serious threat upon Washington."

I have carefully read the testimony of Generals McDowell, Sumner, and Heintzelman, before the War Committee, and cannot find that either of them was examined in reference to the sufficiency of the force left by General McClellan for the defence of Washington. They were witnesses, next to General McClellan, most competent to give an opinion upon the point. No opinion was sought from either of them. General McDowell was desirous of uniting his command with that of General McClellan, and earnestly protested against the alleged necessity of retaining it in the vicinity of Washington. Yet it was retained, and accomplished no useful purpose, while, if it had embarked in the first instance, and gone down to Fortress Monroe with the other corps, or if it had united with the command of Gen. Fitz John Porter at Hanover Court House the capture of Richmond would have been made certain. Who can fail to see that the distribution of the troops for the defence of the capital, whether in the immediate vicinity of the capital, or at a greater or less distance from it, in the avenues through which the enemy must of necessity approach Washington, were questions for military science and experience to decide. General McClellan, as the commander of the army, did decide these questions, and made these distributions in the exercise of his best judgment. There is no testimony whatever but that of Generals Hitchcock and Thomas, and, perhaps, I may add, Wadsworth, tending to show that his decision was erroneous. The evidence of these witnesses has been heretofore in these numbers examined, but I may be pardoned, just in this connection, for again adverting to the topic. Gen. McClellan in his report says: "On the 21st day of April, the day following my departure for Fort Munroe, Generals Hitchcock and Thomas were directed by the Secretary of War to examine and report whether the President's instructions to me of March 8th and 13th had been complied with. On the same day their report was submitted, and their decision was that the requirement of the President, that this city (Washington) shall be left entirely secure, has not been fully complied with." I have shown, I think, conclusively, that the order of March 8th was superseded by the subsequent order of March 13th. It was very proper to enquire whether, under this order, the safety of Washington had been provided for. That question could only be decided by ascertaining what troops and armament had been left for such defence. No such investigation was made, but the attention of these two generals was directed to an enquiry whether or not the force agreed upon by the corps commanders had been left, and distributed in the manner suggested by them in their report.

A proper investigation would have shown that a much larger force than was suggested by either of the corps commanders was actually left for the defence of the capitol, although the force was, under the direction of the general-in-chief, distributed in a different manner than that contemplated by the corps commanders.

Generals Hitchcock and Thomas assume that the report of the corp commanders prescribed a rule of duty to Gen McClellan. I deny it, and have shown that the only duty required of him by the President was defined in the last order given—leave Washington perfectly secure. If he did provide, that which, in his own judgment, was perfect security, he obeyed the order. I have heretofore shown the gross injustice of putting Major Gen. McClellan, in his absence, on trial before generals of inferior rank, and bringing in a report against him without giving him a hearing, or any notice of an enquiry the result of which might be, and actually was, injurious to his reputation. This enquiry and report was made while the general himself, at the head of the largest army ever before assembled in these United States, was absent in the actual and perilous service of his country

General McClellan further states, in reference to the time when the report of Gens. Hitchcock and Thomas was made, as follows: "At the time this report was made, the only enemy on any approach to Washington was Jackson's force, in front of Banks's, in the Shenandoah Valley, with the Manassas Gap Railroad leading from this valley to Washington, and it will be admitted, I presume, that Banks, occupying the Shenandoah Valley, was in the best position to defend not only that approach to Washington, but the roads to Harper's Ferry and above. The number of troops left by me for the defences of Washington, as given in my letter to the Adjutant General, were taken from the latest official returns of that date, and these, of course, I constitute the most trustworthy and authentic source from which such information can be obtained.'

In consequence of this report of Gens. Hitchcock and Thomas, made to the War Department, the President's apprehension for the safety of Washington was excited, in consequence of which he wrote a letter to General McClellan, on the 9th of April, in which he inquires of this General—"And now allow me to ask, do you really think I should permit the line from Richmond, via Manassas Junction, to this city to be entirely open, except what resistance could be prevented by less than 20,000 unorganized troops?"

Here the President plainly implies that no troops could be placed anywhere to resist an attack upon Washington except immediately in front of the Capitol. Could any conclusion be more erroneous, not to say absurd?

In reference to another part of the report of Generals Hitchcock and Thomas, General McClellan says in his report: "In regard to the steamer 'Merrimac,' I have also stated, that so far as our operations on York River were concerned, the power of this vessel was neutralized. I now proceed to give some of the evidence which influenced me in coming to that conclusion.

"Previous to our departure from the Peninsula, Mr. Watson, Assistant Secretary of War, was sent by the President to Fort Monroe, to consult with Flag Officer Goldsborough upon this subject. The result of that consultation is contained in the following extract from the evidence of Admiral Goldsborough before the Committee on the Conduct of the War, viz., 'I told Mr. Watson, Assistant Secretary of War, that the President might make his mind perfectly easy about the Merrimac going up York River, that she could never get there, for I had ample means to prevent that.' Capt. J. V. Fox, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, testifies before the Committee as follows: 'Gen. McClellan expected the Navy to neutralize the Merrimac, and I promised it should be done.'"

There is further given the testimony of Gen. Keyes to the same effect, which will be found in the Report of Gen. McClellan.

Thus much for this infamous proceeding at Washington, instituted and consummated by Generals Hitchcock and Thomas and the Secretary of War, immediately on Gen. McClellan's leaving Washington, on a mission no less important than the conquest of the rebel capital. This proceeding, which resulted in the withholding of Gen. McDowell's corps from the Peninsula, prevented that conquest. But for this trial and conviction of Gen. McClellan in his absence, and without notice, the rebel capital would have been in the possession of the lawful government of this country more than eighteen month ago, and MAJOR GENERAL GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN would, by general acclamation, have been hailed as the savior of his country. That he has not been is no fault of his own.

NO. XXII.

NEW YORK TIMES.

In my last number I attempted to answer Article No. 6, in "the New York Times" review of General McClellan's report — with what success the careful and candid reader must decide. No. 7, in the same journal, shall now be noticed, and then, I have no more to do with "the New York Times."

No. 7 censures General McClellan for not having assaulted the enemy's lines at Yorktown instead of laying siege to his line of works. In the remarks of "the Times" our own general is treated with marked contempt. A comparison between him and the Duke of Marlborough is instituted greatly to the disadvantage of our countryman. Such a comparison was uncalled for. General McClellan, before he was summoned from the pursuits of civil life, and it may be added the profitable pursuits of civil life, to enter the service of the country, and assist in putting down the rebellion, had been educated in the military academy at West Point, and seen some actual service in the Mexican war, but he had never risen in the regular army above the grade of captain. He had retired from even this military position, and he sought not to enter military life a second time, but he was called from his retirement to that service, and, prompted by love of country, and gratitude to a government which had given him a military education, he promply obeyed that call. From the day he re-entered the army to the day when he was relieved of his command by order of the President, he addressed himself diligently to the duties of his calling in the position assigned him No man can deny him this meed of praise; he was industrious, watchful, and persevering by day and by night; he did the best he could with all fidelity to his government. I am unauthorized, upon authority which cannot be gainsaid, to declare that the President of the United States, after the battle of Antietam, expressed the highest confidence in this general's military capacity and generalship, believing him superior to any and every other general in the service, with no fault but being in his opinion too cautious.

Now this recent captain made no claim to the abilities and experience of the greatest general that England, through a course of centuries, has produced—the illustrious Duke of Marlborough. When General McClellan went to the Peninsula he commanded, indeed, the largest army ever before assembled in his native country—he did not usurp that command; he did not intrigue for, or even solicit this command; but it was conferred upon him, inexperienced as he was. He accepted it, and did the best he could. Impartial, judicious military men, have said that he did as well and accomplished as much as any other general, ancient or modern, could have done, or accomplished, in his position, under all the circumstances which actually existed. This is all that can be said about it. It is ungenerous to taunt him because he did not, in the first act of his first great campaign, rise to an equality with the renowned Duke of Marlborough. The Committee on the Conduct of the War took a large amount of testimony on this disputed point of assault or siege. I have heretofore examined in the numbers referred to this testimony, given on both sides, with as much candor and impartiality as I was able, and shown that the testimony in favor of siege greatly preponderated. The witnesses examined were of the committee's own selection, and they were selected with no partiality for General McClellan, yet the result of this testimony, and of the public authentic documents accessible to the committee, was entirely favorable to the siege. Many other officers could have been examined, and it would have been entirely practicable to examine, on this point, Lieut.-Gen. Scott himself. What their judgment would have been it is impossible to say, but there can be no doubt that an overwhelming majority of the rank and file of the whole army would have ratified the decision of the commanding general. Certain it is, that on the 6th of May, two days after the evacuation by the enemy, the Congress of the United States voted thanks to Gen. McClellan for those high military qualities which secure important results with but little sacrifice of life. One would think that controversy on this point should cease. Not so thinks the "New York Times." This journal makes no reference to the testimony taken before the War Committee; it takes no notice of the reports of our own generals; it ignores the opinion of the Army of the Potomac, the most enlightened body of citizen soldiers ever combined; it does not even mention the resolution of Congress; it enters into no discussion whatever upon the question, but pronounces, ex cathedra, a sentence of condemnation of General McClellan for having laid siege to Yorktown. The article in the "Times," now reviewed, opens thus: "There is now, we suppose, not the shadow of a doubt, that had the Army of the Potomac been simply allowed to walk on up to Richmond, it would have been able to walk over all the force which Gen. Magruder had to oppose it. We now know how contemptible that force was." The italics are not mine.

Suppose this assertion to be true: General McClellan, in April, 1862, could not act upon what we now know, and of which he was then ignorant. All he could do was to use the best means then in his power, and collect the most reliable information attainable at that time, as to the number and condition of the enemy, and act upon that information. He might have been misinformed; he might have failed to obtain accurate information; instances might be cited where great generals have been deceived without any fault or remissness of their own. But how do we now know what our army could have accomplished, more than it did accomplish before Yorktown two years ago? The "New York Times" answers this question in the following sentence: "General Magruger's official report of the operations on the Peninsula shows that his whole army consisted of eleven thousand men; of these six thousand were useless to him, being placed in garrison at Gloucester Point, Mulberry Island, &c.; so that it will be seen," adds he, "that the balance of the line, embracing a length of thirteen miles, was defended by about five thousand men." "Says" who? General Magruder. And who is General Magruder? He is the witness—the CHIEF witness produced by the accuser and reviler of General McClellan, and the public are entitled to know the position and character of this witness by whose testimony it is sought to condemn our own general. General Magruder is a rebel officer; he was well and extensively known when he served under the United States Government. The officers of our regular army are not ignorant that his characteristics were, first, a great amount of pomposity and desire of show in his personal bearing; second, a habit of appropriating to General Magruder a lion's share of all the credit and renown which attached to every military enterprise in which he happened to be engaged; third, he was habitually in a state of artificial excitement, sometimes called intoxication, but more commonly, drunkenness; and, lastly, he is universally known as a traitor to his lawful government, which educated him to the profession of arms. Behold the witness put upon the stand by the "New York Times," to blacken the character of General McClellan! What says this general as to the force of the enemy when he arrived at Yorktown? He testifies before the War Committee that when Gen. Heintzelman landed on the Peninsula there was not at that time much more than Gen. Magruder's command, which had been always estimated from 15,000 to 20,000. It will be remembered that Gen. Heintzelman landed on the Peninsula, not at Yorktown, but at Fortress Monroe, thirty miles from Yorktown. The general proceeds in his testimony: "Movements of troops had been going on across the James River to the Peninsula for some days before my arrival. I remember that immediately upon my arrival at Fort Monroe, I was told that quite a large number of troops had been crossed over to Yorktown from the south bank of the James. I therefore hurried my own movements, and started from Fort Monroe sooner than I should have done. From the best information that I have been able to get, I think that the large masses of the reinforcements arrived in Yorktown from one to two days before I reached its vicinity. Johnston himself arrived there the day before I did." Gen. Heintzelman, whose division was the first to arrive before Yorktown, testifies that a few days after he landed at Fortress Monroe (March 23) he got information that Gen. Magruder had a small force only, not exceeding 10,000 men, on the Peninsula, but he further testifies: "By the time we got to Yorktown (April 5) their army had been largely reinforced there. Gen. McClellan arrived at Fortress Monroe April 2, ten days after Heintzelman.

On this information Gen. McClellan acted—he could not act upon any other, and better evidence than Gen. Magruder's report will be required to show that this information was incorrect.

The future historian of this great rebellion will gather from all sources of information all the facts, carefully collate them, and record the results; but, at this time, it cannot be admitted that judgment upon the performances and character of our generals should be pronounced upon testimony derived from rebel official reports. Indeed the very circulation of these reports has been prohibited by a military order in some, if not all, the departments of our military service. Those who take the trouble to examine will find conflicting statements of facts in the reports of our commanding generals, and the reports of commanding rebel generals, and in no one particular is there so strong a motive to vary from strict accuracy of statement as in giving the numbers engaged. Through all time the habit of commanding generals has been to understate their own numerical force, and exaggerate the force of their enemies, when giving accounts of battles which have been fought, or conflicts terminated. It cannot be supposed that such a man as Gen. Magruder would be an honorable exception to this custom. Even Gen. Lee, the commander of the purest character in the rebel service, in giving an account of the battle of Gettysburg, would not be believed by loyal men in preference to Gen. Meade, our own commander. Much less ought the testimony of Gen. Magruder to out-weigh that of Gen. McClellan.

I shall conclude these numbers in my next.

No. XXIII.—Part I.

LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT.

On the 7th July, 1862, the headquarters of the Army of the Potomac were near Harrison's Landing, Virginia, the seven days' fight was ended, the rebels were in front with the purpose of overwhelming our army by attacking our positions, or reducing us by blocking our communications on the James River. The position of our army was one of peril. Up to this date General McClellan had communicated with the President of the United States, and the Secretary of War on military subjects only. On this day he sent a letter to the President, laying before him, for his private consideration, his general views concerning the then existing state of the rebellion. These views, the general says, "amount to convictions, and are deeply impressed on my mind and heart."

It has been objected that the general had no right to send such a letter, although a private one, to his superior in command, the chief executive of the country. There is no evidence that the President himself ever made this objection, but some of his zealous friends have done so. These friends betray ignorance of the character and spirit of our republican institutions. The President is not a monarch or ruler of any sort by hereditary right; he is an agent of the people, chosen by them to execute specified duties under the constitution. Every citizen in the land is one of his constituents, and has a personal interest in the government of the country which the President is chosen to administer for a limited period. It is the people's government, to be administered for their benefit. There is not one of these people who has not the right respectfully to submit his views to the President, upon any subject of public interest. This no man will deny, and if George B. McClellan had been, on the 7th of July, 1862, a private citizen, an unofficial person, his right to communicate his views to the President, or any other officer of the government, would be unquestioned. But because George B. McClellan was an officer of the government, subordinate to the President, it is alleged that he has forfeited the right which would clearly have been his as a private citizen. If the general had submitted his views to the President in a spirit of insubordination, that is, in the manifestation of a spirit that denied the authority of his superior, the objection would have been valid; but when the communication is perfectly respectful, and made evidently with a desire to promote the general welfare, and dictated by strong convictions of duty, who can rightly censure it? The captain of a ship is supreme in his command; his authority cannot be questioned; but if, in a time of great peril, the mate of the same ship should respectfully suggest to him a course to be steered, and what sails ought to be taken in, and what other sails ought to be set, in order to save the ship and cargo, who can say that such a subordinate officer ought to be censured? Especially if the suggestion was made privately, and not in the presence of the crew; and more especially if the mate happened to be one of the owners of the ship and cargo? I shall not attempt further to argue or illustrate this point: Gen. McClellan had a perfect right to send to the President just such a letter as he did send, if, in his judgment, after mature reflection, it contained what he deemed useful and timely advice. Had he failed to send it, he would have fallen short of his duty as an American citizen and a military commander

Let us next see what advice he gave the President. Gen. McClellan says: "Our cause must never be abandoned; it is the cause of free institu- tions and self government." This declaration is too plain to require explanation or illustration.

The general also says: "The Constitution and the Union must be preserved, whatever may be the cost, in time, treasure and blood."

Time was when this declaration would have received not only the assent, but the hearty commendation of every loyal American citizen. Then we all loved the Constitution—we were proud of it: but the time is when many American citizens, professing loyalty more loudly than their neighbors, can see no beauty in this Constitution, and are willing to discard it, or mar it, so as to leave it no longer the frame of government which it was designed to be by the illustrious men who made it, and the people, our predecessors, who adopted it. Gen. McClellan is not one of these new lights; he regards the Union as indispensable to the preservation of popular liberty, and the Constitution as the only clear and well defined, thoroughly understood bond of that Union to which the people have given their assent. The manner in which free institutions shall exist, and by which they have existed, is here a matter of agreement. The government which exists and can only exist by the consent of the governed, is embodied in the Constitution, and the only mode by which this government can be altered or varied is prescribed in the Constitution itself. If this Constitution is stripped of its sanctions, it is impossible to predict what substitute will receive the consent of the governed, or how that consent will be obtained. Without a constition which has been adopted by the people, we have no government, and are in a state of anarchy; out of which it is not given human foresight to scan what form of government will arise.

The general further says: "Let neither military disaster, political faction, nor foreign war shake our settled purpose to enforce the equal operation of the laws of the United States upon the people of every State."

This is simply declaring that the whole people of the United States, loyal and disloyal, must be governed, protected, or punished by law, sovereign law. All are entitled to the protection which the law provides—all who violate the law must be punished according to law. These propositions are simple expressions of elementary truths. To the mind of all enlightened in the principles which govern and preserve society, they are elementary truths; an attempt to prove them would only cloud them with obscurity. Yet a doctrine has gained currency, even among some respectable people, that rebels are entitled to no protection, or advantage from the laws which they have violated, and the Constitution which they have cast off. How can these rebels be punished? Who shall prescribe that punishment? By what rule shall it be meted out? The answer to each of these questions is the same, and is very simple. The offence to be punished consists in the violation of the will and decrees of the community; this will and these decrees find their only expression and embodiment in law. No power on earth but the community whose law has been violated has a right to punish that violation, and that community can only utter its voice in form of law—therefore punishment must be prescribed by law. In a Christian community it will not be denied that all men have violated the law of GOD, and except these violaters of the law have thrown away their weapons of rebellion, they are all rebels against the government of God. Yet what child born of Christian parents does not know that these rebels will be judged by the law which they have violated, and trampled under their feet? "Did not Moses give you the law and yet none of you keepeth the law?" "Doth our law judge any man before it hear him and know what he doeth?"

Nothing can be more clear than that General McClellan's policy, recommended in the strongest manner to the President, was to put down the military resistance to the government by force of arms. But that policy looked beyond the suppression of the militry combinations of rebels, to a re-establishment of the authority of government over all the people within the territorial limits of the United States. When the victory of arms is made complete then the operation of moral causes must be relied upon to unite the people of the whole country. The sword must not be the sole reliance to accomplish a reunion, but the olive branch must be held out.

Let us now refer to the moral instrumentalities the employment of which the geneeral recommends. They are:

"This rebellion has assumed the character of war; as such it should be regarded: and it should be conducted on the highest principles known to Christian civilization. It should not be a war looking to the subjugation of the people of any State in any event. It should not be at all a war upon population, but against armed forces and political organizations. Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organization of States, or forcible abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a moment. In prosecuting the war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject only to the necessity of military operations. All private property taken for military use should be paid or receipted for; pillage and waste should be treated as high crimes; all unnecessary trespasses sternly prohibited, and offensive demeanor by the military towards citizens promptly rebuked. Military arrest should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist, and oaths, not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded or received. Military government should be confined to the preservation of public order and the protection of political rights. Military power should not be allowed to interfere with the relations of servitude, either by supporting or impairing the authority of the master, excepting for repressing disorder, as in other cases. Slaves contraband under the act of Congress, seeking military protection should receive it. The right of the government to appropriate permamently to its own service, claims to slave labor, should be asserted, and the right of the owner to compensation therefor should be recognized.

"This principle might be extended upon the grounds of military necessity and security to all the slaves within a particular State, thus working manumissions in such State; and in Missouri, perhaps in Western Virginia also, and possibly even in Maryland, the expediency of such a measure is only a question of time.

"A system of policy thus constitutional and conservative, and pervaded by the influences of Christianity and freedom, would receive the support of almost all truly loyal men, would deeply impress the rebel masses and all foreign nations, and it might be humbly hoped that it would commend itself to the favor of the Almighty."

Here we have a delineation of the the policy which alone can restore peace to the country. It may not be practicable at this time to pursue literally this line of policy, but the spirit which dictated it is that which must guide the action of the government if we would have p ace. There is nothing new in the policy here recommended, for it is substantially the same as that announced by the President in his inaugural address, and which was embodied in the Crittenden resolutions adopted by both houses of Congress. This was the policy of the beginning of the contest, and which called forth volunteers unprecedented in numbers, inspired by a patriotic zeal of the most intense fervor. To gather an army then it was not necessary to offer bounties to soldiers the most tempting ever presented to swell the ranks of an army, which has gone far to exhaust the resources of the country. Had that policy not been changed, but persevered in, faithfully, the contest would have been ended long ere this. But it was changed, and the new policy adopted of the universal abolition of slavery by the Federal Government. Hence the war has been prolonged, and will be prolonged until the government returns to the point whence it departed, under the pressure brought to bear upon the President by the outside influence of a few noisy, zealous, persistent radical men, who were not, and are not, the true friends of the Constitution made by our fathers, and which, at this moment, is the fundamental law of the land.

No. XXIII.—Part II.
AMALGAMATION.

That Constitution recognized a distinction between the white race and the descendants of the African race in this country, and did not admit the latter to equal privileges with the former. The effort now is to abolish that distinction, and place the two races upon the same footing, politically. This effort, if successful, must, as a necessary consequence, lead to the blending of the two races, as races have been blended, dwarfed and demoralized, in Mexico and more Southern latitudes. To this complexion the American people are not willing to come, but they revolt at it. Yet the purpose to reach this result is now openly avowed, and defended by the same persons whose influence led the President to change the policy originally avowed by him for the suppression of the rebellion.

A work has lately appeared entitled "Miscegenation; the Theory of the Blending of the Races as applied to the American Whiteman and Negro," in which such blending is warmly recommended. In the appendix to the work, extracts from the testimony of Wendell Phillips, and the testimony of Theodore Tilton are given, showing the same earnestness and zeal in support of this theory as they have heretofore shown in the anti-slavery cause, and maintaining that such blending is the necessary sequence to abolition. If the Republican party should succeed at the next election, the abolition section of that party will confidently assert that the American people have decided in favor of the political equality and amalgamation of the white and negro races, and the other section will not deny it. It will then be insisted that the descendants of Africa shall, equally with the whites, be eligible to seats in the jury box, and on the bench of the judiciary, and in the legislatures of the several States, and in the Congress of the United States. Next will follow amalgamation of blood. It remains to be seen whether the free white race of the country is prepared for this change.

Although the President has changed, Gen. McClellan has not changed; he stands, to-day, committed to the policy which he proclaimed in his address to the Union men of Western Virginia, on the 26th of March, 1861, months before he was called to Washington to command the Army of the Potomac. In that address he says: "I have ordered troops to cross the Ohio river. They come as your friends and brothers—as enemies only to the armed rebels who are preying upon you. Your homes, your families and your property shall be under our protection. All your rights shall be religiously respected, notwithstanding all that has been said by traitors to induce you to believe that our advent among you will be signalized by interference with your slaves. Understand one thing clearly; not only will we abstain from all such interference, but we will, on the contrary, with an iron hand, crush any attempt on their part."

Such was the policy he proclaimed to the world before he was called by the President, with the hearty approval of the nation, to be general-in-chief of the armies of the United States. Western Virginia afterwards proclaimed her fidelity to the Union. But the utterance of these sentiments was remembered by the radical abolitionists of the country, who early conspired, and perseveringly labored to destroy the man who avowed them, until their influence exiled him from command, and their bitter hatred still pursues him, for no other reason but his firm adherence to the principles which guided him in re-entering, when called upon, the military service of his country. Abraham Lincoln has suffered himself to be pushed and turned aside from every purpose which he avowed upon entering on the duties of President of the United States. A recent document has appeared under his own hand, being a letter bearing date the 4th April ultimo, addressed to A. G. Hodges, Esq., Frankfort, Kentucky, in which he acknowledges, vindicates, and attempts to justify this change. In this document he admits that he took an oath to preserve the Constitution, yet, in effect, affirms that it was impossible to keep this oath without losing the nation. He maintains "that measures otherwise unconstitutional, might become lawful by becoming indispensable to the preservation of the Constitution through the preservation of the nation. RIGHT OR WRONG," he declares, "I ASSUMED THIS GROUND, AND NOW AVOW IT." This is a bold avowal to be made by the chief magistrate of a republic, as much obligated to obey the law as the humblest citizen in the country. This right or wrong doctrine is certainly a very dangerous one to teach the people of the country. What was it that RIGHT OR WRONG the President resolved to do, and actually accomplished? Nothing, on the first breaking out of the rebellion, when possibly summary measures by the power which alone, in the absence of Congress, controlled the government, might, by general consent, have been justified. But this right or wrong action was taken after Congress assembled, and time had been afforded to provide, by legislation, for the wants of the country in the exigency which then existed. "After the months of March and May, 1862," he says, "he was, in his judgment, driven to the alternative of either surrendering the Union, and with it the Constitution, or laying strong hand upon the colored element." The meaning of this is, that he was compelled, as the executive power of the government, to abrogate the relation of master and slave, or the Union and the Constitution must perish. Admitting for the present that if there had been sufficient grounds in the actual state of facts existing at the time to drive the President to this alternative, he would have been justified in the decision he made, the important question arises, What were these causes? Who would have compelled the destruction of the Union and the Constitution if the President had not laid a strong hand upon the colored element? It is very certain the rebels had not the power to accomplish this result. The declaration, by whomsoever made, that the rebels possessed this power, would not be believed. There had been no evidence given whatever that the numerical force of the free white loyal citizens of the country was not sufficient to put down the rebellion. But there had been melancholy evidence that the Administration had not the wisdom to direct that force, or, having the wisdom, it did not wish to terminate the rebellion, until an ulterior object—the abolition of slavery—had been accomplished. Some of the best men in the country believe that this was the policy which guided the conduct of the Administration, and there are not a few Republicans who, believing, justify it.

I am not willing to believe, for I have not sufficient evidence of the fact, that the President himself has not at all times been willing and desirous of bringing the war to a close by subduing the enemy; but I have what I deem sufficient evidence that prominent members of his own party, near to his person, had no desire that Gen. McClellan should take Richmond, but, on the contrary, labored to prevent such conquest, and that these persons so operated by their influence on the President as to make him an instrument in carrying out their designs. This I charge.

The rebels had it not in their power to destroy the Union if the negroes had not been emancipated, or if they had not been enrolled in the army. It is a gross libel upon the white population in the loyal States to affirm that they were not sufficiently numerous, patriotic and brave, to conquer the military force of the rebels without the aid of the negroes. What was it, then, that compelled the President, "right or wrong," to lay a strong hand upon the colored element? Was this measure rendered necessary by the threatened interference of one or more foreign powers in our domestic affairs? If it were, and our government was awed by that threat, our condition is mortifying in the extreme, and the people are entitled to know what nation or nations have thus humbled us. If the rebels themselves could not do it, nor the interference of foreign nations, there is only one other power which could exercise an influence to destroy the nation if the President had declined to avail himself of the negro element to preserve it. That power was the President's own party. The leading influence of that party might have demanded that the President, right or wrong, should use the power of the Executive to destroy slavery, and threatened, if he did not do so, they would abandon the government. The enemies who would have destroyed the government in the contingency supposed, must have been the abolitionists. It is well known that these abolitionists were no friends of the Constitution; that they had been trying, for a number of years, to weaken the regard and reverence of the people for that Constitution. If this was the power—and I suspect it was—that compelled the President, in order to preserve the Union, to lay a strong hand upon the colored element, the people of the country ought to know it. They ought to know who the real traitors in the loyal States are. Pray, Mr. Lincoln, enlighten the public on this point; favor that same public with another letter under your own signature.

The President asserts, with much confidence, that he has made no loss, but a great gain, by laying his hand on the colored element. It shows, he says, a gain of quite a hundred and thirty thousand soldiers, seamen and laborers. In stating the account of loss and gain resulting from measures adopted and carried out by the President, in respect to what he calls the colored element, many items ought to be inserted which his Excellency has not probably thought of. 1st. He has made the negro a soldier. Now there is no fact more clearly demonstrated, and thoroughly known, than that, in this country, the negro is regarded by the white man as his inferior; he considers himself degraded by an association with the negro. There is another fact, well established, that the fellowship in arms is one of a peculiarly honorable and endearing character. By the measure adopted the negro is made the fellow soldier of the white man. It ought to be considered how this forced fellowship will operate upon the morale of the American white soldier; will it not impair his self respect? Must he not feel degraded by the company he is compelled to keep? If these results are inevitable, will the white soldier fight as well, will he accomplish as much, in such company? There is but one anwer to this question—he will not.

Again. The negro is not as courageous as the white man; he does not possess the same mental resources; he is more easily frightened, and, when frightened, he will run; he will flee from the face of an enemy; his fear may easily become contagious in the ranks of an army, and thus a panic may be excited. It is therefore by no means certain that an addition of 130,000 negroes to an army of white men is so many clear gain. On the contrary, this addition may be, in fact, a loss.

2d. The President by his proclamation has dissolved or attempted to dissolve the legal relation of master and slave in States in rebellion, not within our military lines. The objeet of this proclamation was to deprive the master of the service of his slave, and excite him to hostility against his master. There are thousands of true and loyal men who deny the right of the President to do this act, and in contests between the negro and American white men, once their fellow citizens, although in rebellion, their sympathy, their natural sympathy—for it is a sympathy of race and caste—is with the white man. There is no disputing these facts, and their influence operates to divide the loyal men of the country, and thereby to weaken the power of our government; while the same facts unite, nerve, exasperate, and make desperate the enemy. These facts, in the account credited with 130,000 negro soldiers, are to be placed per contra, on the other side.

The truth is the President's mode of dealing with the colored "element," has been unfortunate in the extreme. So far from being indispensable to the preservation of the legitimate government of the country, it has been most influential in strengthening and inspiring hopes of perpetuity to the illegitimate Confederate government. The traitorous leaders of that government could not have suggested measures better calculated to unite the people upon whom it relied for support. These leaders justified the rebellion which they inaugurated by confident and earnest declarations that the Federal government intended to destroy their property in slaves; the Union loving men in the South, relying upon our solemn protestations that such was not our purpose, are pointed to these measures of the President as a fulfillment of these predictions.

On the other hand the sympathizers with secession among ourselves, for there are such, point to the same measures to show that the abolitionists, never friends of the Constitution, have gained the point for which they have been striving through a long course of years—the abolition of slavery, right or wrong. The secessionist and abolitionists have thus succeeded in breaking down or sensibly impairing the organic law, the Constitution of the country. How infinitely better it would have been, in dealing with the colored element, to follow the advice of General McClellan. "Military power should (he says) not be allowed to interfere with the relations of servitude, either by supporting or impairing the authority of the master, except for repressing disorder as in other cases. Slaves contraband under the act of Congress, seeking military protection should receive it. The right of the government to appropriate permanently to its own service claims to slave labor, should be asserted and the right of the owner to compensation therefor should be recognized."

"This principle might be extended, upon grounds of military necessity and security, to all the slaves within a particular State, thus working manumission in such State; and in Missouri, perhaps in Western Virginia also, and probably even in Maryland, the expediency of such a measure is only a question of time."

It remains to be seen whether the people of this country will set their seal of approbation upon a policy which, instead of seeking, as its ultimate object, the suppression of the rebellion, aims to abolish, throughout the country, the institution of slavery, without the consent of the States in which that institution exists, and to elevate the African race to a political equality with the white race.

President Lincoln's views on these points have been clearly avowed, and his determination to enforce them, right or wrong, has been carried into practical operation.

General McClellan's views have also been clearly made known; he has declared them to amount to convictions deeply impressed upon his mind and heart, and, as we have seen, they are "That the Constitution and Union must be preserved, whatever may be the cost in time, treasure or blood." He would "also enforce the equal operation of the laws of the United States upon the people of every State." He has expressed his belief "that the Constitution gives power sufficient even for the present exigency.' The thought of violating the Constitution, in letter or spirit, by an usurpation of power, has never been permitted to enter his mind.

Thus have I concluded this series of numbers—their purpose has been declared, and I respectfully, yet confidently, submit that it has been shown to be a fair deduction from the evidence before the country:—

1st. That General McClellan, if he had been sustained by the government, according to promise, would have taken Richmond.

2d. That there was no sound or valid reason for withholding the force promised for his support, and

3d. That he did the best he could, or that any other general could under the circumstances, with the forces placed under his command; and

Lastly, That General McClellan has been deeply injured by the Administration.

Our cause must never be abandoned; it is the cause of free institutions and self-government. — Harrison's Landing Letter.

We are fighting solely for the integrity of the Union, to uphold the power of our national government, and to restore to the nation the blessings of peace and good order. — Instructions to General Halleck, November 11, 1861.

You will please constantly to bear in mind the precise issue for which we are fighting; that issue is the preservation of the Union and the restoration of the full authority of the general government over all portions of our territory. — Instructions to General Buell, November 7, 1861.

We shall most readily suppress this rebellion and restore the authority of the government by religiously respecting the constitutional rights of all. — Instructions to General Buell, November 7, 1861.

Be careful so to treat the unarmed inhabitants as to contract, not widen, the breach existing between us and the rebels. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

I have always found that it is the tendency of subordinates to make vexatious arrrests on mere suspicion. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

Say as little as possible about politics or the negro. — Instructions to General Burnside, January 7, 1862.

The unity of this nation, the preservation of our institutions, are so dear to me that I have willingly sacrificed my private happiness with the single object of doing my duty to my country. — Letter to Secretary Cameron, October, 1861.

The Constitution and the Union must be preserved, whatever may be the cost in time, treasure, or blood. — Harrison's Bar Letter.

Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organization of States, nor forcible abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a moment. — Letter to President Lincoln, July 7, 1862.

In prosecuting this war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject to the necessity of miltary operations. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist; and oaths, not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

It should not be a war looking to the subjugation of the people of any State in any event. It should not be at all a war upon populations, but against armed forces and political organizations. — Harrison's Bar Letter.

If it is not deemed best to entrust me with the command even of my own army, I simply ask to be permitted to share their fate on the field of battle. — Despatch to General Halleck, August 30, 1862.

In the arrangement and conduct of campaigns the direction should be left to professional soldiers. — General McClellan's Report.

SPEECH OF GOVERNOR PARKER,

AT FREEHOLD, N. J., AUG. 20, 1864.

SUBJECT:

Our National Troubles—Their Causes and the Remedy.

FELLOW-CITIZENS: I am here to-night in esponse to an invitation to address my friends nd neighbors on national affairs. The times emand that I should speak plainly. This is ot the day for honeyed words or set phrases. Ve are in the midst of stirring events. In the ext three months is hidden a history more nportant to us, as a people, than all that has one before. Man's capacity for self-govern-ent is on trial. The approaching election ill probably decide whether this government ill share the fate of other republics that ave perished from the earth before reaching e meridian of their greatness, or whether the nited States of America will continue to be a ower among the nations. It therefore becomes very citizen to counsel freely with his fellows, fearlessly discuss great principles, and exam-e without restraint the qualifications and aims of candidates for popular favor, al-ough some of those candidates already oc-upy high positions. At the ballot-box, Amer-an citizens, whether voters or candidates, are qual. Under our form of government the ler is but the servant of the people, and hen he comes to render an account of his ewardship, and asks to be continued, his acts ust be subjected to the strictest scrutiny. To sure a fair election, the people must have free peech throughout the canvass, and this should e distinctly understood at the threshold. (Ap-lause.)

I will inquire, first, what is the present ondition of our country? Secondly, what rought the country to its present unhappy ondition? And thirdly, by what means can be restored to its former condition of peace, nion, and prosperity?

I. THE PRESENT CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY.

The condition of the country is truly deplor-ble. A civil war has been raging for over ree years. It has desolated many districts, nd changed the busy hum of peaceful indus-try, to the quiet of solitude. Its track has been marked by burning towns. It has brought mourning to almost every household. It has filled our cemeteries with new-made graves, and our hospitals with the sick and maimed. It has taken from the industrial pursuits of civil life nearly one-half of our arms-bearing population. It has involved us in a debt equal to one-fourth of the value of all the assessed real and personal estate in the country. It has fastened a mortgage on every farm. It has taxed heavily all that the people eat or wear, whether luxuries or the necessaries of life. It has reduced to comparative poverty many who supposed they had a competency. It has brought hunger unsatisfied to the table of many a poor and honest laborer. It will bequeath to our children a legacy of taxation greater than ever before cursed a nation. The child is not yet born who will live to see the payment of the debt, or the end of the taxation produced by this war. And yet we are only in the midst of this terrible strife, with but little hope of its speedy termination, if our national government be continued in the hands of those who now administer it. They who grow rich on the war at the expense of the people, may attempt to prove that it has brought prosperity to the country, and that nobody is hurt; but I submit, fellow-citizens, whether I have overdrawn the picture. The evils and horrors necessarily attending a civil war cannot be adequately described. In fact, they cannot even be enumerated. It is the greatest calamity that can befall a nation.

But there are other evils not necessarily produced by a state of war, but for which the present war has been made a pretext, and which are inflicted on the people through the power that has been entrusted to the federal administration for the purpose of prosecuting the war. (Applause.) These evils are not so apparent as those of which I have before spoken, for they do not so much affect the senses, and yet they have had much to do with producing the present sad condition of the country.

I refer, fellow-citizens, to the encroachments of the federal administration on the rights of the States, and the despotic power which has been exercised to overthrow the liberty of the citizen. The system of government framed by our fathers (the best ever devised by the wisdom of man) has been perverted, and is made the instrument of wrong and oppression. It can scarcely be recognized as the government of former years. The Constitution is regarded as a mere rope of sand. Its solemn provisions are now made to yield to what is called "military necessity," which means the arbitrary will of a single individual, fallible as ourselves. (Applause.) A modern invention, termed the "war power," is made to override the explicit mandates of the organic law. Free press, free speech, trial by jury, and habeas corpus, the corner-stones of our system of government, have been undermined and swept away. An effort has been made to construct a powerful consolidated government, overshadowing the sovereignty of the States, and vesting despotic power in the Executive. The legislative and judicial branches of the government have been absorbed by the Executive. Laws are made by proclamation without the concurrence of Congress, and are executed without the action of the judiciary. The title to property in large districts is sought to be destroyed by a single stroke of the pen. States are organized, their very constitutions, laws, and institutions prescribed, and the qualifications of voters and officers fixed by the edict of one man. So far has the Executive gone in these assumptions of power, that, since his nomination for reëlection, leading men of his own party have been compelled in a formal manifesto to denounce him in the strongest terms as a usurper. (Loud Applause.) No inmate of Fort Lafayette has been more violent in his denunciations of the exercise of arbitrary power than are the able chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on the Rebellious States. And yet these very men, leaders in the respective houses of Congress, in common with the majority of the dominant party, have upheld the Executive in repeated encroachments on the rights of the people more arbitrary, and, if possible, more dangerous in their character, than those of which they complain. Citizens have been violently dragged from their houses without warrant, without the semblance of a trial, merely at the whim of some secretary, the ringing of his little bell; and for long, weary months have been confined in the damp cell of a prison, and at length discharged without so much as being informed of the nature of the accusation, or even of the ground of suspicion against them. And this has been done in communities far removed from the seat of war, in States where no armed rebel had ever set his foot, where the courts were open, and where the laws were faithfully and impartially administered by pure and learned judges. (Applause.) And this has occurred in the nineteenth century, under what is called a Republican government. in a land where there is a written Constitution, and among a people sprung from an ancestry who for centuries contended against kingly power, and at last secured in magna charta the liberty of the people. (Cheers.) And through three long years of such practices, we hear no word of protest or complaint from the distinguished chairmen of the Committees on the Rebellious States who seem at a late day to have awakened to discover, what every conservative man saw long ago, that the Executive had usurped the powers of the other branches of the government. Now that their eyes are open, it is hoped that they will look into other abuses and usurpations.

The question of interference with elections would open a vast field of inquiry for the gentleman who is separated from Kentucky only by the Ohio River, and to the gentleman who resides in Maryland. Let them inquire whether, through orders from the Administration, the exercise of the elective franchise by legal voters has not in those States been prevented by military force? Whether, by such means, a working majority was not secured in the present House of Representatives? Whether military commanders, under the direction and authority of the President, did not fix by proclamation the qualifications of voters in direct opposition to the protest of the State authorities and contrary to State legislation, in which alone such power resides? Whether legal voters were not kept from the polls by the bayonet, on the assumption that they were disloyal? Whether any proceedings were instituted to inquire into their alleged disloyalty, or whether sergeants of squads of armed men stationed around the polls were not made the sole judges, and their musket the challengers? And also, whether, when the election was over, the suspected persons were not suffered to go at large, the suspicion of their disloyalty being confined to the day of election, only long enough, however, to prevent their voting? I have, fellow-citizens, given a brief and very faint description of the present sad condition of the country. I have not spoken of the general despondency that has settled like a pall over the great body of the people; of the indisposition to enter the army, and the difficulty with which its depleted ranks are filled; of the prevailing disappointment at the result of military operations, after the blood and wealth of the nation have been poured out like water, and of the gloomy anticipations of disaster under the auspices of those who direct public affairs. Nor have I spoken of the national humiliation, in being forced to submit to the direct violation of a doctrine which through common consent has been incorporated in our political system, and in having a ruler chosen and inaugurated over a conquered American republic, by the despotic power of a European emperor, without so much as a protest from our Government. Such being our unhappy state, the next inquiry presents itself what is the cause?

WHAT BROUGHT THE COUNTRY TO ITS PRESENT CONDITION.

The war is the chief cause, or, rather, it is e instrument through which we have suffered. ome of the evils I have mentioned are the in- parable accompaniments and natural conse- uences of civil war, while for the infliction of her evils the war has been made a pretext. n order, therefore, to discover who are respon- ble for the present lamentable state of affairs, e must inquire how the war originated. The ar was produced by political ambition. (Ap- lause.) Ambitious and wicked men used the avery question to attain power. Agitators, hose chief aim was to unsettle and destroy, ith the hope that amid the confusion that ould ensue, their aspirations for place might e gratified, seized hold of a strictly moral uestion, and dragged it into the political arena nmindful of the good faith with which the tates entered into the federal compact, and re- rdless of the consequences which it was evi- nt would flow from their action. They und the religious sentiment of the North hos- le to slavery, and they cunningly inculcated e modern doctrine that slavery is a sin, and at the people of the North are responsible r its continuance, and they insisted that this oral evil must be eradicated, by the sword, if ecessary. There never was a greater mis- ke; for slavery, whether it be a sin or not, es not at our doors. It is a State institution, xisting before the general government was reated, the right to regulate which was never elded by the States, and the people of the orth are no more responsible for slavery in the outhern States than in Asia, and had no more ght to interfere with the institution in the one lace than in the other, except by moral sua- on, and then strictly under the local law. he result has been such as was expected by very student of history who knows that moral eforms can never be effected by force, although he attempt has always inaugurated bloody and elentless war. The Abolitionists and Seces- onists are responsible for the war. (Loud ap- lause.) The Secessionists were the most uilty in the eye of the law, for they committed he overt act, raised the standard of revolt, and esisted with violence the authority of the Gov- rnment. The Southern leaders, in the midst f intense excitement, contrary to the desire of majority of their constituency, withdrew their tates from the Union, took possession of our ortresses, and defied the national authority. lthough there had been much provocation, lthough there was reason to apprehend an at- empt to interfere with their domestic institu- ions, yet, had they remained in Congress, the ectional party that had succeeded in the elec- ion could not have carried a single measure de- tructive of their rights or detrimental to their nterests. It was, therefore, a great crime for hese men thus deliberately to sever the Union, o attempt the destruction of this great nation, nd the everthrow of a government established after years of suffering, by our and their fa- thers, and which was the beacon light to the friends of free institutions throughout the world. I say this was a crime, and they are now gathering some of its bitter fruits. But their guilt should not withdraw our attention from others, guiltless, it may be, in the eye of the law, but who are morally equally culpable. These we have in the North. They fill ex- alted positions in our government, and with these we have to do in the approaching elec- tion. (Applause.) They are the men who, for twenty-five years, have been laboring to produce a sectional collision; who avowed that the States could not exist half slave and half free; who counselled resistance to acts of Con- gress; who passed State laws in direct oppo- sition to the provisions of the federal Constitu- tion, securing the rights of property and pro- viding for the rendition of slaves; the men who were willing to let the Union slide; who were not content with the old order of things, but prayed for an anti-slavery constitution, an anti-slavery Bible, and an anti-slavery god; the men who sang pæans to the memory of a misguided enthusiast, who, with a band of fanatical followers, armed with weapons of death, invaded the soil of a sovereign State for the purpose of inciting servile insurrection; who, in defiance of the authority of the general government, took forcible possession of its prop- erty, and who, as a criminal, forfeited his life to the offended law. These men wanted war, and were filled with joy when the South seceded. (Applause.) After doing all in their power to fan the flame of hate, when war seemed inevi- table, the Abolitionists did nothing to allay or extinguish it. The majority of the people, without respect to party, wanted peace, and de- sired compromise, but the Republican leaders would not consent to fair terms, and refused to submit the momentous issue to the people. They were afraid that the Peace Convention would propose a plan of pacification, and circu- lated petitions against compromise. Many Re- publicans were sincere in their efforts to avert war when they realized the impending danger, but they were a minority of the party. Others preferred peace, but having succeeded in elect- ing a President with the powerful aid of the Abolitionists, they did not wish to break with that interest. They found themselves bound hand and foot. The leaders at Washington, who furnished brains and energy to the party, were Abolitionists. The President always inclining in the same direction, gradually yielded to their dictation until he became entirely under their control. After the many evidences that have been given of the truth of these asser- tions, all who remain in connection with the Ad- ministration party must be considered as agree- ing in sentiment with the leaders, and must be held responsible for their acts. The passage of the Crittenden Resolutions by Congress would have prevented war. The plan proposed in those resolutions would have been an equitable settlement of the controversy. It recommended amendments to the Constitution, prohibiting slavery in all territories north of a certain line, and permitted it south of that line. Congress was prohibited from interfering with slavery in the States. It was declared that the slaveholding States were entitled to the faithful observance of the fugitive slave laws, passed in conformity with the Constitution, and recommended the States to repeal the personal liberty bills which obstructed the execution of the acts of Congress. It also provided that the laws for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and especially those prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States, should be made effective. The great mass of the people were favorable to that compromise, and had it been submitted to them would have adopted it by an overwhelming majority; and yet the resolutions were defeated by the unanimous vote of the Republican senators, and in the House of Representatives a motion to submit these propositions to the people was voted down. It is not necessary to dwell much longer on this branch of the subject. There is cumulative evidence that the Republican politicians prevented fair terms of settlement. (Applause.)

On the 3d day of January, 1861, Stephen A. Douglas made a speech in the United States Senate, in which he said: "If you of the Republican side are not willing to accept the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, pray tell us what you are willing to do? I address the inquiry to the Republicans alone, for the reason that in the Committee of Thirteen every member from the South, including those from the cotton States, expressed his readiness to accept the proposition as a final settlement of the controversy, if tendered and sustained by the Republican members. Hence the sole responsibility of our disagreement, and the only difficulty in the way of an amicable adjustment is with the Republican party." Senators on both sides of the chamber heard that speech, and no one denied the truth of the statement. Senator Douglas also alleged in a letter published but a short time before his death, "that while some of the Republicans were Union men in good faith, many of the leaders desired a dissolution of the Union, and urged war as a means of accomplishing it." Should any farther proof be required, it may be found in a letter of Senator Chandler, of Michigan, a representative man of those who influence the present Administration. During the session of the Peace Congress he wrote to the governor of his State: "No Republican State should have sent delegates, but they are here and cannot get away. Ohio, Indiana, and Rhode Island are caving in, and there is some danger of Illinois, and now they beg us for God's sake to come to their rescue, and save the Republican party from rupture. I hope you will send stiff-backed men or none. The whole thing was gotten up against my judgment, and will end in thin smoke. Still, I hope as a matter of courtesy to some of our erring brethren, that you will send the delegates. Some of the manufacturing States think that a fight would be awful. In my estimation, without a little blood-letting this Union will not be worth a rush." Enough has been said to convince the most skeptical that the abolition element of the Republican party — which, unfortunately for the country, proved the stronger element — wanted war. It was hoped that the withdrawal of the Southern States, and the feeling of bitterness which the war would engender at the North would seat that party firmly in power; but the chief object to be attained was the abolition of slavery, which it was feared could not be accomplished in any other way. And all "whom it may concern" have recently been notified that it is to be continued for the same purpose. The abandonment of slavery is made a sine qua non to the establishment of peace, and for this object we are expected to submit to further taxation, to endure further conscription, and mourn over other hecatombs of slain. The men who counsel such a policy have, with the aid of Southern leaders, been instrumental in bringing on our country this most cruel of all wars. Such men would prefer separation to a Union with slaveholders. But the country would not now be in so deplorable a condition, even under the calamities incident to war, if hostilities had been conducted on different principles. (Applause.) We have had an army such as the world had never seen, composed of skilful officers, and of men as brave as ever shouldered a musket or marched up to the cannon's mouth, equipped with all that science and wealth could produce, and yet, with almost treble the population of the enemy, and infinitely greater resources, we find ourselves held at bay in front of the two most important positions of the adversary; confronted at the Confederate capital by a force not inferior to our own, while strong bodies invade Northern soil, and lay waste the country, and threaten the National Capital; and after furnishing nearly two millions of men, and expending but little less than four thousand millions of dollars (if we estimate the state and municipal, as well as the national expenditures), we find ourselves, in the fourth year of the war with the Government apparently paralyzed, the people desponding, our citizens unwilling to enter the army, and obliged, with the aid of enormous bounties, to reinforce our depleted ranks, chiefly by enlisting men who have just landed on our shores, or by running down a few miserable negroes whom the fortunes of war have brought within our lines. (Long-continued applause.) And why is this? Are the people less brave or less patriotic than at the commencement of the war, when their martial ardor could scarcely be restrained? ("No, no.") Why is it that we are called on to behold that most pitiable of all spectacles, a powerful nation, like a bound Samson, engaged in the greatest war of ancient or modern times, with a people who seem to have lost heart in the struggle, and who are devising every possible expedient to avoid personal military service? The answer is, that the war has been perverted from a war for the Union to a politial war; a war for emancipation and the deruction of State rights. The policy of the dministration in the conduct of the war, both ilitary and civil, has well nigh crushed the pirit of the nation, and produced a want of onfidence in its ability to prosecute the war to successful termination. In a military point f view, the great error has been that civilians t Washington have undertaken to conduct perations in the field, and, with the aid of aps and charts, to work out a campaign on eir "plan," instead of entrusting the business o the general in command. Beside this, a ommittee of Congress have been visiting the rmy, interfering with its discipline, and inquirng into the political predilections of its officers; nd have forced from the service some of the ravest and most accomplished generals, who ad risked their lives on many battle-fields, be-ause they did not quite come up to their stand-rd of loyalty, although professedly on other rounds. (Applause.)

GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

The most notable instance of malignant per-ecution that has occurred during the war may e found in the case of General McClellan.
Here was a young soldier called to the command f the armies without any solicitation on his art. He was a man of comprehensive mind, nd took in at a glance the magnitude of the
ar. (Applause.) He had to organize an army ble to undertake a great campaign against he enemy's capital. He found nothing but a isorganized mass, and everything was to be onstructed from the foundation. As every ood general should do, he submitted his plan o the Government, in which he proposed to ccomplish a given result with a certain force, which the Government promised to furnish.
Goaded on by the cry of fanatics impatient
o witness the fall of Richmond, the President was induced to issue his famous war orders, dividing the Army of the Potomac, and pushing forward McClellan's army into the enemy's country before it was in fit condition. Notwithstanding this, had the Government fulfilled its part of the contract, McClellan would have taken Richmond. (Applause.) The division of Blenker was taken from him, ten thousand men were virtually subtracted from his force by the revoking of an order which had added Fortress Monroe to his department; and when under fire at Yorktown, he was informed of the withdrawal of McDowell's corps of 35,000 men.
Thus one-third of his promised army was taken from him before the advance commenced. The navy did not take Yorktown, nor was the Merrimac, in the James River, neutralized as was expected. All this overthrew the original plan of the campaign. With a force entirely inadequate to the undertaking, he was compelled to advance. His repeated calls for reinforcements were in many instances treated with neglect, and sometimes with contempt, not by the President, for it is right to say that at that time he was, I believe, the friend of McClellan.
He advanced to within five miles of Richmond, where he was induced to stretch out his right wing to meet promised reinforcements that never came; and while in this necessarily exposed position he was attacked with fury by large bodies of the enemy, sweeping down like an avalanche, and compelled to seek a new position to save his army. Then followed those seven days in front of Richmond, which have become historical, in which the glorious old Army of the Potomac vindicated its discipline and courage, and the genius of its favorite general. Although attacked by a superior force flushed with prospective victory, there was no rout, but the slow, deliberate, sullen movement of an army, confident in its own power, and relying implicitly on the skill and resources of its commander. Recalled from the peninsula against his urgent protest, his command taken from him, confined in Alexandria without so much as a squadron, he was compelled, for hours, to listen to the distant sound of the conflict. A routed army came flying to Washington. Panic seized the authorities, for all, indeed, seemed to be lost. Then occurred one of those scenes that happen but once in a generation.
The capital lay at the mercy of a powerful and victorious enemy; the army to defend it was scattered, disorganized, dispirited, totally incapable in its then condition of a successful defence. The general who had been rebuked, and, as far as possible, disgraced, was sought and with tearful eyes entreated to save the capital and the nation. (Cheers.) It was such a tribute as no man ever before received.
Did McClellan refuse? Did he respond by reminding the authorities of their former treatment of him? Oh, no! Small minds would have done this, but not so McClellan. (Renewed applause.) His noble spirit rose superior to all that was around him. He thought only of his country. He was equal to the occasion. He spoke the magic word. It was the voice of McClellan, and the men flew to arms.
Order again reigned, and when the command was given, "Comrades of the Army of the Potomac, advance!" a magnificent host, with Mc-Clellan at its head, marched out of Washington, with the light of coming victory beaming on every face. (Cheers.) The victories of South Mountain and Antietam were won, and the capital saved; and yet, after all this, upon the baldest pretexts that could be invented, McClellan was removed from command while in the face of the enemy, exiled to New Jersey (laughter), and since his retirement has been subjected to every species of malignant persecution and petty annoyance that could be devised. (Applause.) But, fellow-citizens, this "Jersey exile," George B. McClellan, will live in the hearts of his countrymen, and his memory be cherished by mankind so long as the country to whose welfare he has devoted his life shall have a history. (Loud applause.)

THE CIVIL POLICY.

Not only the military but the civil policy of the Administration has weakened and divided the North, while at the same time it has strengthened and cemented the South. The cultivation, by acts of conciliation, of the Union feeling which existed for some time after the commencement of the war, would ere this have produced discord in the ranks of the enemy, driven the secession leaders from power, or inaugurated a counter revolution which would have compelled a peace without such an immense sacrifice of human life. (Applause.) The secession leaders told their people that the object of the war was to abolish slavery, to confiscate their lands, to settle their plantations with negroes and make them subject to their own servants. This was not believed by the mass of the people; but the civil policy of the Administration soon dispelled their doubt, and gave to the rebel cause a strength which it could not otherwise have acquired. Emancipation, confiscation, and subjugation became the watchwords. The door to reconciliation was closed. The acts of Congress, and the proclamations of the President in reference to the status of the rebellious States, have made terms of peace impossible so long as they are insisted on. There cannot be a Union unless the States are equals, and they cannot be equal if a single State is deprived of the control of its domestic institutions. Each sovereignty must have the same powers. A union of States negatives the idea of superiors and inferiors. Every adhering State is interested in this principle, and should insist that the returning States should have the right of legislation over their internal affairs that are subjects of the local law. If the general government may compel Virginia to abolish slavery, why may it not compel New Jersey to reëstablish slavery? It is evident to an impartial mind that the abolition policy forbids reunion. If carried into execution it will change our system of government. If the Southern territory should be overrun and the people subjugated, there might be some kind of a government of conquerors and vassals, but not a Union. The emancipation proclamation sounded the death knell of the Union, and the recent letter of the President is but its sequence. It built up a high wall between us and peace. It was the first step in the fatal path which has led the President to his present position. The editors who affect to be surprised at the letter "To whom it may concern," who regret its publication and attempt to explain away its contents, should have known, if they had the sagacity that political editors generally have, that the President's course would necessarily bring him to declare that the abandonment of slavery must be a condition to negotiations for peace. (Applause.) It is the natural result of his policy of the last two years, and I cannot understand how any one should be surprised at it. Have not his adherents taught the same doctrine? Have not the party organs that regard the letter as written without reflection, and not intended to convey the meaning its terms imply, been almost daily regaling the reading public with some such expressions as these: "No union with slaveholders,"— Slavery is the cause of the war, and there must be no peace until slavery is rooted out?" ("Yes.") Did they ever condemn or dissent from the declaration of Vice-President Hamlin, that "the Constitution as it is, and the Union as it was, is mere claptrap and nonsense;" or of Thaddeus Stevens, that "the Union never shall be restored by my consent under the Constitution as it is;" or of Mr. Julian, that "we must not only cut up slavery, root and branch, but we must see to it that these teeming regions shall be studded over with small farms and tilled by freemen;" or of Senator Wilson, that "the John Brown Harper's Ferry outbreak was the legitimate consequence of the teachings of the Republican party;" or of a prominent Republican and successful politician of Ohio, that "slavery must be put down, rooted out, if every wife has to be made a widow, and every child be made fatherless?"

Having answered at greater length than I intended, the first two inquiries, I come now, fellow-citizens, to consider the third and most important question: — What is the remedy?

III. HOW CAN THE COUNTRY BE RESTORED TO ITS FORMER CONDITION.

It will, of course, take years to attain to the prosperity that blessed our land before the war. It will require time to heal the wounds that have been inflicted. A century may elapse before the incubus of debt will be removed; but I have faith that all this can be accomplished. I believe that this nation, so vast in its proportions, and so wonderful in its progress, was raised up by Providence to carry the blessings of civilization and Christianity throughout the globe. I have faith that the government will yet be saved. But can it be done by continuing the present Administration? Are not four years long enough to try the abolition experiment? Have you not spent enough money and sacrificed enough men, and come near enough to the precipice of utter ruin, to cure the country of fanaticism? Are you not tired of the carnage of battle-fields, of the sufferings of hospitals, of the lamentation of mourners, of the staring sign-boards of the embalmer, or of the long processions that convey the heroic dead to their last resting-place? Are you not weary of continual encroachments on the liberties of the people? You say you are weary of these things. Then how are you to have a change? Not by force; not by violent resistance to acts of Congress which you honestly believe are unconstitutional; not by refusing to bring vexed constitutional questions before the courts where they belong, in the expectation that your State authorities will rebel and resist the laws by force of arms, and thus bring war to your own doors; but by the free nd undisturbed exercise of the elective fran-hise. The ballot-box, my friends, is the sov-reign remedy for the ills which afflict the body olitic. The election day, for which so many atriotic hearts have yearned as the time when hey could lawfully change the administration, s rapidly approaching. The people are anx-ously waiting for the day, and they demand on hat day a free and fair ballot, not only in New ersey and Massachusetts, but in Kentucky nd Maryland. The people will not be satis-ied with the counting of bogus electo-al votes, a project so palpably wrong that even Vade and Davis protest against it, and warn he President that if he persists in its execu-ion he will inaugurate another civil war. And ow should you exercise the right of suffrage n order to produce a change? Of course you hould vote against the reëlection of Mr. Lin-oln. There is no prospect of a change for the etter as long as he continues to occupy the residential chair; for although he has said that e was brought to the adoption of his present olicy by force of circumstances, drifting, as it ere, like a ship without a rudder, yet he has ince declared that policy unchangeable; that he withdrawal of the emancipation proclama-ion would be an astounding breach of faith, nd that the abandonment of slavery must be a condition of peace. You see, therefore, that here is no hope for the country if he be con-inued in power.

THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.

But there is still hope for the country. On the 29th day of this month a convention to nominate a candidate for the Presidency of the United States will meet at Chicago. It will be the most important assemblage that ever convened on this continent. Upon its decision will hang the fate of the nation. The eyes of all men are turned in that direction, and many prayers will ascend even from the lips of those who heretofore have acted with other parties, that God would guide its counsels to a right result. (Applause.) I have no doubt that the delegates to that convention, being impressed with the immense responsibility of their position, will conduct their deliberations in a spirit of harmony and conciliation that will silence faction and insure success. They will represent a constituency that to-day constitute a majority of the legal voters of the loyal States, the conservative masses, — the Democracy, whose faith is founded on the Constitution, the friends of law and order, and the real lovers and defenders of the Union. We know not whom they will nominate, but if they act with reasonable discretion, the man whom they nominate will be elected. (Cheers.) Individuals may have their preferences, but they have delegated others to represent them in the convention, and I cannot conceive how wise and patriotic men can nominate a candidate or make a platform we will not prefer to a continuation of the present condition of things. (Applause.)

But I am asked, How will the election of the Democratic candidate benefit the country? What do the National Democracy propose to do when they obtain power? I cannot tell what they will do first, but I think they ought to commence by undoing almost everything that has been done at Washington during the last three years. They ought to unmuzzle the press, take the lock off the mouths of men, and restore in its pristine purity that great writ of right — the habeas corpus. They ought to open the doors of military prisons, crowded with citizens incarcerated without the formality of trial, and set the prisoners free. They should repeal all acts of Congress that infringe on the proper jurisdiction of the State courts; they should make short work of the Indemnity Act, and give every man who has been aggrieved the opportunity to test the legality of his imprisonment, in a court of justice. They should repeal the Conscription Act, and if troops are needed for the United States service, they should be raised by the States through their own agents. (Applause.) They ought to repeal the Confiscation Act, and wipe out all proclamations of emancipation and reconstruction, and all test-oaths to support executive decrees past, present, and to come, and the only oath they should require is the support of the Constitution and the laws. Having gone back to where we stood before the war began, and having put the government once more in the right, the way would be open for terms of peace. The Democracy would not be strenuous on merely formal points; in what manner terms should be proposed, and by whom; whether informal meetings of citizens who are cognizant of the views of those in power should prepare the way for negotiation; whether commissioners should be appointed by the general government, or whether there should be an armistice and convention of States. They should not stand on technicality or etiquette in the midst of suffering and death, if an honorable and lasting peace be within their grasp. I am in favor of whichever of these modes will bring peace and Union the soonest. (Applause.) The difficulty now is that the parties cannot be brought together in consequence of impossible terms being insisted upon in advance. The success of the Democracy would bring the belligerents face to face; an honest effort would be made to agree upon fair terms, and that would be a step in the right direction, even if the effort should prove unsuccessful.

I am asked, on what terms would the Democracy negotiate with a view to peace? I am not authorized to speak for the party. I suppose the Chicago Convention will do that. But I think I know something of the sentiments of the people, and particularly of the Democracy, and I am satisfied they would repudiate the Niagara letter of the President. (Loud applause.) They would not insist on the abolition of slavery as a condition. If the Southern people chose, in their several States, to abolish slavery, they would be well satisfied provided the negroes were kept at home; but if they were not willing to dispense with that institution, for which the present generation is not responsible, but which was entailed on them partly by the action of the people of the North, the Democracy would be content to permit them to manage it in their own way, and get rid of it when they desired; believing, however, that it would be better for both races that there should not be immediate emancipation. The sufferings of what are called the freedmen, for the last two years, have exceeded all the miseries endured by the colored race in this country before that time. (Applause.) But there is one thing the Democracy would insist upon, and that is, the union of the States. (Applause.) They are the real Union men of the country. They were Unionists when the men who now profess to monopolize the loyalty of the country derided them as Union-savers. (Applause.) They rallied around the flag when it was called "a flaunting lie." There is no danger of their favoring a dissolution of the Union; but if the speeches and sayings of ultra leading Abolitionists mean anything; if they believe that slavery is a sin, and that we should not hold communion with slaveholders, there is danger that, failing to subjugate the South, and free the slaves, they would consent to a separation before the Democracy obtain power. The Democracy would recognize the sovereignty of States within their proper sphere, under the Constitution of the United States, but they would insist upon the recognition of, and obedience to, the Federal Government in all matters pertaining rightfully to its jurisdiction.

But will the rebellious States agree to terms of peace on the basis of the Union? Recent events indicate that they will. It is certain that if we make no attempt to negotiate, we will never know what can be accomplished. There has been a change in the tone of Southern sentiment. Influential men recently expressed a willingness to talk over our difficulties, without prescribing independence of the confederacy as an ultimatum. I believe the Southern people are tired of the war. We can judge of their feelings by our own. They have suffered more than we can possibly imagine, and I believe that if the general government is placed in the hands of an administration that will be willing to concede and guarantee the rights of the States under the Constitution, they will gladly make peace; and if the secession leaders interpose and place themselves in the way of a peace on fair terms they will be hurled from power by their own people.

CONCLUSION.

Fellow-Citizens: I have now answered all the questions proposed as the theme for discussion on this occasion. I have depicted the troubles of the country, the causes that produced them, and the remedy to be applied. The cause is left with the people for their verdict. I know what that verdict will be in this town, in this county, and this State. Like a rock in mid-ocean, New Jersey has stood throughout the storm, immovable, breasting and beating back the waves of fanaticism that have surged around her. She is the beacon-light of the Democracy, and the hope of the country. (Cheers.) The people everywhere will come to her standard. She has long stood alone, anxious and trembling for the Union; but now, thank God, her constancy is about to be rewarded. She has stood by the Constitution at all times and under all circumstances. She has obeyed the laws, whether they were acceptable to her or not. She has always conformed to the decisions of the judiciary. She has never violated a compact. She has never deserted the Government when legally called on, although she did not approve the mode of its administration. She is the exemplar of consistency, patriotism, and honor. I am proud of this gallant little State of New Jersey, and would not, to-night, exchange my position as her chief magistrate for the crown of the most powerful kingdom of the old world. (Applause.)

Mr. President, and Members of the Democratic Association: I am glad to see you here, to-night, in such large numbers. It is by means of such associations that correct principles are to be disseminated and thorough organization secured. Although we have the right with us in the coming contest, yet, to secure victory, there must be constant and vigorous labor. We have an adversary, possessed of immense patronage, who will not let go the grasp on power without a desperate struggle. But we will succeed. (Cheers.) No power on earth can stand in the way of the people when aroused. Let us, then, continue to stand by the mottoes of our ancient faith: "The Constitution our guide,"—"Obedience to law, and the faithful observance of all compacts,"—"The Union must and shall be preserved." Campaign Document, No. 7.

HON. GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS,

ON CONSTITUTIONAL LIBERTY.

On the recurrence of a day which arks one of the great stages in the ogress of the world toward free constitutional government, it cannot be inpropriate to consider the nature of e liberties which are supposed to be e birthright of a free people. At a riod when those liberties are affected the prevalence of doctrines which reaten to undermine their foundations d to prostrate their magnificent struce in the dust, it is our imperative ty to do what we can to strengthen ose foundations, and to eradicate the uses of their disintegration. I shall sume, therefore, that the discussion hich I am now to offer to this audience one fitting to the occasion, and deanded by the character of the times.

In entering upon such a discussion I do not wish to conceal from you my nviction that constitutional liberty is ow in great peril in this country, or my lief that, unless great exertions are ade to save it, it will be irretrievably st. You may or may not share with e this conviction or this fear. But en if you do not, it is none the less oper that I should apprise you, in adance, of what lies at the bottom of my wn thoughts on this subject, in order at you may judge what importance, any, ought to attach to the opinions I ay express.

In all such discussions it is necessary at terms should be defined. You will aturally ask, therefore, what I underand by "constitutional liberty;" and s it is principally in reference to the potical and social rights of individuals that propose now to consider that liberty, answer that I understand it to imply e existence of some fundamental law, securing to the citizen certain personal rights, which government can, in no circumstances, and for no purpose, violate or take away, when there is no accusation of crime; and which, when there is an accusation of crime, can be touched by the power of government only in a certain mode and form. This I take to be the essence of constitutional liberty. The practice of securing it by fundamental laws, more solemn in their character and supported by firmer sanctions than the ordinary legislation, began with our English ancestors many centuries ago. They were not the first inventors of citizenship as a condition of social existence involving certain inviolable personal rights. That condition was well known to the Greeks, to the Romans, to the Jews, and to other nations of antiquity. But the circumstances in which the people of England found themselves, after the Norman conquest, made it necessary for them to devise certain peculiar means of protection against the power of the sovereign to oppress or injure his individual free-born subject. They did this by means of special compacts with their princes, founded on and declaring the ancient rights of the free citizen, and binding the sovereign and his successors forever to abstain from infringing them. In this way they secured the rights of person and property against arbitrary seizure, protected the home against unlawful invasion, and provided for the trial of offences by the institution known as the jury. The great charters, which effected this security and formed the basis of English constitutional liberty, were all made long before the discovery of the art of printing, that is, before the fifteenth century. After that discovery, in the progress of time, and through much tribulation, the freedom of the press also became an universally received and unalterable condition of English social and political existence, — a fundamental principle, which recognizes and is founded on the fact that, without freedom of discussion, there can be no other freedom. This result, in relation to the press, had been reached before the American Revolution. It was a result in regard to which there never could have been heretofore, and never can be hereafter, any step backward without destroying the entire framework of constitutional liberty; because the nature of modern society and the functions of the press are such that its freedom or its subjection to arbitrary control necessarily marks the distinction between free and arbitrary governments. This is essentially true everywhere; for while, on the one hand, according to our ideas, freedom of the press means the right of printing unrestrained by any power of government, other than the power, after publication, to punish judicially for violations of law, the absence of that freedom, in other systems, implies the arbitrary power, before publication, to say what shall be printed, or to prevent printing at all.

One other institution of civil liberty was added to the catalogue before the occurrence of our Revolution, namely, the writ of habeas corpus, — a process by which every person imprisoned can compel a judicial inquiry into the cause of his imprisonment, and under which he is entitled to his liberty, if the inquiry shows that the cause or mode of his imprisonment was unlawful.

It is impossible to allude to these things before a cultivated American audience, without being conscious of a strange kind of incongruity between the audience and the subject. That we, American citizens, living in this latter half of the nineteenth century, and under the Constitution of the United States, should have a practical interest in considering the means of preserving our civil liberties, and be, or feel ourselves, under the necessity of discussing first principles, is certainly a most extraordinary condition of American society. But I think you will agree with me, before I conclude, that such necessity, humiliating as it is, actually exists.

To prove it, let me in the first pl draw your attention to what took pl when the Constitution of the Unit States was established. The immunit of person and property from arbitr seizure by executive authority, and t freedom of the press, with all the le machinery by which they are protect were, of course, brought hither by c ancestors as part of the common la and after the Revolution they beca incorporated in all our State consti tions, as conditions of social existen without which there can be, accordi to the feelings of our fathers, no life t is not civil death, no happiness that not the happiness of slaves. Wh therefore, a Constitution for a natio government was presented to the peo of the several States for their adopti and it was seen that it proposed establish a government with direct a sovereign powers, without placing t government under the restrictions respect to the rights of person and pr erty which the people and their anc tors for so many generations had be accustomed to regard as indispensable liberty, it is not surprising that a c termination was formed by wise and gacious men to supply what they rega ed as a serious defect in the new tional system. That determination w unquestionably shared in and sustain by the masses of the people. It w quickened mainly by the observati of one positive feature and of seve negative features of the proposed Co stitution. It was observed that the Co stitution contained no special protecti for the liberty of the press; no distin and express reservation of the rights th would remain in the people and in t several States, after granting to the ce tral power the rights enumerated in t instrument; and none of the usual mea by which reserved and inalienable righ of person and property are secured governments of the American constit tional type. It was further observed th the Constitution contained a clause whi would confer on the new national go ernment an implied power to suspen the writ of habeas corpus under certai circumstances; and hence it was su posed that a government which could d this, and which, at the same time, w placed under no positive restriction i respect to the modes of arresting, in psoning, and trying persons charged h offences, would have the liberties of e citizen completely in its grasp, nothstanding all the provisions of the mmon law of the States and of the ate Constitutions. There was great ce in this reasoning, and great founda-n for the jealousy displayed; not a ndation resting upon any evil design any person concerned in the framing the new government, but a founda-n existing in the nature and relations the system proposed.

For it was correctly reasoned that as e people of each State were to grant a central government certain powers a sovereign nature, with supreme au-rity of legislation reaching to the rson of the citizen, and as the same thority was also to have the power to spend the writ of habeas corpus on rtain occasions, it would be a just in-ence that the people did not intend to erve their common-law personal rights, the political rights of their States, if y did not say so. This inference, if had been allowed to be drawn, would ve justified the position that for great tional purposes the people meant to eate a national government of a totally ferent character from the character of ir State governments, and that they re willing, for national objects, to live der an arbitrary and despotic power, ile for domestic purposes, they were live under a limited constitutional reblic. In order to preclude forever all ound for such an inference, the people, a great majority, resolved that certain endments of a restraining character ould be added to the Constitution. It es not in the least detract, in my judg-ent, from the force that should be given what then took place, that the federal nstitution was ratified in five States thout the proposal of amendments. I ve studied the history of these occur-nces with care, and have examined, in nnection with them, the contempora-ous popular feelings and purposes;
d I am entirely satisfied that even at e close of the year 1787, when the nstitution had been ratified by five ates without proposing amendments, vast majority of the people of the hole country, including majorities in ose five States, were convinced that e rights of persons and property ust be secured by proper provisions, and were determined to have it done.
When, in the beginning of 1788, the people of Massachusetts acted upon the Constitution, and it was found that it could not be carried without plainly insisting that its ratification should be followed by amendments protecting the common and fundamental rights of the citizen and the rights of the States, — an example that was quickly followed by all the remaining States, — there was an undoubted and overwhelming majority of the nation who meant to prevent, by every possible means, any future style of construction or administration which would make the government, under any circumstances, one of arbitrary or unrestrained powers.

This, as you know, was done by adding to the Constitution after its adoption, and, so as to make them a part of the instrument, those provisions which declare what the government of the United States shall not do in its relations to the rights of the citizen, the rights of the States, and the freedom of the press.

Now I will not depart from the rule which I always impose on myself on such occasions as this, by speaking of political parties and political persons. No partizan denunciations, no attacks upon motives, no mutterings of vengeance, will now do the slightest good. I shall speak only of the tendencies of opinions, practices, and acts of legislation. I desire you, therefore, to direct your attention to the prevalence of a certain tone of thinking and acting upon the relations between government and citizen, which is anything but American, and which will be fatal to liberty unless it is soon terminated, if it has not already destroyed our capacity to appreciate and defend liberty as we ought. You will readily understand to what I refer, when I remind you how common it has been among us, for now quite a long period, to hear the rights of government spoken of as paramount to the rights of individuals; how great have been the wrongs which we have excused under the plea of "necessity," and how completely the sacredness of those constitutional guarantees which protect the liberties of the citizen has faded out from the minds of great numbers of men. The proposition that the government has rights paramount to the rights of the citizen, as a legal or as an ethical proposition, is just as untrue as it would be to assert that the rights of the citizen are paramount to those of the government. As the government derives all its rights and all its powers from the Constitution, which places it under positive restrictions in respect to the modes of exerting its authority over individuals, and as the Constitution, in all its parts and for all its purposes, is the supreme law of the land, it is impossible that the rights of persons should be justly subordinated to anything else. Of course, when I speak of the rights of persons, I do not include a right to commit crimes, or to endanger the public safety, or to obstruct public operations; but I do include the right, even when there is an accusation or suspicion of wrongdoing, to be dealt with in those modes to which the government is restricted by the fundamental law — a right without which there can be no security for innocence, and no certain method of preventing or punishing guilt.

But there has sprung up in our days, and amid the circumstances which surround us, a habit of thinking on these subjects, which is one of the sure indications of that weakness which always precedes a relapse into despotism. It is the habit of depreciating the safe and ordinary modes of procedure, as if they were unsuited to emergencies, and lacked the vigor which we erroneously suppose to be attendant upon arbitrary measures; and to such an extent have we carried this habit, that in communities where there was no immediate public danger of any kind, where the ordinary machinery of justice was in full activity, the most enormous disregard has been manifested of the plainest constitutional principles. Well, it needs no prophet to foretell that a people who allow their own liberty to be thus dealt with, cannot preserve it. They will lose it not so much because a tyrant, or a class of tyrants, has arisen to steal it away, as because they have themselves been untrue to it, by giving their sanction to maxims of government utterly unsuited to the nature of their institutions. Liberty is not a fashion, it is a principle. It is not an outward show, it is an inward virtue. It is to a people what chastity is to a woman. To consent to live without it for a period, with intent to resume it in better or in other times, is to consent to the ruin of the moral nature. Repentance and the power of the Holy Ghost made a Mary Magdalen fit for the society of heaven. A special interposition of Providence, and the purification of great suffering, may restore constitutional liberty to a people who have once surrendered it. But nothing else can. When once the plea of urgent necessity, with its insidious influence, has satisfied the conscience, and great constitutional guarantees, founded in the experience of ages, have been put aside, the power of that plea over the moral sense has been established, and its next occasion will be its next triumph.

I cannot but marvel that my countrymen should not universally see how impossible it will be to preserve constitutional liberty in this country, if those parts of our political system which secure the rights of States and of citizens are made to give way to the unchecked force of national and physical power wielded by a central arm of authority. For one, I have never desired to see that arm crippled, in the slightest degree, of its legitimate power, and there is no citizen of this republic who could more deeply deplore its severance into two or more confederacies. But I hold it to be the first and highest duty of those who are charged with the conduct of our national affairs, to prevent the destruction of liberty that must follow the exercise of power which the Constitution not only does not sanction, but which it absolutely prohibits. I have never seen a single instance of the exercise of arbitrary power, in which the object to be attained, if rightful, could not have been better reached by the legitimate methods of the Constitution. I have never heard or read a presentation of the argument of "necessity" which did not leave all that is most dear and valuable in our system exposed to present overthrow and final ruin. I have never seen an occasion when the government could not have gained infinitely greater strength by conciliating the feelings, and winning the coöperation of men who love their country because it is free, than it could obtain from those who are careless of the principles that underlie its institutions.

That my solicitude is not ill-founded will, I think, be apparent to any candid mind, when I describe what now exists in the legislation of the United States.

A little reflection will show you that when liberty has been secured by certain fundamental laws which limit the powers of government, if the legislative and executive departments of that government will not religiously respect those laws, they can be kept in operation only by the judicial department, which affords to the injured citizen the means of redress against the immediate agents in the wrongful act. Human wisdom never has devised, and in all probability never will be able to devise, any other practical method of holding the administrators of government to the provisions of written constitutions of liberty. Destroy or impair this method, create impediments in the way of judicial action, or strike out of existence this practical means of enforcing constitutional guarantees, and those guarantees become mere waste paper. Of what avail is it that a constitution provides that no man shall be deprived of his liberty without legal process, if those who seize me, or order me to be seized, in an arbitrary arrest, are protected by legislation against the exercise of my right of judicial redress? It is this right of judicial redress, this power to make the wrongdoer accountable, that makes the really valuable distinction between our systems of liberty and the acknowledged despotisms of the world. Destroy it, and a republican government can be as despotic and irresponsible a power as any autocracy on earth.

There is now a law on the statute book of the United States which not only undertakes to deprive the judicial tribunals of the States of all cognizance, civil and criminal, over proceedings instituted against persons who have done any act injurious to a citizen, by order of the President of the United States, but which also makes the order of the President, or of any one acting under his authority, a full and perfect defence, in all courts, in any civil or any criminal proceeding in which the act is drawn in question. If this law is to be sustained by public opinion and by the judicial tribunals, it will be found that it has annihilated the liberties of the citizen as effectually as any device that was ever resorted to in any age or in any country. If, while it removed all responsibility of subordinates, it had proportionately heaped responsibility upon the President, something of the dignity and regard for principle which characterizes free constitutional governments would have been saved, although the propriety of such legislation could not even then have been defended. But with such a law in operation as this, it would be manifestly unjust to impeach the President for a high crime against liberty, or for a misdemeanor against personal rights, whatever he might order to be done to a citizen; because it is the obvious intention of the legislative department that "during the present rebellion" the President shall have and exercise an absolutely discretionary power over the persons of all citizens. For this reason also I think it plain that if the law can be regarded as constitutionally valid, so as to furnish a defence to the subordinate officer who does the act which the President orders, it must be held to furnish the President himself with an equally good defence: because it was the obvious design of the law to make an executive order paramount to every provision of the Constitution that secures and protects the liberties of the citizen "during the present rebellion."

I ask you, my countrymen, what possible justification can there be for such legislation as this? The Constitution of your country declares that you shall not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without judicial process; that you shall not be tried for offences by courts-martial; that you shall be tried by a jury of your neighborhood; and while it assumes that there may be a state of war, and that for the security and efficiency of military operations, there may be times and places in which military law must temporarily prevail, there can be no pretence that it justifies legislation which puts the rights of citizens everywhere throughout the land absolutely under executive control by declaring that no person shall be amenable anywhere, civilly or criminally, for any act done under an executive order. Why should our legislators have thus outraged the feelings and principles of those to whom constitutional liberty is at least as dear as all else that life affords? I read with grief and shame that an American Congress, laying aside all the cherished principles and traditions of a free people, and abolishing their last safeguards, have placed the liberties of their countrymen absolutely in the power of one man.

I know that some apologist will say that if this legislation is not in accordance with the Constitution, the final judicial arbiter of all such questions will so declare. Let us not have too much reliance on a judiciary that may be obliged to feel itself unsupported by public opinion. I have as much confidence in the judges of the land as any lover of liberty and right ought to have. But I have not passed thirty years of my life in observing the administration of justice, or been concerned in the study of its movements upon constitutional questions, without having learned how necessary it is to keep its atmosphere pure and clear by the purifying and invigorating influences of an enlightened and virtuous public sentiment.

And now, having endeavored to point out with precision what seem to me to be the sources of our great error, I will not be so unjust as not to admit that a civil war in a constitutional republic presents a difficult problem to the action of those who are charged with the conduct of public affairs. But what I insist upon is, that we have needlessly and weakly debased the standard of public conduct; for we have not required that the difficulties of the problem should be met by a corresponding statesmanship, which might have solved and removed them by appliances in strict accordance with constitutional principles. We have resorted to the subterfuges of a latitudinarian construction, instead of adhering to the undoubted letter and spirit of the fundamental law; and hence we are in a state of confusion. Look, for example, at the injury that has been done in this country, within the last three years, to the freedom of the press and the rights of personal liberty by the doctrine that men may be made accountable for what are called "treasonable sentiments." Newspapers have been suppressed, and men have been incarcerated or banished for the expression of political opinions, in disregard of the fact that we live under a Constitution which strictly defines the offence of treason, and which, unquestionably, excludes from the category all merely moral aid and comfort of a public enemy. However reprehensible it may be to write or speak as if one wished success to the enemies of one's country, it is nothing but a relapse into the worst ages of constructive treasons, to pretend that mere writing or speaking on subjects that are political can be made cognizable by the public authority and visited with the penalties attached to that crime. Long before the Constitution of the United States was made, such constructive treasons were exploded by our ancestors; and when that instrument was made they were carefully excluded from our political existence. They are, indubitably, incapable of being reconciled with the freedom of speech and of the press; for no human intellect can draw the line anywhere save where the Constitution places it, namely, at the limit of physical aid and comfort of an enemy, and yet leave untrammelled that right of free discussion without which such institutions as ours cannot exist. Let me be explicitly understood.

What I complain of is, not that men have been restrained or punished for doing or publishing what has enabled others to frustrate military operations, but that for discussions or utterances clearly within every legal and moral right of the citizen, and in no degree injurious to military operations, the liberty of the press has been violated, and men have been thrown into prison. This, you know, has been done flagrantly and repeatedly, and so pernicious has been the effect of our passionate violence, that private malice has again and again asked and induced the public authorities to act where the cause and the theatre were alike contemptibly trivial. Such are the inevitable consequences of a departure from the sacred principles of a free constitution. The practice, too, of dealing by military power with men who have been unfaithful in public trusts, but who are in no sense amenable to military law, is another proof of the disregard of constitutional principle, which has now become chronic, and bids fair to be perpetual.

I have thus laid before you, in an imperfect manner, a few of the reasons which, to my mind, afford grounds for serious concern about the duration of our system of constitutional liberty. I know and appreciate all the existing obstacles to the production of any considerable effect of these suggestions upon the minds of others. It has been my fortune heretofore to encounter the ridicule that attended those who were de-ded as "Union-savers." It is my for-ne now to be classed with those whose nxiety for the safety of our free instituons, if admitted to be sincere, is rearded as superfluous, or, being flipantly treated as a pretence, is proounced, in the fashionable cant of the mes, as "disloyalty." These things o not move me. But I confess I m moved when I contemplate the ex-ent to which educated minds have ielded to the idea that our free instituons must give way to the establishment f some other system, and that, all things onsidered, the change through which e are believed to be passing is not to e regretted. There is a great deal ore of this feeling abroad than appears pon the surface. Along with it, side y side with it, and sometimes in direct lliance with it, there is operating a fatal anker that eats out the life of public irtue — a coarse, rank greed for wealth nd luxury and power, that sets them bove all systems of liberty, and trifles vith public principles and interests as if hey were things to be hawked about pon the stock exchange. And last, ot least in mischievous effect, is the pathy that looks on all violations of a reat Constitution, one of the consumnate masterpieces of the human intellect, ne of the last citadels of human hopes,

s we should see the mimic fortification vhich a school-boy has erected in the nows of winter, melt under the blaze of vernal sun.

What is the remedy? What shall ave us from the fate that has overtaken ther republics? I know of nothing that an save us but to intrust the adminis-ration of our affairs, through the ballot-ox, to men who can govern without vioating the Constitution.

If we have not lost the power of returning to the paths of the Constitution, we may yet escape these perils. But we cannot escape them if we continue to deride and decry the limitations which the Constitution has imposed upon the national powers. We may convert this Union into a consolidated democracy, whose uncontrollable force shall override all State authority and all local and individual rights; and we shall do it, if we do it at all, at the cost of constitutional liberty as the price of the conversion.
You will see, I am convinced, that this must be the result, if you will reflect upon the fact that the people of the United States, in their collective and national capacity, if unrestrained by those limitations which have their origin in the separate sovereignties of the States, must be he absolute masters of all social and political conditions within their limits.
In such a result we must lose even the common law, for as a nation we have no common law. That body of law — the source of the rights of property and person, the nursery of freedom, the origin of suffrage — exists only by reason of the distinct sovereignties of the States.
If ever the national powers shall completely overcome those sovereignties, the common law will disappear.

No more awful spectacle can be contemplated than that of a great, powerful, and energetic nation, who have no rule of action but the rule of a written Constitution, and who have lost their fidelity to its requirements. We have been so situated through three whole years of civil war, that it has been in the power of extreme and violent men to denounce a pure and high regard for the limitations of our fundamental law as treason to the Union. The moral cowardice which has made us shrink from defending the unquestionable rights of the States, from fear of being charged with complicity in rebellion, has deprived the nation, in its utmost need, of the counsels and thoughts of many of its best citizens, and has made many a man in public station yield his assent to measures which his reason and conscience disapproved. We must correct this evil, or we shall have no means left to us by which we can rescue our country from the jaws of ruin. Patience, moderation, obedience to law while it remains law,
and fidelity to the Constitution forever, are the virtues on which our salvation depends.

But this solemn theme, reaching into the impenetrable future, extends beyond all the limits of public speech appropriate to such an occasion as this. We have a priceless inheritance to defend, and I will not say that, under present circumstances, the existing military struggle can be discontinued. But it must be conducted by a power that will respect the fundamental civil conditions of our national existence, or its exertions will be utterly fruitless of any good.
We all know that there is a sword, which was drawn, at the first, in defence of the Constitution, and which can never be used for its subversion. Let him who wears that sword — whether he is reserved by the Government for one or another emergency, whether he is to be called by the people to one or another public position — receive the confidence which his character and your own welfare alike demand at your hands. Guard his reputation as you would guard one of your dearest possessions. It is no light thing that, at so early an age, such capacities and such a character as McClellan's should have become developed among us to the full stature of a soldier and a statesman, and should have become so known throughout the land for the purity and elevation that have marked him from his first appearance in this stormy, this perilous period of our national history. I am no solicitor, in his behalf, for men's suffrages, to place him anywhere; and I know well how gravel how truly, how conscientiously, as on should look upon a trust for the publi good, he looks upon all that abundar measure of admiration and approbatio which flows to him from the hearts o his countrymen. I know that you can not call him to assume any responsibi ity concerning which a noble sense o duty will not be the sole ground o his determination, and the sole sprin of all his acts; and I also know, if I an capable of knowing anything that con cerns the welfare of my country, that t him, or to men like him, the America people must look hereafter, if they woul preserve that system of constitutiona government without which all powe and all dominion will be like —

Dead sea-fruits,
Which tempt the eye,
But turns to ashes on the lips.

WATCHWORDS FOR PATRIOTS.

Mottoes for the Campaign, selected from General McClellan's Writings.

The true issue for which we are fighting is the preservation of the Union and upholding the laws of the general government. — Instructions to General Burnside, January 7, 1862.

We are fighting solely for the integrity of the Union, to uphold the power of our national government, and to restore to the nation the blessings of peace and good order. — Instructions to General Halleck, November 11, 1861.

You will please constantly to bear in mind the precise issue for which we are fighting; that issue is the preservation of the Union and the restoration of the full authority of the general government over all portions of our territory. — Instructions to General Buell, November 7, 1861.

We shall most readily suppress this rebellion and restore the authority of the government by religiously respecting the constitutional rights of all. — Instructions to General Buell, Nov. 7, 1861.

Be careful so to treat the unarmed inhabitants as to contract, not widen, the breach existing between us and the rebels. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

I have always found that it is the tendency of subordinates to make vexatious arrests on mere suspicion. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

Say as little as possible about politics or the negro. — Instructions to General Burnside, January 7, 1862.

The unity of this nation, the preservation of our institutions, are so dear to me that I have willingly sacrificed my private happiness with the single object of doing my duty to my country. — Letter to Secretary Cameron, October, 1861.

Whatever the determination of the government may be, I will do the best I can with the Army of the Potomac, and will share its fate, whatever may be the task imposed upon me. — Letter to Secretary Cameron, October, 1861.

Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organization of States, nor forcible abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a moment. — Letter to President Lincoln, July 7, 1862.

In prosecuting this war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject to the necessity of military operations. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist; and oaths, not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our present armies. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

In the arrangement and conduct of campaigns the direction should be left to professional soldiers. — General McClellan's Report.

SPEECH OF HON. EDGAR COWAN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

JUNE 27, 1864,

ON MR. TRUMBULL'S AMENDMENT REPEALING THE JOINT RESOLUTION OF JULY 17, 1862, QUALIFYING THE CONFISCATION ACT AND LIMITING FORFEITURES UNDER IT TO THE LIFE OF THE OFFENDER.

MR. COWAN said,—

MR. PRESIDENT: I should not have said a word during this discussion except for the fact that among all those who have engaged in it not one of them has taken the pains to state the question clearly and distinctly out of which it arises. The Constitution provides that "No attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture (of estate), except during the life of the person attainted. The true question is, whether by any law we can make here, the estates of traitors can be forfeited absolutely and for the fee. Because to repeal the joint resolution of 17th July, 1862, would give the act it qualifies that operation; if it did not the repeal would be useless and inoperative.

Now I suppose that no lawyer in this country, before the present war, could have ever hesitated a moment as to the true construction of the clause in question or of the reason which underlaid it. The language is plain and free from a legal ambiguity; it is the same which has been embodied in English statutes for the last two hundred years, and has been the subject of judicial construction without a doubt as to its meaning. No one until recently ever dreamed but that it was intended to restrain the forfeitures in judgments of treason to the lifetime of the traitors, and that after their deaths their lands would descend to their heirs-at-law as in other cases. The reason for this too was simple and obvious, that the punishment of a traitor, as far as possible, might be made to fall upon his own head and not upon the heads of his wife and children, who are presumed to be innocent until they are found guilty. Experience, long and painful, too, had shown that this humane view was far more wise and politic for the state than the older and more barbarous rule which forfeited forever the estates of those who rebelled against it. Under this latter the heirs, feeling that they had been involved in the punishment of an ancestor without having shared in his guilt, of course always were disaffected toward a government they thought capable of such injustice toward them, and under the smart of it never failed to revolt themselves when a fit opportunity presented. Under the new policy, however, they were reconciled to the state because they were allowed the presumption of innocence in inheriting the estates of their ancestors, and were made loyal to it by the clemency it showed in not treating their misfortunes as crimes.

Recently, however, in the indignation naturally excited in the minds of our people by the wickedness of the rebellion, many have desired to strip all those engaged in it of their entire property, as a terror to those who might in the future contemplate offences of the same kind. Filled with this notion, attempts are made to carry it out here by enactments which would relieve the court of all restraint in declaring forfeitures of the property of persons engaged in the rebellion, so that they might condemn a tract of land absolutely as prize of war the same as the ship of an enemy at sea is condemned when it is captured. This would be the effect if the joint resolution be repealed by the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Now, I am ready to aver and prove that this cannot be done without a clear violation of our authority delegated to us by the Constitution here, and by the Constitution alone. We are here to make laws for the people according to the powers expressly given to us in that instrument, and we have no more right to transcend those powers by making laws not warranted by it, or by making laws forbidden by it, than any tyrant has to justify his usurpations; no more, indeed, than the rebels have for disregarding and disobeying it. Let no man, therefore, solace himself with the reflection that he is actuated by good motives while he is violating it, or, in the popular phrase, that the government is to be saved even at the expense of the Constitution. He must save it according to the Constitution and by the exercise of the powers it confers, because if there is a government left after the Constitution is gone, that government would be a despotism and not the government he is entrusted to save. All this is, I think, so plain that all who are not wilfully blind must see it. If we for the purpose (as we think) of saving the Government could violate the Constitution to do so, then the President might, for the same purpose, do so too. Now suppose he were to decide that the great danger to it was the coming presidential election, and that for the purpose of saving it from that danger he would prevent an election altogether, and hold over himself till it was safe to go back to the Constitution and again entrust the people with the right to choose a Chief Magistrate: will any man say that would be saving the Government? Would it not the rather be saying that it was impossible to save the Government, and that it was necessary to substitute in its stead a despotism?

It is in this aspect all true men must view it; and there is no man true to the Government or who has faith in its continued existence who would for one moment doubt its capacity to save itself according to the laws of its own creation. Indeed I have no doubt if it is ever lost it will be by violating its fundamental law, the Constitution, and if that is obeyed it can be saved and will endure. The honorable Senator from Illinois admits that all the power possessed by our Government is derived to it under and by virtue of the Constitution, and I consider this admission important as coming from him: for there are some of his school who seem to think that in time of war we get some new accession of power from some other source outside that instrument, which they call war powers, and upon these they are disposed to draw without stint whenever constitutional objections are made to their schemes. But it so happens that we hold and enjoy even our war powers under the Constitution, which provides as well for the chastisement of belligerent enemies as it does for the punishment of the citizens who offend against its criminal code. And if we were at war to-day with a foreign power, we would be as much bound as the Constitution in all respects while carrying on that war, as we are bound by it while proceeding against one of our citizens for murder or any other offence. In the first case we are governed by the laws of war as we find them in the laws of nations, and in the latter by the municipal laws enacted by Congress according to the Constitution. The framers of that instrument found the "laws of nations" all ready made to their hand, and they provided that they should be the law of the new people they were then starting out on its national career.

ney adopted them as the law of the nited States. But they adopted no unicipal code ready made, but they ovided a Congress and gave it au- ority to make one according to cer- in fixed rules and with certain defi- te limitations; so that we see they opted one code and provided for aking another. The first regulates r intercourse with foreign nations in ace and war, the second regulates e relations and authority of the overnment with our own citizens as ch.

Here, however, comes the difficulty; difficulty which has confused so many scussions and left so many minds herwise clear in much and perplexing certainty; it is this: under which these codes are our relations with oels regulated? Are we to treat em as foreigners at war with us, or citizens offending against our crim- al code? I answer, unhesitatingly, at so long as actual war exists we e bound to treat them precisely as ough they were a foreign nation; may do to them and their property, blic and private, exactly what we ght do to the public and private operty of Mexico and Mexicans if were at war with them, and nothing ore. After the war is over and the med rebellion is put down, we have right to do to them whatever we ve a right by law to do to citizens o offend against our laws. And s, too, is the necessity of the case; s what we are doing now, or what ought to be doing, because, actual r existing, we are governed by the vs of nations and not by our mu- ipal laws. By the latter we might r, convict, and execute for the crime treason some of the prisoners we te; but it is well known we do not; leed we durst not for our sakes as ll as for the sake of the law. If we d so they would retaliate and exe- te our prisoners; and the war hav- g thus broken out of the pale of in- national law would become one of rder and extermination, instead of ing civilized and lawful war. If we had once subdued the organized and armed rebellion, so that they could not retaliate, then we might enforce against them our municipal law, or law enacted by Congress; until that event happens we cannot.

The act of 17th July, 1862, being clearly a municipal law in most of its features, it must be subject to the restriction imposed by the Constitution; and if we undertake to punish the rebel as a citizen, then we must accord to him all that a citizen charged with a crime has a right to claim under the Constitution; that is, he must be charged by a grand jury, must be tried by a petit jury, &c., and though his life may be forfeited absolutely, yet his lands cannot.

The joint resolution asserts this principle and makes it part of the act, makes the act itself constitutional; but if we repeal it, then it is not constitutional and the courts could not execute it.

But we are told that this law is not exactly a municipal law; that it is not to operate on the rebel as a citizen but as an enemy and a belligerent; that as we have the right to shoot him on the field of battle, we have also a right to confiscate his estates, &c., with a great deal more to the same purpose, but all of which means, I suppose, if it be put in legal phrase, "that by the laws of war the private property, real and personal, of belligerent enemies is lawful prize of war." If this is true, then we have the right of course; but if it is the law already, why reënact it here? It is unquestionably the law of war that private property of enemies captured at sea is fair prize of war; but being the law, no one has ever thought of giving it any additional force by putting it into an act of Congress.

Now I propose to show that from the very nature and necessity of the matter Congress cannot enact laws of war; to attempt it would be an absurdity. Under ordinary circumstances it would be enough to say to reasonable men that one nation or one belligerent could not make laws of war, because the laws of war must bind both belligerents; and it is manifestly absurd to suppose that if one belligerent were to lay down the law to govern the struggle the other would be bound to obey it. It could only be the law when both agreed to be bound by it; if they did not then it would be mere idle proclamation, or, as lawyers say, brutum fulmen.

Again, even if a foreign nation or nations were to join with the United States in establishing new rules or laws to be added to the international code, Congress would have nothing whatever to do with the matter.

This can be illustrated in a very simple manner. I have said that the Constitution adopted the international code ready made, by conferring power upon Congress to affix a proper punishment for its violation in certain cases, such as piracy, &c., to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and to make rules concerning captures on land and water; (that is, what disposition shall be made of prizes of war, and not what shall be prize of war as has been argued). Here the power of Congress ends and the power of the President and Senate begins. The President appoints and the Senate confirms embassadors to foreign courts; they also make treaties; and lastly, the courts decide all cases arising under the laws of nations, especially prize cases.

Now, it is well known that the great Powers of Europe, in congress assembled in Paris, in 1856, proposed certain ameliorations in the laws of nations regulating war, as follows: first, to abolish privateering; second, enemy cargoes (except contraband of war) to be covered by neutral flags; third, neutral goods (except contraband of war) not seizable under enemy flags.

The United States were invited to agree to those changes, and the Federal Government was willing to do so, provided another change was made, namely, "that private property of enemies should not be prize of war at sea any more than on land."

Now, allow me to ask, suppose our Government had agreed, by what agency under our Constitution could that result have been brought about? Surely no one will say it would be Congress; but every one must know that the President, through his ministers abroad, would have entered into treaty with the Powers proposing that we would have been called on to ratify it in this Senate; and that, so far from the House of Representatives having anything to do with it, we would have been bound not to let them know anything about it until our action had been taken.

Here we see beyond dispute that to the President and the Senate is intrusted the power of proposing and agreeing to alterations and amendments to the laws of nations.

Now, I wish to say further in this connection, that in pursuance of the doctrine I have advanced we have established courts to decide cases arising under the laws of nations, and that in deciding those cases an act of Congress would have no binding force whatever, because if it contravened the well-settled principles of public law, the court would be bound to disregard it.

MR. TRUMBULL. There never was such a case in the world.

MR. COWAN. There never was a clearer proposition, nor one which could be more easily maintained before an intelligent court. I never heard it denied or doubted except on the floor of the Senate, and that at a time when I was satisfied Senators had not examined it.

MR. TRUMBULL. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he ever read the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall on that very point, in which he said that the law of nations was subject to the control of the sovereignty; that a nation might make itself odious to other nations by refusing to follow it; but that the power of Congress to confiscate property was clear and unquestioned.

MR. COWAN. I know precisely the opinion to which the Senator refers — rown s case — and I know, too, that e case as actually decided gives no untenance whatever to the doctrine r which he contends, no matter what e judge may have said, by the way, hile he was ruling it. Besides, there a doctrine of Chief Justice Marshall, a subsequent case, which is directly the teeth of his doctrine in Brown's, the Senator understands the latter.

he fact is, however, that there is no fficulty in reconciling them.

Let me put a case. Suppose we had ceded to the treaty of Paris, and we d gotten afterwards into a war with reat Britain. Then suppose Congress d enacted a law declaring enemy ods might be taken as prize of war, ough covered by a neutral flag.
hen, further, suppose one of our cruiss had captured British goods on board a French vessel, and had brought them to a prize court for condemnation; ould it not have been sufficient to revent such a result to show that we ad bound ourselves by treaty not to ake prize of goods under such cir-umstances? And if the act of Conress had been relied on by the captors, ould not the court have pointed to he Constitution to show that such ases were to be decided by what the ourt believed and decided to be the aw of nations, and not what Congress night have enacted in the premises?
And might not the court further say,
'We sit here to preserve the peace of nations, to compel the observance of reaties and the administration of pubic laws between independent sover-eignties; and we cannot, even at the idding of one or both of the other departments of our Government, decide the law as they would have it or make it; but we must decide it as it is."

Again, it is a remarkable fact that just at the time Mr. Seward was endeavoring to induce the sovereignties of Europe to exempt the private property of belligerent enemies at sea from being made prize of war, just at the same time the honorable Senator from Illinois and others were endeavoring by a congressional enactment to make the private property of enemies on land (which had been exempt long before by international law) lawful prize of war! I doubt whether the friends of any government ever before showed such a want of consistency as in this instance, when they were struggling to bring about such different results.

Mr. Trumbull. The Senator from Pennsylvania, I suppose, does not mean to misrepresent me. I never attempted on this floor to maintain a proposition to change the laws of nations. By the laws of nations, from the beginning of time, the persons and property of the enemy were at the control of the conqueror.

Mr. Howard. By the laws of war.

Mr. Trumbull. By the laws of nations in reference to war, of course.

Mr. Howard. The laws of war as recognized by nations.

Mr. Trumbull. That is international law.

Mr. Cowan. I do not know whether the honorable Senator is aware of it or not, but I assert here that he is trying to make a law to seize the real estate of belligerents as such, to condemn and confiscate it as prize of war, and to do all that I call adding a new provision to the laws of nations and of war. If you take an enemy's private ship at sea it may be condemned as prize by the laws of nations, but if you take an enemy's private plantation, it cannot be forfeited as prize under those laws. They are defective in that respect; indeed they say expressly it cannot be done, and that the title is the same after the conquest as before. This is the difficulty the honorable Senator is trying to remove, and in doing so, if he succeeds, he must repeal (or violate) the laws of nations, and enact a new and different rule here. He says himself that he claims the right to do this on the same grounds precisely that he has a right to shoot a rebel on the field of battle; that is, that it is a war right. Now war rights are regulated by the laws of war, which, as he has well said, are the "laws of nations in reference to war." The truth is, he is trying to do that which is forbidden by the laws of war and by the Constitution also, if it were attempted as municipal law. Nothing can be clearer than this, and he may just as well submit to these limitations first as last. Let him read the latter, if he wants to know what he may rightly inflict upon rebels as citizens for violating their allegiance, and let him read the laws of war for what he may do to them as public enemies. At present I am for confining myself to these latter strictly. I think we are bound to make war according to the rules they furnish us, and I would as soon think of transcending them, or violating them, as I would think of trampling a statute under foot. The crime is the same in both cases, for both are laws of the land.

The true question is, can we make prize of war of the real and personal estates of those who have been engaged in this rebellion, and can we forfeit their real estates absolutely? We have seen that we cannot do this by due process of municipal law; can we do it by virtue of the laws of war as settled by civilized and Christian nations? I answer, that we cannot; that there is to-day no conflict of authority whatever on the question; there is no book that treats of it, or a chapter devoted to it, which does not lay down the rule that we cannot, — all for the best reason in the world, namely that we can make war far more successfully by not being able to exercise any such power.

Now, as the authorities for this position have been so often quoted in extenso to the Senate, I shall content myself with referring to Wheaton's International Law, 596, 597; Vattel, book 3, chapter 9, section 13; Klüber, part 2, title 2, section 2, chapter 1, sections 250–253; Halleck, 789.

The Normans violated this law when they made the conquest of England, and, by confiscating the lands of the Saxons, kept the realm in a state of chronic rebellion for generations; and Saxon outlaws, in revenge for this spoliation, infested the forests and highways, setting the laws at defiance. England herself violated it again, when she made the conquest of Ireland, and that country continues in a condition little better than revolt even at this day, almost every estate being surrounded even yet by the descendants of its former owners, and only awaiting a successful rebellion to assert their claims. Other countries have furnished similar examples for thousands of years, showing how dangerous and impolitic it is to confiscate the titles of the nobility only, without going the length of this bill, which would strike at the homesteads of the great masses of people. In the first case, a single great landed proprietor in each county might be driven from his estates; while in the last, thousands would be rendered outlaws and desperate by depriving them of their homes. Surely at this day no one can expect anything but endless feud as the result of such a measure.

The honorable Senator from Illinois has said, and the honorable Senator from Michigan has backed him, that in all time, from the beginning, the persons and property of the conquered have been at the control of the conqueror. I beg leave, Mr. President, to dissent. To assert such a proposition, is to deny the existence of international law, because if the will of the conqueror is the law, then that is equivalent to saying there is no law at all; it is going back to barbaric times when there was no public law, when the cry was væ victis, and the victor did what he chose.

I assert, however, that the victor cannot lawfully now do what he pleases with either the persons or property of his victims. Can he kill his prisoners? Can he sell them into slavery? Surely not. And no more can he lawfully take from them the title to their lands, or touch in any way their private property, except as matter of necessity; and all this for the benefit of the conqueror even more than for the conquered, because every ıe conversant with war and the his-ry of war, knows that the more rictly it can be confined to a struggle etween State and State, and between ıe armed combatants of such States, ıe more easily will the object of it be tained, — that object in all wars be-g "peace." While, on the other ınd, if it be carried on so as to in-olve the population of the State in-ıded, to exasperate and imbitter them outrages either upon their persons property, then peace is impossible. ere, too, we may learn why private ersonal property at sea still continues able to seizure in war, because to ke it does not exasperate and imbit-r the contest as plunder on land ways does. Besides, the former is ound in ships which may be taken by ıe captor and carried into port, and ommitted to the care of an officer till ıe proper court determines the law-ılness of the prize, all of which is npossible, or nearly so, in the case of oods and chattels on land. These ıtter indeed have never been called rize of war, but "booty" or "plun-er," names which of themselves indi-ate that they were spoils which could ot very well find their way into the ublic treasury, and were, besides, not f much avail in enriching the soldiers, ho were always more debauched and ıjured than benefited by them.

But what, Mr. President, has been he consequence of this theory of con-iscation to us, — this doctrine that ar has no law but the will of the ictor? Have we derived benefit from t, or injury?

Now, sir, I believe that one of our ost disastrous blunders in the man-gement of the war, was in attempting o organize and legalize this immense ystem of plunder against the people f the rebellious States, under pretence hat the avails of that plunder would o into the Treasury, and pay the xpenses of the war. Nothing could ave been more unwise and impolitic, nd nothing could have resulted worse, even to the Treasury itself.

The first result was, to alienate our friends in those States, by making their property a something to be taken rather than protected, because every one knows that officers and agents would not discriminate much in favor of that loyalty which obeys the Government for the time being, and which lives in constant dread of the usurper if it disobeys him, and in constant fear of the legitimate government unless it openly resists him. They would just as likely plunder such a one as they would one of the real traitors, and such we have found to be the fact. Scarcely a man comes to us from those States, who does not report himself the victim of a double oppression; first he is plundered by the rebels because he yields to them a sullen and reluctant obedience; then, when the Union army should come to his rescue, it usually comes only to plunder him still more for having obeyed them at all. In this way we have lost most of the support we might have had there, which was invaluable to us in restoring the Union.

Again, the effect upon our armies and their officers has been most mischievous. They have been tempted away from their proper errand of liberating the people from the usurpers, and of winning them back to their allegiance by giving them that protection which is reciprocal to it, and they have gone after cotton and plunder. Have we not seen, day after day, as the result of this, that, and the other expedition, that a great quantity of cotton had been brought in? Indeed, the enemy seems to be almost lost sight of in the presence of this potent commodity, unless he chooses to interrupt the trade in it by inflicting a defeat upon us.

Our officers in the mean while have been confederating with "army sharks," and sharing with them in the accursed spoil till all that was noble and manly in their natures is gone in the mad race for plunder. And the common soldier was also taught to stain his hands and harden his heart in this unholy license, till, his honor gone, defeat was no more a disgrace.

Mr. President, nothing can be so painfully humiliating as to refer to the condition of things which is acknowledged to prevail in many places in the occupation of our armies. War is terrible at best, when all the humane and softening influences are brought to bear for its amelioration, but when law is disregarded, restraints are broken down, and the lessons of centuries forgotten, it becomes a scourge without anything to redeem it from execration; and in return for all this what have we gained? I assert that not a dollar has really come into the Treasury from it, if the accounts are fairly stated.

Another and worse result has been that we have been by this measure hindered, and perhaps prevented from attaining the object for which we struggle, the restoration of the Union, and, by imitating the barbarous policy of the rebels, we have been aiding them in their wicked enterprise.

It is easy to see that their policy and ours ought to have been entirely different; our mission was to restore a Union, theirs to destroy it; ours to reclaim and conciliate angry and excited populations, theirs to widen the breaches and aggravate differences; so that if in any case we imitated their barbarities we were really playing into their hands. It is one thing to put down a rebellion, and another and quite different thing to excite and maintain one. To achieve the former requires the humane genius of a Hoche, whereas to insure success in the latter nothing is better than to oppose it with the diabolical cruelty of an Alva.

Let the rebels themselves answer how this idea of wholesale confiscation has helped their cause. It did for them what they could not do for themselves; it made them united and desperate against us. Thousands and thousands of their people, who had been constrained to bow the knee to the Baal of disunion, now enthusiastically minister at its altars, because of our folly in threatening to confiscate their property. Indeed, I cannot conceive of anything more hurtful to our cause than to say to the people of the South, "If we succeed in suppressing the rebellion we will confiscate the estates of all those who have been engaged in it."

Mr. Wade. Give them a premium for rebellion.

Mr. Cowan. The honorable Senator from Ohio thinks that to refuse to confiscate would be a "premium for rebellion." So thought the world in barbarous ages; but the honorable Senator is a lawyer, and it has been in the line of his reading, so that he must know that the very reason why the old and barbarous rule was abolished was because it operated as a premium to rebellion; while the new rule, forbidding forfeitures and confiscations, has proved a bounty to loyalty and fidelity, — a guarantee of future reconciliation and peace.

Now, I know it is pretended that this law is only to apply to the case of actual traitors, but it is not so; it includes in its terms thousands and tens of thousands of persons who could not possibly be convicted in any court of the crime of treason, because it assumes a fallacy, and that is in this, that all are traitors who hold office under the Confederate States, and all those who refuse to lay down their arms after sixty days' notice by the proclamation of the President. This is not true in fact or in law.

Now, what is the law? In making this inquiry we need not go further than to Blackstone's Commentaries (volume four, page 77), where a very brief compend may be found of the common law as it has always prevailed in England; and it may be remarked here that the Statute of 11 Henry VII., chapter one, was only declaratory of the common law, which excuses the obedience paid to a king or government de facto: —

"When, therefore, a usurper is in possession, the subject is excused and justified in obeying and giving him assistance; otherwise, under a usurpation, no man could be safe, if the wful prince had a right to hang him r obedience to the powers in being, the usurper would certainly do for sobedience. Nay, further, as the ass of the people are imperfect dges of title, of which in all cases ssession is prima facie evidence, the w compels no man to yield obedience that prince, whose right is by want possession rendered uncertain and sputable, till Providence shall think to interpose in his favor and decide e ambiguous claim; and, therefore, ll he is entitled to such allegiance by ssession, no treason can be commit-d against him."

Here, then, is not only the common w, but the common sense of the case. could not be otherwise to merit the ame of law, and it only remains to quire as to the fact.

Let us go back a little, and see. At e commencement of the rebellion ore than one half the people of the onfederate States were opposed to the cession movement, and, wherever ey had an opportunity to express eir will, a majority in almost every tate voted against it. I think it can-ot be disputed that there was a ma-ority for the Union in every State ex-ept perhaps in South Carolina. How hen, it may be asked, was the will of hat majority set aside and contro-ened? I answer, by the fraud and orce of the secessionists, who had so anaged that before this time they ere in possession of all the depart-ents of the government in all the lave States except Delaware; Mary-and, where they had only the legisla-ature; Kentucky and Missouri, where hey had the governors but not the egislatures; and in all except those amed, having the machinery of the tate governments in their hands, they ere able, by means of that machinery, o put the Federal Government out of ossession of their several States, and t the same time to put it out of the ower of that Government for the time o give that protection to the people which they had a right to expect from t, and which was the consideration of their allegiance due to it. What position did that leave them in? What were they to do? They had no means of resisting their State governments, because those governments had not only the insignia of power over them, but they had the means of enforcing it. What did they do? Just what everybody in all times heretofore has done in like circumstances; they obeyed the governments in fact existing over them, and they looked for relief to the Government of the United States, the only power to which they could look, and which was bound by the Constitution which created it to repel invasions and put down rebellion in the several States. What did that Government do? Did it go immediately to their rescue, and punish the usurpers? Not at all, sir. The then President, Mr. Buchanan, was of opinion that he had no right to interfere between them and their State governments, and he and his Congress did nothing whatever to assert their supremacy or to deliver the people who had been overborne, but remained inactive till the expiration of his term, 4th March, 1861, a period of three months.

Now, what were these loyal men to think of this? Does any candid man think it was treason if some of them during that time had reconciled themselves to secession, had accepted office under a rebel State, nay, or had even assisted in organizing the confederacy? How were they to know whether the new administration of Mr. Lincoln would come down and help them or not, especially as it took several weeks itself after it got in before it was able to decide the question? And yet, sir, these are the men who are to be considered as felons under this act, and to have their estates forfeited absolutely because they did not without organization, without leaders, without arms, indeed without even authority, fight against their State governments, and stand up for their connection with the Federal Government, when that government had allowed itself to be ignominiously expelled without striking a blow for them; nay, when it had gone off giving them notice they were to expect no relief from it. Would it have been very strange if, when that government came back with its offers of protection, these loyal men had said, "It is too late; you left us when we most needed you, and now when we have made our peace and formed new relations, we will not return to you?" Surely, they might have said this to Mr. Buchanan with great force and propriety.

Well, Mr. Lincoln's administration having resolved to discharge its constitutional obligations by putting down the rebellion, had it any right to expect these people to return to their allegiance till it was in a condition to protect them? Was it not first bound to make that return perfectly safe before it could hope for any assistance from them? They were then in the toils of the confederacy, and to ask them to refuse obedience to it before we were in a condition to keep them from being hanged for that refusal, would be asking rather more that human nature is able to grant. When, then, were we able to protect them? was it after Bull Run, after the repulse before Richmond, after Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, or indeed after any of the terrible and sanguinary battles in which we have strugged to regain our supremacy? Have we not in some instances induced them to come to us after a temporary success, and then left them again to the tender mercies of the rebels?

I think, Mr. President, that our course in regard to these people has been of a character entirely the reverse of that which would have been successful in suppressing the rebellion. We were filled with incorrect ideas of the work we were engaged in, or of the only methods by which we could perform the gigantic task we had undertaken. We started out with exaggerated notions of our own strength, and we disdained to think that our success depended upon the loyal men of the South; we thought we did not need them, and treated them accordingly. Think of such a proposition as that contained in this law, that if they do not lay down their arms in sixty days they will be punished by loss of their estates! How, pray, are they to lay down their arms? Surely we know enough to know that this is mere mockery, and that the rebel president might as well expect a soldier in our armies to lay down his arms upon a promise of his protection.

Mr. President, I have sometimes doubted whether we could be serious when we expect any good results to come from such measures as this, which not only exposes us to ridicule, but does harm to our cause. What was wanting in this crisis of our history, with new criminal legislation, when the code was complete before? We had a statute punishing treason with death, a just and proper punishment, one well according with the magnitude of the crime as well as with the majesty of the law which inflicted it. For all those who conspired the dismemberment of the Republic, who used the means and perverted the State governments to bring it, this is the fitting punishment, because it is the highest, and falls upon the guilty alone, where it ought. I would have had no additional laws; in war they are not needed. I would have contemplated no reforms within the area of the rebellion; they cannot be made at such a time. What we wanted was men and money; these granted, the true function of Congress was over until peace was restored and all parties again represented. But, above all things, I would not have played into the hands of the enemy; I would not have done that which the rebels most desired to have done, because I have no doubt that this and all kindred schemes have been the very ones which they most wanted us to adopt. I do not know that Jefferson Davis ever prays; but if he does, I have no doubt he would pray——

Mr. Wade. Pray for just such an advocate.

Mr. Cowan. Pray for just such a atesman as the honorable Senator om Ohio, the most effective ally he ver had or could have.

He would have prayed for measures n our part which were obnoxious to l people of the South, loyal and dis-yal, union and disunion. He would ave prayed that we should outrage all eir common prejudices and cherished eliefs; that we should do these things y giving ourselves over to the guid-nce of men whom it was part of their eligion to hate; to hate personally and y name, with an intensity rarely wit-essed in the world before. He would ave prayed for confiscation, general nd indiscriminate; threatening as well e victims of the usurpation as the surpers themselves; as well those we ere bound to rescue as those we were ound to punish. Fervently he would ave prayed for our emancipation laws nd proclamations as means to fire the outhern heart more potent than all hers; they would rally the angry pop-lation to his standard of revolt as if ch had personal quarrel. He would en have a united South; while as e result of the same measures a dis-acted and divided North.

That is the way, I think, he would ave prayed and would pray now. Is ny man so stupid as not to know that e great desire on the part of every bel is to embark in revolt with him e whole people of the disaffected dis-icts? Is not and has not that been nsidered enough to insure success to m? And where does history show e failure of any united people, num-ering five or six millions, when they ngaged in revolution? Nowhere; ere is no such case.

What did we do to bring this unity out in the South? We forgot our rst resolve in July, 1861, to restore e Union alone, and we went further, nd gave out that we would also abol-h slavery. Now that was just exactly e point upon which all Southern men ere most tender, and at which they ere most prone to be alarmed and ffended. That was, of all things, the one best calculated to make them of one mind against us; there was no other measure, indeed, which could have lost to the Union cause so many of them. It is not a question either as to whether they were right or wrong,—that was matter for their consideration, not ours,— for if we were so desirous of a union with them we ought not to have expected them to give up their most cherished institutions in order to effect it. Unions are made by people taking one another as they are, and I think it has never yet occurred to any man who was anxious to form a partnership with another that he should first attempt to force that other either to change his religion or his politics. Is not the answer obvious; would not the other say to him, "If you do not like my principles why do you wish to be partner with me? Have I not as good a right to ask you to change yours as a condition precedent?"

So it was with the Southern people; they were all in favor of slavery, but one half of them were still for union with us as before, because they did not believe we were Abolitionists. The other half were in open rebellion because they did believe it. Now, can any one conceive of greater folly on our part than that we should destroy the faith of our friends and verify that of our enemies? Could not anybody have foretold we would have lost one half by that, and then we would have no one left to form a union with? We drove that half over to the rebels and thereby increased their strength a thousand-fold.

Is not all this history now? The great fact is staring us full in the face to-day; we are contending with a united people desperately in earnest to resist us. Our most powerful armies, most skilfully led, have heretofore failed to conquer them, and I think will fail as long as we pursue this fatal policy.

Now, Mr. President, I appeal to Senators whether it is not time to pause, and inquire whether that policy which has certainly united the Southern people in their cause, and which quite as certainly has divided the Northern people in their support of ours, ought not to be abandoned at once. Why persist in it longer? Can we do nothing to retrieve our fortune by retracing our steps? Can we not divide the rebels and unite the loyal men of the loyal States by going back to the single idea of war for the Union; or is it now too late? Have we lost irrecoverably our hold on the affections of our countrymen who were for the Union in 1861 — even in 1862? Is there no way by which we could satisfy them that we yet mean Union, and not conquest and subjugation? And what a difference in the meaning of those two phrases! The first offers the hand of a brother, the second threatens the yoke of a master. Or are we obliged now to exchange the hopes we had of Southern Union men for that other and miserable hope in the negro? Is he all that is left of loyalty in the South, and the only ally we can rely upon to aid us in restoring the Union? Ye gods! what have we come to at last? Either to yield to an unholy rebellion, to dismember an empire, or to go into national companionship with the negro. Is this the alternative to which our madness has brought us?

Mr. President, these things are enough to drive a sane man mad. After all our pretension, all our boasting, how absurd will we appear in the eyes of all other nations if we fail in this struggle! Especially as almost all the measures about which we have occupied ourselves for the last three years have been based upon our success already assumed as a fixed fact. We provided for confiscating the estates of rebels before we got possession; we emancipated slaves before we got them from their masters, and we provided for the disposition of conquests we have not made; we have disposed of the skin of the bear and the bear itself is yet uncaught. All this we have put upon the record; the statute-book will bear witness against us in all coming time; and we cannot escape the consequences if we fail.

Mr. President, our government was intended to be one of law, preëminently of law. There was to be nothing in the administration of it left to the arbitrary will of an individual or individuals. This was its merit, or intended so, par excellence. I am for preserving its character in that respect strictly. Let no man, from the President down to the most petty officer, dare do anything, whether to friend or enemy, except as warranted by law. Let us make war according to law, and let us have peace according to law. If we fight a belligerent enemy, let us do it according to the law of nations. If we punish or restrain a refractory citizen, let us do it by the law of the land, by "due process of law." Had we had faith in our Constitution and laws and our people, we had not been in our present condition. Had we made war, and war alone, the loyal people North and South to a man would have been with us. The voice of faction, if not entirely hushed, would have been harmless. The capital of the demagogue would have been worthless, and the nation would have been irresistible. Had we treated the negro as the Constitution treats him, as a person, as another man; had we made no distinction or difference between him and other citizens, we had not aroused against him that tribal antipathy which will be far more likely to destroy him than a false philanthropy will be likely to elevate him in the scale of being. If he was friendly to us, the same use could have been made of him that we have made; we could have enlisted him in our armies now as we have been enlisting him in our navy for long years. We could have received him as a volunteer, if he was able-bodied, without looking to his complexion, and we could have drafted him without inquiring into the relations which existed between him and his master, any more than we inquire into the relations of the white man of wenty years of age with his parent or is guardian. State laws adjusted all hose questions, but to the United States it made no difference whether ie owed service to individuals or not, ie owed his first duty to the Republic s military service if it was required. All this was lawful, and no loyal man ver did or would have complained of t, kindly done in the proper spirit.

I have only to say in conclusion, sir, hat I hope that the joint resolution will not be repealed, and that this and all kindred projects will fail in the future, for the simple reason that they strengthen the rebels by uniting their people with them, and they weaken the Union cause by dividing its friends and distracting them with unnecessary issues. Let us unite upon the single idea of suppressing the armed opposition to the Government. Let the energies of the nation be devoted solely to that purpose, and success may yet come, if success is possible.

THE HARRISON BAR LETTER.

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
Harrison's Bar, James River, July 4, 1862.

To the President: — I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch of the 2d instant.

I shall make a stand at this place, and endeavor to give my men the repose they so much require.

After sending my communication on Tuesday, the enemy attacked the left of our lines, and a fierce battle ensued, lasting until night; they were repulsed with great slaughter. Had their attack succeeded, the consequences would have been disastrous in the extreme. This closed the hard fighting which had continued from the afternoon of the 26th ult. in a daily series of engagements, wholly unparalleled on this continent for determination and slaughter on both sides.

The mutual loss in killed and wounded is enormous; that of the enemy certainly greatest. On Tuesday evening the 1st, our army commenced its movement from Haxall's to this point, our line of defence there being too extended to be maintained by our weakened forces. Our train was immense, and about 4 A. M. on the 2d a heavy storm of rain began, which continued during the entire day, and until the forenoon of yesterday.

The road became horrible. Troops, artillery, and wagons moved on steadily, and our whole army, men and material, was finally brought safe into this camp. The last of the wagons reached here at noon yesterday. The exhaustion was very great, but the army preserved its morale, and would have repelled any attack which the enemy was in condition to make.

We now occupy a line of heights about two miles from the James, a plain extending from there to the river. Our front is about three miles long. These heights command our whole position, and must be maintained. The gun-boats can render valuable support on both flanks. If the enemy attack us in front, we must hold our ground as best we may, and at whatever cost.

Our positions can be carried only by overwhelming numbers. The spirit of the army is excellent. Stragglers are finding their regiments, and the soldiery exhibit the best results of discipline. Our position is by no means impregnable, especially as a morass extends on this side of the high ground from our centre to the James on our right. The enemy may attack in vast numbers, and if so our front will be the scene of a desperate battle, which, if lost, will be decisive. Our army is fearfully weakened by killed, wounded, and prisoners. I cannot now approximate to any statement of our losses, but we are not beaten in any conflict. The enemy were unable, by their utmost efforts, to drive us from any field. Never did such a change of base, involving a retrograde movement, and under incessant attacks from a most determined and vastly more numerous foe, partake so little of disorder. We have lost no guns except 25 on the field of battle, 21 of which were lost by the giving way of McCall's division under the onset of superior numbers.

Our communications by the James River are not secure. There are points where the enemy can establish themselves with cannon or musketry and command the river, and where it is not certain that our gunboats can drive them out. In case of this, or in case our front is broken, I will still make every effort to preserve at least the personnel of the army, and the events of the last few days leave no question that the troops will do all that their country can ask. Send such reinforcements as you can. I will do what I can. We are shipping our wounded and sick, and landing supplies. The Navy Department should coöperate with us to the extent of its resources. Captain Rodgers is doing all in his power, in the kindest and most efficient manner.

When all the circumstances of the case are known, it will be acknowledged by all competent judges that the movement just completed by this army is unparalleled in the annals of war. Under the most difficult circumstances we have preserved our trains, our guns, our material, and above all, our honor.

G. B. McC., Maj-Gen.

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S LETTER OF ACCEPTANCE.

ORANGE, NEW JERSEY,
September 8, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter informing me of my nomination by the Democratic National Convention, recently assembled at Chicago, as their candidate at the next election for President of the United States.

It is unnecessary for me to say to you that this nomination comes to me unsought.

I am happy to know that when the nomination was made the record of my public life was kept in view.

The effect of long and varied service in the army during war and peace, has been to strengthen and make indelible in my mind and heart the love and reverence for the Union, Constitution, laws, and flag of our country, impressed upon me in early youth.

These feelings have thus far guided the course of my life, and must continue to do so to its end.

The existence of more than one government over the region which once owned our flag is incompatible with the peace, the power, and the happiness of the people.

The preservation of our Union was the sole avowed object for which the war was commenced. It should have been conducted for that object only, and in accordance with those principles which I took occasion to declare when in active service.

Thus conducted, the work of reconciliation would have been easy, and we might have reaped the benefits of our many victories on land and sea.

The Union was originally formed by the exercise of a spirit of conciliation and compromise. To restore and preserve it, the same spirit must prevail in our councils, and in the hearts of the people.

The reëstablishment of the Union in all its integrity is, and must continue to be, the indispensable condition in any settlement. So soon as it is clear, or even probable, that our present adversaries are ready for peace, upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilized nations, and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interests of the country, to secure such peace, reëstablish the Union, and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace — we ask no more.

Let me add what, I doubt not was, although unexpressed, the sentiment of the Convention, as it is of the people they represent, that when any one State is willing to return to the Union, it should be received at once, with a full guarantee of all its constitutional rights.

If a frank, earnest, and persistent effort to obtain those objects should fail, the responsibility for ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards.

I could not look in the face of my gal-comrades of the army and navy, who e survived so many bloody battles, and them that their labors and the sacrifice o many of our slain and wounded breth- had been in vain; that we had aban- ed that Union for which we have so n periled our lives.

A vast majority of our people, whether the army and navy or at home, would, I would, hail with unbounded joy the manent restoration of peace, on the basis he Union under the Constitution, with- the effusion of another drop of blood. no peace can be permanent without ion.

As to the other subjects presented in resolutions of the Convention, I need y say that I should seek, in the Consti- on of the United States and the laws ned in accordance therewith, the rule my duty, and the limitations of execu- power; endeavor to restore economy public expenditure, reëstablish the su- macy of law, and, by the operation of a e vigorous nationality, resume our com- nding position among the nations of the th.

The condition of our finances, the de- ci- on of the paper money, and the burdens thereby imposed on labor and capital, show the necessity of a return to a sound financial system; while the rights of citizens, and the rights of States, and the binding authority of law over President, army, and people, are subjects of not less vital importance in war than in peace.

Believing that the views here expressed are those of the Convention and the people you represent, I accept the nomination.

I realize the weight of the responsibility to be borne should the people ratify your choice.

Conscious of my own weakness, I can only seek fervently the guidance of the Ruler of the universe, and, relying on His all-powerful aid, do my best to restore union and peace to a suffering people and to establish and guard their liberties and rights,

I am, gentlemen,
very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

Hon. HORATIO SEYMOUR,
and others, Committee.

THE MEANEST MAN IN CREATION.

We ask the attention of readers to the owing extract from Judge Abbot's late ech at Boston: —

Let me ask for a moment who these men who denounce those who appeal to the ter part of man's nature? For twenty rs past they have endeavored to destroy Union; year in and year out they have nounced the glorious Constitution — the of our safety, as "a covenant with death l an agreement with hell;" who have uted at and denounced the Union as it s and the Constitution as it is, and these the men who denounce you and me. ey don't want the Union. They are the n who have talked about war, war that o last always, but who never have and ver will risk a hair of their own misera- heads. When they talk of war they an to risk the lives of your children and ne, while they remain at home. They belong to the class you have heard of before, who are willing to sacrifice all their wife's relations, and even consent to sacrifice their first cousins in the war, but not a mother's son of them will even get within the sound of a bullet.

They are the men who get your children and mine under false pretences — not for the Constitution, but for the negro. When they have got of us all they can get, — thank God they can get no more of mine, — their patriotism expends itself in buying negroes, and in sending to Germany for recruits to fight in a war they don't care anything about. Do you — I mean to be plain — do you want to know who is the meanest, most despicable creature, animal — I'll not call him man — who crawls? I'll tell you.

Voices — Wilson! Sumner!

Abbott — Gentlemen, don't call names.

I'll describe a class. It is the man who constantly appeals to the worst passions of our nature; who is constantly urging us to battle, and who has not courage, ability, or capacity to risk a hair of his own head. You think of that, and when you have found such a man, you have found one of the most miserable wretches who crawls. That is one class. There is another. They who are constantly denouncing us if we say a word for peace and Union. If you a these men to turn their pockets inside o you will find them stuffed with "gree backs," the spoils of your industry a mine. They want war because it mea power and spoils. Of course these pate patriots don't want to end the war. The are the men who find fault with us becau we want to restore the Union.

WATCHWORDS FOR PATRIOTS.

Mottoes for the Campaign, selected from General McClellan's Writings.

The true issue for which we are fighting is the preservation of the Union and upholding th laws of the general government. — Instructions to General Burnside, January 7, 1862.

We are fighting solely for the integrity of the Union, to uphold the power of our national go ernment, and to restore to the nation the blessings of peace and good order. — Instructions General Halleck, November 11, 1861.

You will please constantly to bear in mind the precise issue for which we are fighting; that i sue is the preservation of the Union and the restoration of the full authority of the general go ernment over all portions of our territory. — Instructions to General Buell, November 7, 1861.

We shall most readily suppress this rebellion and restore the authority of the government b religiously respecting the constitutional rights of all. — Instructions to General Buell, Nov. 7, 186

Be careful so to treat the unarmed inhabitants as to contract, not widen, the breach existin between us and the rebels. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

I have always found that it is the tendency of subordinates to make vexatious arrests on mer suspicion. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

Say as little as possible about politics or the negro. — Instructions to General Burnside, Jan uary 7, 1862.

The unity of this nation, the preservation of our institutions. are so dear to me that I hav willingly sacrificed my private happiness with the single object of doing my duty to my country — Letter to Secretary Cameron, October. 1861.

Whatever the determination of the government may be, I will do the best I can with th Army of the Potomac, and will share its fate, whatever may be the task imposed upon me. — Le ter to Secretary Cameron, October, 1861.

Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organization o States, nor forcible abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a moment. — Letter to Pres ident Lincoln, July 7, 1862.

In prosecuting this war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected subject to the necessity of military operations. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist; and oaths, not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor re ceived. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our presen armies. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

If it is not deemed best to intrust me with the command even of my own army, I simply ask to be permitted to share their fate on the field of battle. — Despatch to General Halleck, Augus 30, 1862.

By pursuing the political course I have always advised, it is possible to bring about a permanen restoration of the Union — a re-union by which the rights of both sections shall be preserved and by which both parties shall preserve their self-respect, while they respect each other. — Gen eral McClellan's Report.

I am devoutly grateful to God that my last campaign was crowned with a victory which saved the nation from the greatest peril it had then undergone. — General McClellan's Report.

At such a time as this, and in such a struggle, political partisanship should be merged in a tru and brave patriotism, which thinks only of the good of the whole country. — General McClel lan's West Point Oration.

SPEECH OF HON. ROBERT C. WINTHROP,

AT THE

Great Ratification Meeting in Union Square, New York,

SEPTEMBER 17, 1864.

I THANK you, fellow-citizens, for this friendly and flattering reception. I thank your honored President for the kind words in which he has presented me to you. I feel glad in being here under the lead of one who, as the gentleman who called the meeting to order well said, has added new honor to a name that was already associated with so much true and tried patriotism, with so much of spotless integrity, and with so much of financial and commercial wisdom. You know me, men of New York—if I may presume to imagine that you know me at all—as a member of the old Whig party of the Union, as long as that party had any organization or existence. (Cheers.) And I cannot help recalling the fact, on this occasion, that among my earliest political efforts, nearly thirty years ago, was a speech in this city against the Democratic candidates of that day. (Applause.) I fear that my faculty of making a speech, or certainly an open-air speech, is somewhat impaired by the lapse of years; but such as I can make is heartily at the service of the Democratic candidates of to-day. I could not find it in my heart to refuse the request of your Committee of Arrangements, seconded as it was by an old and valued friend, whom I knew so long ago as the tried and trusted friend of Daniel Webster, that I would at least be present as a witness of this great demonstration. Nor, being here, can I refuse to respond to the call which has been made on me by your honored President, and to bear my humble testimony to the cause in which you are engaged. It was promised me that I should see the greatest meeting ever held in America; and no one can doubt, I think, that the promise is fulfilled. It is, indeed, a glorious sight, this vast assemblage of American citizens, unseduced by patronage, unawed by power, in the great commercial metropolis of the Union,—itself one of the noblest products of that Union,—all rallying beneath a common banner, all animated by a common resolve; that banner, the Stars and Stripes—that resolve, to do all that in us lies for the rescue of our country from the dangers by which it is encompassed. (Cheers.) You are assembled in Union Square, and I am glad to know that you all intend to stand square on the platform of the Union. (Laughter and applause.) You are assembled on the anniversary of the day on which the Constitution of the United States received the attesting signatures of its framers; and I rejoice to be assured that you are all resolved to uphold the authority and vindicate the supremacy of that Constitution. (Applause.) Yes, my friends, in yonder city of Philadelphia, which we are glad to remember, in this connection, was also the birthplace of George B. McClellan, (Cheers,) on the 17th day of September, 1787, that sacred instrument was perfected, which has secured union and peace to our land for more than seventy years past, and which, if this day's ratification shall be successfully carried out, may still, I fondly hope and believe, secure union and peace to our land for seven times, or even for seventy times seventy years to come. (Applause.) You are assembled, too, on the anniversary of the day, when the noble candidate, whose nomination you are about to ratify, completed his great work of rescuing the capital of his country from the Confederate hosts by the glorious victory of Antietam. You have not forgotten those memorable days of September, '62, when the fate of our Republic seemed just trembling in the scales, when almost all men's hearts were failing them for fear, and when the gallant McClellan, forgetting the unmerited indignities to which he had just been subjected, — forgetting everything but his country's dangers and his own determination to stand or fall with its flag, — and responding without a murmur, or a moment's delay, to the personal appeal of the President, gathered up the scattered fragments of his brave but broken army, reorganized their shattered battalions as by the waving of a magician's wand, drove back the invaders across the Potomac, and once more secured the safety of Washington and of the Government. (Loud cheers.) I would not disparage the successes which have been achieved on other days and under other commanders. We all remember, with grateful admiration, the splendid victories which have been won, on the land and on the sea, by Meade and Grant and Sherman, by Porter and Kearsarge Winslow and the heroic Farragut, and by so many others of our generals and admirals. All honor to the heroes of Vicksburg and Chattanooga, of Gettysburg and Atlanta, of Mobile Bay, and of the blessed waters, whatever they are called, which at last ingulfed the Alabama; and all gratitude to the soldiers and sailors, by whose brave hearts and stout arms those victories were achieved! But none of them have eclipsed, or even dimmed, the brilliant record of the Army of the Potomac and its leader during those eventful days which ended at South Mountain and Antietam. For that gallant leader it is glory enough that it may be said of him, as the result of that brief but almost miraculous campaign, that, born in the birthplace of the Constitution, he was privileged, by an auspicious and beautiful coincidence, to commemorate its seventy-fifth birthday, by saving the capital of his country. But who of us is not ready to accept the omen, that it is still reserved for him who saved the Capital on that day, to save the country itself at this? (Loud applause.)

And now, fellow-citizens, you have not forgotten that this was the last military service which General McCllellan was permitted to perform in the defence of the Union. You have not forgotten that only a few weeks afterward he was summarily deprived of his command and sent into that retirement from which no patriotic offers of his own, and no persistent solicitations of his friends, have prevailed on the Administration to recall him. But the day is at length at hand when the people of the United States have the Constitutional opportunity and the Constitutional right to revise and reverse the decrees of the Administration; and most heartily do I hope that this one of their decrees, if no other, will be revised and will be reversed. Most eartily do I hope, that disregarding all onsideration of parties and platforms, nd with the single and simple view of estoring Union and Peace to our dis-acted land, the people of the loyal tates will resolve, by their votes in lovember next, to take up upon their wn shoulders this leader whom the ulers have rejected, and to bear him iumphantly into that same White louse from which the rejection has manated. That, as I understand it, the proposition before this meeting; nd for one, certainly, I gladly avail yself of the earliest opportunity which as been presented to me to express ny approval of it. Young men of lew York, and of the nation, will you ot take it in special charge, and see o it that this is done? The candidate hom we support is eminently a young nen's candidate, — the youngest in ears, I believe, that was ever nomina-ed for the Presidency; but who as won laurels in the field, and hown a discretion and a wisdom in ivil affairs, which would have done onor to the oldest. It ought to be he pride of Young America not only o see that he has fair play and a gen-rous support, but to secure him an pportunity of showing what young nen can do, and are destined to do, in he high places of the land, as well as n the field of battle. (Loud ap-lause.)

And yet let me not seem for a mo-nent, fellow-citizens, to put the great ssues of the approaching election on ny personal grounds. The question efore us is not about candidates, but bout our country; not about the elative claims or merits of Abraham incoln and George B. McClellan, but bout the nation's welfare and the ation's life. (Three cheers for Mc-Clellan.) In whose hands will that recious life be safest? That is the uestion; and I do not forget that it s a question of opinion, on which very man has a right to form, and very man has a right to follow, his wn opinion. I do not forget, either, ow many honest and excellent men, in my own and in other parts of the land, with whom I have heretofore delighted to take counsel in private and in public affairs, have come to different conclusions from my own. But I have not been able to resist the conviction, my friends, that the best interests of the country, and the best hopes of restoring the Union of the country, emphatically and urgently demand a change of administration at the approaching Presidential election. (Cheers.) I cannot resist the conviction, — or certainly the deep and earnest apprehension, — that, if the policy adopted and pursued by President Lincoln and his supporters during the last two years is to be persisted in for four years to come, we shall find ourselves plunged irretrievably into the fearful and fathomless abyss of disunion. I can enter into no detailed discussion of that policy on this occasion, nor can it wisely be discussed on any occasion, in the hearing of our Southern enemies. I can only say, that in my humble judgment it has been a policy calculated to divide and weaken the counsels of the North, and to unite and concentrate the energies of the South; and, beyond all question, it has accomplished that result, if no other. Why, my friends, the all-important end of reëstablishing the Union has been almost shut out of sight, so mixed up and complicated has it been with schemes of philanthropy on the one side, and with schemes of confiscation, subjugation, and extermination on the other. Instead of the one great Constitutional idea of restoration, we have been treated to all manner of projects and theories of reconstruction. There would almost seem to have been a willingness, in some quarters, to vie with our enemies themselves in discarding and destroying the old Constitution of our fathers. At one time we have had solemn propositions for annihilating whole States, whole systems of States, and blotting out their stars from the national banner. At another we have heard open declarations from the high places of the land, that we never again were to be permitted to have "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was." Good Heavens, what else are we fighting for? What other Union are we striving to establish? What other Constitution are we struggling to vindicate? What other Constitution are our rulers and legislators solemnly sworn to support? We might expect such declarations from Rebels in arms against the Government; but who can listen to them from loyal lips, without recalling the warning words of a great English statesman and orator, when he bade us "look with horror on those children of their country who are prompt rashly to hack that aged parent to pieces, and put him into the kettle of magicians, in hopes that by their poisonous weeds and wild incantations they may regenerate the paternal Constitution and renovate their father's life"! Heaven save us from any such regeneration and renovation as that. (Great applause.)

Fellow-citizens, we all know that it was the success of the Republican party, with its sectional organization and its alleged sectional objects, which furnished the original occasion, four years ago, for that atrocious and ungodly assault upon our Government, which inaugurated this gigantic civil war. ("That's so!" Applause.) We all know that the secession leaders of the South, who had so long been meditating the movement in vain, exulted in the election of Abraham Lincoln at that day, — as I fully believe they will exult again, if he is re-chosen in November, — because it supplied the very fuel which was needed for kindling this awful conflagration. That assault upon the Government can never be characterized in terms of too severe condemnation; and, if railing at the rebellion or its authors would do any good this evening, — if it would be anything better than baying at yonder moon, — I would join with you in denouncing it until the vocabulary of condemnation was exhausted. But we all know that the whole North rose nobly up, as one man, without distinction of party, to repel that assault; and that they have sustained the Government, — Democrats, Republicans, and Conservatives alike, — with all their hearts and hands, pouring out their blood and money like water, from that day to this. And the loyal States will continue to sustain the "powers that be" in all their constitutional action, until the end of their term, whatever may be the result of the pending election — not all of them, by any means, as approving the policy of the Administration, but all of them as recognizing its rightful possession of the authority of the Government. But no considerations of loyalty or of patriotism call upon them to go further. ("No," and cheers.) No considerations of loyalty call upon us to prolong the supremacy of a party whose art and part it has so eminently been to extinguish almost every spark of Union sentiment in the Southern breast, and to implant there in its stead a desperate and defiant determination never to be reconciled, never to submit or yield, never again to come under rulers, whom, reasonably, or unreasonably, they have learned so thoroughly to hate. No considerations of patriotism call upon us to renew the official term of an Administration, whose peculiar policy, by inspiring this spirit of desperation and hatred, has rendered the victories of our armies a hundred-fold harder to achieve, and has robbed them of so many of their legitimate results after they have been achieved. For never, my friends, do victories cost so much, and come to so little, as when they are wrung from a foe who has been goaded and maddened to despair. This sort of goading and maddening process may answer well enough for increasing the sport at a bull-fight, but it has certainly involved us in at least one Bull Run. ("Good," laughter and cheers.) And I fear the day is still distant when it will secure us at sort of victory which we can asonably hope to see followed by nion and Peace.

Nothing could be further from my rpose, in these remarks, than to st the slightest imputation upon the triotism of President Lincoln, or ybody else. No one can doubt that wishes to write his name on the ll of history as the restorer of the nerican Union. It is a title which ight satisfy the most exalted ambi-on. He may well be excused for s eagerness to remain in office until has accomplished the work. He ay almost be pardoned for wielding e enormous patronage and power nich belongs to the Executive in a ar like this, for securing his own mination and his own election, if he ally believes that he can accomplish

And those who are of opinion that is just about to succeed — whether ithin sixty days or ninety days — fore Christmas or after — are right give him their support. We would l support him if we were of their inion, for we want the country ved, no matter who is to have the ory. But President Lincoln is evi-ently looking forward to another tle in the history of the future. He sires to be enrolled as the great Lib-rator of the African race — a glori-us title, also, if it could be legiti-ately obtained. But I greatly fear at in aiming at the second, he has st the first. No man, I think, can elp perceiving, that he is so embar-assed and entangled by his proclama-ons and commitments and pledges regard to slavery, as to be almost capacitated for bringing this terrible truggle to an early and successful rmination. He has contrived to eave a Gordian knot, which he him-lf is unable to untie, and which the ravest and sharpest swords seem thus ar powerless to cut asunder. No one an have forgotten, certainly, that re-ent and most extraordinary manifesto "To Whom it may Concern," in which n reply to the very first sugges-ions of peace, he felt obliged to insert a condition which discomfited his best friends, and rendered all such efforts hopeless.

Fellow-citizens, we need a change of counsels. ("That's true." Applause.) We need a change of counsellors. We need a return to the policy on which the loyal States first rallied so unanimously to the suppression of the rebellion. We must go back to the principles embodied in the resolution adopted by the Congress of the United States, not far from the 4th day of July, 1861, and worthy to have been adopted on that hallowed anniversary itself, — adopted in the Senate on the motion of Andrew Johnson, and adopted in the House of Representatives on the motion of the lamented Crittenden. That terrible repulse at Bull's Run had then just taught us wisdom. Would to heaven that we had not so soon forgotten that lesson! If we had never departed from that resolution—if "ease had never recanted vows made in pain" —I firmly believe that Union and Peace would have been our blessed portion at this moment. You all remember that resolution. It embodied the simple policy of a vigorous prosecution of the war for no purpose of subjugation or aggression, in no spirit of revenge or hatred, with no disposition to destroy or impair the constitutional rights of any State or any section, but for the sole end of vindicating the Constitution and reëstablishing the Union. (Cheers.) That was the policy which would have divided the South, and which ought to have satisfied and united the North. Let me rather say that it was, and is still, the policy, which steadily pursued, under the lead of men against whom the whole Southern heart and mind and soul have not become hopelessly embittered and poisoned — under the lead of men, too, who are not ashamed to avow that readiness for reconciliation which is the highest ornament of the Christian character, and without which we cannot rely on the blessing of God—this, I say, is the policy which thus pursued will again, if anything earthly ever will, unite both

North and South in the bonds of Constitutional fellowship, and exhibit our country and its flag once more in the face of all the world, with "a star for every State, and a State for every star." And what a glorious day that will be, my countrymen, for us and for all mankind! If to yearn for it, and pant for it, and pray for it, be a subject for reproach, as exhibiting too great a willingness for peace, I am the guiltiest man alive. (Cheers.) And how can we hasten that day more effectively than by supporting the candidate who is the very impersonation of the policy I have described? Our noble candidate has enforced and illustrated it a thousand-fold better than any one else can do, in his memorable despatch from Harrison's Landing, in his brilliant oration at West Point, and still more recently in his admirable letter accepting the nomination we are assembled to ratify. (Three cheers for General McClellan.) These are the true platforms for the hour; and not for the hour only, but for all time. ("That's so.") We need no other, and some of us, certainly, can recognize no other. ("They're good enough.") I rejoice to see so many of their noble sentiments and golden sentences emblazoned on the countless banners and illuminations around me. Let us cherish them in all our memories and write them on all our hearts.

Yes, my friends, if anybody is disposed to cavil with you about your platform, tell him that Gen. McClellan has made his own platform, and that it is broad enough and comprehensive enough for every patriot in the land to stand upon. Tell him that you should as soon think of holding Gen. McClellan responsible for not taking Richmond, when he was so rashly interfered with, and so cruelly stripped of his troops on the right hand and on the left, as you should think of holding him responsible for any equivocal, or any unequivocal, words of Chicago Conventions or of any other conventions, which malicious partisans may attempt to pervert to his injury. Tell him that you should as soon think of the brave Army of th Potomac having been frightened fro following their gallant leader to th field by the Quaker guns on the roa side, as of his supporters for the Pres dency being scared from their positio by any paper pellets of the brain, wis or otherwise, which ever came fro the midnight sessions of a Resolutio Committee in the hurly-burly of National Convention. (Cheers.)

General McClellan, I repeat, ha made his own platform, which ough to be satisfactory to everybody. Hi letter of acceptance, especially, ough to be hailed with delight and with gra itude even by those who are too fa committed in other directions to giv him their support. (Applause.) It i worth an army with banners to th cause of the Union. It has the clario ring to rally a nation to the rescue. I speaks, too, in trumpet-tones to ou deluded brethren in rebellion, warnin them that there is to be no cessation o hostilities upon any other basis tha that of Union, but proclaiming to them that the door of reconciliation an peace is open on their resuming thei allegiance to the Constitution and law of the United States. And, certainly my friends, that letter of acceptanc has turned the flank of his revilers a handsomely as the gallant Sherman has turned the flank of Hood at Atlanta. (Laughter and applause.) It has taken away every pretext for those indecent and unjust insinuations against the patriotism and loyalty of all the opponents of the Administration, which have fallen from so many ruthless partisan pens, and from so many reckless partisan tongues. It has destroyed every pretence for the imputation, that there is a party at the North, ready for a precipitate and ignominious abandonment of the great struggle in which we are engaged, and willing to entertain propositions incompatible with the restoration of the Constitution and the Union. The Union — "the Union at all hazards" — is as distinctly the whole import of George B. McClellan's letter of the 8th of September, as "the Union any event" was of that Farewell ldress of George Washington, whose omulgation is so nearly associated th the day on which we are as- mbled. "The Union, — it must be eserved" — is as clearly the maxim McClellan in 1864 as it was of An- ew Jackson in 1832. A Democratic esident saved the Union then, and I lieve a Democratic President can ve the Union now. Let us rally, en, to the support of that great prin- ple of unconditional Unionism, which common to Washington, Jackson, and cClellan. Let us go for the flag, the hole flag, and nothing but the flag. Cheers.) Let us vindicate the rights free opinion, of free speech, of a free ess, and of free and unawed elec- ons (loud cheering), even in a time civil war, and show to all the world at we are, and still mean to be, a free people. (Voice — "We mean to be.") Let us bring no railing accusations against the patriotism of others, and let us treat all which are brought against our own patriotism with the contempt and scorn which they deserve. Let us furnish all the men and all the money which are required for the aid of our gallant defenders in the field, and bear the welfare of our soldiers and sailors ever uppermost in our hearts. And as we throw out our McClellan banners to the breeze, let the word still and ever be, alike to friend and foe: "The Union is the one condition of peace. We ask no more. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards."

Mr. Winthrop closed amid loud applause, followed by "three cheers for the speaker."

HENRY CLAY.

XTRACT FROM A SPEECH OF THE HON. HENRY CLAY, IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, ON THE SUBJECT OF ABOLITION PETITIONS, FEBRUARY 7, 1839.

"Sir, — I am not in the habit of peaking lightly of the possibility of dis- olving this happy Union. The Senate nows that I have deprecated allusions, n ordinary occasions, to that direful vent. The country will testify, that, if here be anything in the history of my ublic career worthy of recollection, it is he truth and sincerity of my ardent de- otion to its lasting preservation. But ve should be false in our allegiance to it f we did not discriminate between the maginary and the real dangers by which t may be assisted. Abolition should no onger be regarded as an imaginary dan- ger. The Abolitionists, let me suppose, ucceed in their present aims of uniting he inhabitants of the Free States as one nan, against the inhabitants of the Slave States. Union on the one side will be- get union on the other.. And this process of reciprocal consolidation will be at- ended with all the violent prejudices, mbittered passions, and implacable ani- mosities which ever degraded or deformed human nature. A virtual dissolution of the Union will have already taken place, whilst the form of its existence remains. The most valuable element of union, mutual kindness, the feelings of sympathy, the fraternal bonds, which now happily unite us, will have been extinguished forever. One section will stand in menacing and hostile array against the other. The collision of opinion will be quickly followed by the clash of arms. I will not attempt to describe scenes which now lie happily concealed from our view. Abolitionists themselves would shrink back in dismay and horror at the contemplation of desolated fields, conflagrated cities, murdered inhabitants, and the overthrow of the fairest fabric of human government that ever rose to animate the hopes of civilized man. Nor should these Abolitionists flatter themselves, that, if they can succeed in their object of uniting the Free States, they will enter the contest with a numerical superiority that must insure victory. All history and experience proves the hazard and uncertainty of war; and we are admonished by Holy Writ, "that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong." But if they were to conquer, whom would they conquer? A foreign foe? one that had invaded our shores, insulted our flag, and laid our country waste? No, sir; no, sir. It would be a contest without laurels, without glory, — a self, a suicidal conquest, — a conquest of brothers over brothers, — achieved by one over another portion of the descendants of common ancestors, who, nobly pledging their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, had fought and bled, side by side, in many a hard battle on land and ocean, severed our country from the British crown, and established our national independence.

The inhabitants of the Slave States are sometime accused by their Northern brethren with displaying too much rashness and sensibility to the operations and proceedings of Abolitionists. But, before they can be rightly judged, there should be a reversal of conditions. Let me suppose that the people of the Slave States were to form societies, subsidize presses, make large pecuniary contributions, send forth numerous missionaries throughout all their own borders, and enter into machinations to burn the beautiful capitals, destroy the productive manufactories, and sink into the ocean the gallant ships of the Northern States. Would these incendiary proceedings be regarded as neighborly, and friendly, and consistent with the fraternal sentiments which should ever be cherished by one portion of the Union towards another? Would they excite no emotion, occasion no manifestations of dissatisfaction, nor lead to any acts of retaliatory violence? But the supposed case falls far short of the actual one, in a most essential circumstance. In no contingency could these capitals, manufactories, and ships rise in rebellion and massacre inhabitants of the Northern States.

"I am, Mr. President, no friend of slavery. The Searcher of all hearts knows that every pulsation of mine beats high and strong in the cause of civil liberty. Whenever it is safe and practicable I desire to see every portion of the human family in the enjoyment of it. But I prefer the liberty of my own country to that of any other people; and the liberty of my own race to that of any other race. The liberty of the descendants of Africa in the United States is incompatible with the safety and liberty of the European descendants. Their slavery forms an exception — an exception resulting from a stern and inexorable necessity — to the general liberty in the United States. We did not originate, nor are we responsible for, this necessity. Their liberty, if it were possible, could only be established by violating the incontestable powers of the States, and subverting the Union. And beneath the ruins of the Union would be buried, sooner or later, the liberty of both races."

WATCHWORDS FOR PATRIOTS.

Mottoes for the Campaign, selected from General McClellan's Writings.

If it is not deemed best to intrust me with the command even of my own army, I simply ask to be permitted to share their fate on the field of battle. — Despatch to General Halleck, August 30, 1862.

By pursuing the political course I have always advised, it is possible to bring about a permanent restoration of the Union — a re-union by which the rights of both sections shall be preserved, and by which both parties shall preserve their self-respect, while they respect each other. — General McClellan's Report.

I am devoutly grateful to God that my last campaign was crowned with a victory which saved the nation from the greatest peril it had then undergone. — General McClellan's Report.

At such a time as this, and in such a struggle, political partisanship should be merged in a true and brave patriotism, which thinks only of the good of the whole country. — General McClellan's West Point Oration.

ADDRESS OF

HON. GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS

AT PHILADELPHIA, SEPT. 30, 1864.

ENTLEMEN OF PHILADELPHIA: —

Some of you have done me the great onor to invite me to deliver an address here on the present state of the ountry, and the issues involved in the pproaching presidential election. The omination of General McClellan to he presidency by the Democratic par-y, affords to me an ample reason for omplying with your invitation. For nany long and weary months it has een my constant hope that the Amer-can people would come at length to ppreciate and sympathize with his haracter, and would perceive how his ublic principles are identified with he welfare of the country and the afety of its institutions. There is a easonable prospect that such a condi-ion of the public mind respecting this listinguished man will be reached; eached in spite of malignant detrac-ion, in spite of official oppression and ersecution, without the slightest sac-ifice of his personal dignity, without shadow of change on his part, and hrough the simple power of a true nd upright character to vindicate it-elf. My estimate of him is not, so far as I can perceive, the mere result of personal regard, or of narrow habits of observation. Having known and lived with persons of marked character all my life, I do not see any sufficient reason for mistrusting my own judgment in this particular instance, and I do not imagine that anybody can suggest any good reason why I should not publicly express it.

It is now eighteen years, or more, since I first met General McClellan, for a single evening, in a domestic circle in New England, where he had come to attend the marriage of one of his kindred. He was then a young lieutenant in the army, recently graduated from West Point; alert, full of intelligence, and impressing all whom he met by a remarkable combination of spirit and modesty. But from that time I had not particularly observed him, until my attention was suddenly arrested by a very striking opinion and prediction concerning him, uttered by a veteran officer of the army, of high rank and great experience, who has been long retired, but who had followed the career of McClellan, as he has the careers of all the men who have been educated at West Point for the last forty years, with the closest observation. This gentleman, whose authority in all military affairs stands very high, was asked by a friend, in the summer of 1861, at the time when it began to be rumored that General Scott, from his increasing bodily infirmity, might be obliged to retire, who there was that would be fit to take General Scott's place? He answered immediately, "General McClellan, who is now fighting his way through Western Virginia. If he is put at the head of the army, the government and the country will be safe."

From that period until General McClellan was removed from all active service, for no assignable or creditable reason, I followed his course with the strongest interest, and when he came to the city of New York to reside, in the early part of the winter of 1862–3, I sought to renew our acquaintance, and have since been honored by his friendship. The opinions, therefore, which I have formed concerning him, are not founded solely upon observation of his public acts or writings; although there is but little need to put forward the judgments of private intercouse. General McClellan's qualities as a man and a statesman stand before the world upon tests which all intelligent persons can apply. His accomplishments as a soldier are by no means the limit of his powers. A broad, capacious, and cultivated intellect, well instructed in the principles and history of our institutions; a great faculty for calm and wise thinking; a solid judgment; a power of self-control that has been tried by greater and worse provocations than even Washington was subjected to, and that has proved as strong as Washington's; a sagacity in perceiving the characters of men, which will insure him, I confidently predict, from unworthy influences, strong religious principle, entire purity of life, and fervent patriotism — these are some of the characteristics of a man who, still under the age of forty, has a wider personal popularity than any other living American. How strange it would be now, that a great party has named such a man for the highest office in the land, and has assumed his public principles as its policy, if he were not to be the choice of a majority of the people! How strange it is, that such a man should be the subject of gross misrepresentation and misconception! One hears, occasionally, from persons otherwise intelligent, an amount of prejudice concerning General McClellan, and a degree of credulity equal to the reception of the most monstrous fabrications, that are so astonishing that one is tempted to ask how such persons can have acquired such impressions or what their modes of forming their opinions can be. But the influence of party over the mind is too old a thing to need elucidation, and the arts by which the unscrupulous make use of that influence have not been invented for this particular era. It will be a good proof of our intelligence and virtue, as a people, if we shall now break that influence and defeat those arts.

Notwithstanding my great personal regard for General McClellan, I certainly would not vote for him, or urge others to do so, if I believed that there was the slightest danger of his proving, in the office of President, to be anything but the firm and independent man that I conceive him to be. In my opinion, there is no ground whatever for any apprehension on this point. I do not indeed think that his independence is of that quality that will lead him to disregard the counsels of the wise and the good; but I firmly believe that it is of a quality that will prevent the counsels of those who are not wise and good from ever approaching him. If any man labors to bring about Gen. McClellan's election in the expectation that he can thereby accomplish any selfish personal scheme, or any public plan or project that is not as comprehensive as the Union, and as beneficent as the Constitution itself, in my judgment he will make a great mis-

e. If any man shall refrain from ing for him in the belief that his ministration will be influenced by y person or persons in whom the ple of this country ought not to fide, such a man will also, I believe, atly err.

I know how difficult it has been de for the American people to ieve in public virtue. Private or rsonal virtue we can believe in. t our politics have been so degra- d by tricks of deception, our politi- ns have so often compelled the peo- to distrust them, — that when a n, placed suddenly in a conspicu- s and responsible position as a can- date for our suffrages, is called upon declare his principles, one of our st impulses is to regard what he ys, as a snare for our votes. This a miserable habit, but it is not with- t its causes. All I can do to coun- act it in this instance is, to tell u frankly what I think about Gen- al McClellan's letter accepting the mination, and about the man who ote it.

Be good enough, then, to remember e thing, that General McClellan, ile he has the perceptions, qualities, d knowledge of a statesman, is not politician. He has never been ac- stomed to practice the arts by hich elections are carried, and I do t believe that he ever wrote a line his life for mere political effect, or e that did not express his honest nvictions. His letter accepting the mination was written to give to the eople of this country his ideas of the inciples on which a national admin- tration ought, in this crisis, to be nstituted; and to state the princi- s on which it must be constituted y him, if he is to be the next Presi- ent. That he will be likely, under ny "pressure," to pursue any other ourse, or that he will ever be found to ave said one thing and to do another, have no shadow of apprehension.

Of course it was impossible for him o do anything more than to lay down he general principles that must guide him, if he is placed in the high office to which he has been named. But if you will take that letter and examine it carefully and without prejudice, you will find that it states the only policy by which there can be any hope for a reunion of the whole people of this country under one flag and one government, — the flag and the government of the United States. It is very easy for this man or that to find a particular fault, or to pick a particular flaw in it; but if any man will take his pen in his hand and sit down to state a course of policy that can give peace to this country, and at the same time reëstablish its government over the whole of its territory, he will find that if he varies essentially what is contained in that letter, he will have introduced or omitted something, the introduction or omission of which an enlightened and sound judgment must pronounce to be, in all human probability, absolutely fatal to any prospect of success. So at least, it has appeared to me. Knowing as I did, that when the nomination came, the answer to it would emanate directly from the mind of a man who had calmly surveyed the whole field of our national troubles, who has now been for some time removed from the immediate turmoil of public affairs, who has kept himself aloof from political entanglements, who has neither asked or desired political preferment, and who has at the same time watched from day to day and with a careful eye the military and the political aspects of this great civil war, I was prepared for a wise and well considered response. I was not disappointed. To me, under all the circumstances of the nomination, considering the various and conflicting views which our opponents attributed to the several parts of the great party which nominated him, — the firmness, the candor, and the precision of his answer stand as the surest guarantees of his own future course, and of that of the party whose leader he has become. If the American people cannot so regard it, I know not where, or how we are to find the qualities that shall "give the world assurance of a MAN."

It is a remarkable evidence of General McClellan's intellectual powers, that he not only perceived, at the very first, the magnitude and character of the military struggle that was about to take place between the two great sections of this country, but that he comprehended the civil relations of the federal government to the people of the revolted States more accurately, and with a wider grasp, than most of our statesmen. That his views were so correct and so extensive, must be regarded, when we consider his age, as quite extraordinary. At the beginning of the war he was just five and thirty. Where else was there a man of that age in the United States whose opinions, respecting the character and relations of this great civil dissension, which had sundered an empire, would bear to be tested by the true theory of the institutions of the country? Between the opinion that there could be no coercion of the people of a revolted or seceded State, and the opinion that the federal government could throw off all the restraints of the Constitution and proceed to subjugation, there was certainly a middle ground of reason and of law. That ground General McClellan occupied from the first. Before the two houses of Congress had declared that ground in the resolution which the Republican Administration and its party afterwards so signally and fatally deserted, he applied it in all his military conduct in Western Virginia; and after he arrived in Washington, in August, 1861, and proceeded to form the Army of the Potomac, and to lay out a great campaign, the very first paper which he submitted to his official superiors, and all his orders and instructions to his subordinates, show what his conception was of the only lawful and constitutional theory on which the war could be waged by the government of the United States.

His view appears to have been this. The government of the United Stat is a government of direct and sovereig powers, granted to it by solemn cessi of the people of each State. It h therefore a right to put down all mi tary or other forcible resistance to t exercise of its constitutional powers any State. But it can have no right acquire by force powers which have ne er been conferred upon it by the Cons tution, and which cannot be exercis under the Constitution; and it ca therefore never treat a State, or t people of a State, as if they had forfei ed their right of self-government those matters to which the Constit tion of the United States does not e tend. Taking this just and accura view, he appears to have entertain the hope that after the Southern armi had been defeated, the people of t seceded States would find it most e pedient to abandon their plan of a se arate government and resume the constitutional obligations. But in o der to aid this tendency, if such a te dency could be developed in the Soutl he saw very clearly that a humane, ci ilized, and just policy toward the pe ple of those States was absolutely e sential to success; and having bee educated in the high principles wit which modern civilization surroun the exercise of war by Christian nation and recognizing the fact that this co test had taken the proportions of great war, he strove, in all that he di and all that he inculcated, to impre such a policy upon all its operation Nay more, he strove to impress tha policy upon the action of the gover ment. It is all embodied, as yo know very well, in the celebrated lett which he addressed to President Li coln from Harrison's Bar.

When Mr. Lincoln received that le ter he had in General McClellan an er tirely disinterested and patriotic advis er. When the President made up hi mind not to pursue such a policy a General McClellan recommended, bu on the contrary to pursue a directly op posite course, forced upon him by wha he himself described as the "pressure a faction of his own party, he not ly surrendered to the judgment of s contemporaries and of history the sdom of his act, but by his subseent conduct toward General McClel-n he surrendered to the judgment mankind his own character for mag-nimity and justice. Whatever might his opinion, or the opinion of others, specting General McClellan's views the conduct of the war, he knew that eneral McClellan had served him as e head of the government, and had rved the country with perfect fidelity d honor, and that both President and ople owed to that general a large bt of gratitude. Yet he has permit-l General McClellan to be pursued his partizans with an almost unpareled malignity, when he might at y time have stopped the current of traction. The power which a Presint of the United States can exercise er his party organs, and that portion his followers who are most prone to ack the character of others by unrupulous defamation, is as great as e power of any monarch over his urtiers; and when that power is not ed to restrain and rebuke such defa-ation in the case of a man eminent-conspicuous and important to the untry, it is a just and proper inferce that the power has not been exered because he who holds it is willing at the injury should be done. Be e verdict of posterity, therefore, what may, respecting the wisdom of Mr.

ncoln's rejection of General McCleln's policy, and his removal from com-and, it will be held hereafter as it ust now be held by all unprejudiced inds that, as an impartial ruler and as a just man, Mr. Lincoln owed it the country, to himself, and to the neral who had so faithfully and truly rved both, to protect that general's putation from attacks which he knew be malicious, and from imputations ich he knew to be unfounded. This ty he has entirely failed to perform.
et it was a duty plainly incumbent on him, both as a man and as the exutive head of this nation.

But I did not come here to discuss the personal relations of the two men who are now the representatives of two opposite parties, and on the election of one or the other of whom the weal or the woe of our country is, as I believe, to depend. I wish to state the issues, and to state them fairly, in an appeal to your reason and intelligence; and I wish if possible to clear those issues of all irrelevant matter. In this effort, my first duty is, to state the Democratic policy, as represented by the candidacy in which General McClellan stands before the country, according to my conception of his position. Of course, I look for that position where the country looks for it, in General McClellan's letter accepting the nomination.

I beg you not to think that it was merely out of regard to his own consistency that General McClellan made the answer which he did make to the Chicago nomination. Consistency is a very important thing to a man who has a great reputation at stake, and whose usefulness depends upon the preservation of the public respect for his steadiness of character and purpose. But there are duties incumbent upon a patriot which are at least as great as the duty of personal consistency, and one of those duties in addition to the duty of being consistent, General McClellan has performed most nobly on this occasion, and to my entire satisfaction as I hope it will prove to yours also.

All will agree, who are not ready to court vast public dangers, that the preservation of the Constitution of the United States is, or should be, the object of all our efforts. To me it appears very clearly that for both sections of the Union, for the South as well as for the North, the Constitution affords the only means by which we of the North can restore the Union, or by which they of the South can reënter it.

It cannot be doubted that the Constitution is in the greatest possible peril. On the one hand, it has been so wrenched out of its appropriate working and its true meanings by those who have for four years been charged with its administration, that great numbers of men have been made to feel that instead of being the best it is the worst government on earth. On the other hand, there are those who, despairing of the attainment of peace under the forms of the Constitution, which they have seen perverted as they believe, into the means of prolonging the war, and promoting disunion have turned their thoughts to other methods, and have forecast in various modes of reconstruction, some new arrangement of our national existence, that would imply a new national government. Sectional ideas and interests, other than those which mark the distinctions between North and South, begin to intrude themselves among these discontents. Men in the West speculate upon its relations with the East and with the centre. Men in the central States look upon both sides of them, and are reflecting on the relative strength and importance of the ties which go eastward and westward. All are uneasy and anxious about the particular relation of their own or of some other section to the causes and differences which produced, or which still keep open, this great schism that has separated the South from the rest of the Union. Meanwhile, the burden of taxation is settling down upon the whole people with a terrible weight, and men begin to realize the magnitude of a public debt which they fear is already beyond the just resources of the country to pay, for which they can see no limitation ahead, and which is expressed in a fluctuating currency — the most demoralizing of all the financial conditions into which a nation can be thrown.

Every reflecting person will admit, then, that here is a state of things which imposes upon any man who has a part to play in public affairs a very stringent duty — the duty of defending and preserving that CONSTITUTION, which not only forms the existing bond that now holds us together as a people, but which affords the only possible means by which we can reach any improvements in our system without revolution and its attendant risks of anarchy, as it is, in my judgment, the only means by which we can win back to the national fold the members who have gone astray from it.

These considerations, then, will be allowed by all reasonable men, as furnishing a sufficient ground for insisting that the just authority of the federal government shall be preserved, and that whatever modifications are hereafter to be made in our national system they must be made according to the forms and method which the Constitution prescribes. I hold this to be a principle absolutely essential to the safety of our American institutions. I have lived through one scene of revolution enacted, to be sure, on a small scale, and in a community in which I was interested only as a near neighbor, in which it was attempted to make a new government by substitution, without resorting to the sanction and consent of the existing government to the proposal of change; and I never wish to see a repetition of that process. I allude, of course, to the case of Rhode Island and its civil war. I have, indeed, read elaborate discussions, in which a process of making a new Union outside of the methods of amendment, provided for by the Constitution, have been worked out on paper; but I have never seen one which was not marked by a fatal hiatus — that did not leave open a door through which anarchy would be almost certain to enter; or one that did not necessarily admit itself to be a revolution.

There is, therefore, in my opinion, a very important principle, as well as sound policy, involved in the position taken by General McClellan. That position is that the Southern States shall return to the Union; and that if they do so we will receive them and guarantee to them all the rights which the Constitution has ever secured to them. Is there anything unreasonable in this requirement, anything which will be likely to cause the people of the South to reject it when it shall be proposed to them by a great popular vote of the North which shall remove the present administration from office? Let us see.

The people of the South must see, as well as we do, that when a popular government like that of the United States has been in operation for nearly eighty years, resting upon certain principles which have made a powerful nation out of a feeble confederacy, while it has a perfectly well-defined method of meeting all requirements of change, cannot be set aside with safety, for the purpose of making another system by mere substitution. They, as well as we, require for national safety a principle that is able to make a vigorous nationality strong enough to cope with any external enemy that the world can present to us; but we cannot preserve the power and attitude of a great nation, if we are to set aside that principle, and go into the formation of a new confederacy by agreement of the two sectional parts of that nation. The hazards are too great, and the people of both sections ought to see that it is neither necessary nor wise to incur those hazards. The Constitution we can amend, in its orderly and regular method, if it requires amendment, but we cannot set aside the principle of union which makes us a nation, and which is as essential to their welfare and safety as it is to ours.

These truths I expect to see the people of the South recognize, if we can furnish them with the evidence that we require nothing more of them than their return to the Union. The Democratic party, speaking through General McClellan, has done all that it can do, at present, to give this assurance. If the people of the North will sanction this policy by their votes, and the people of the South really desire peace and reunion, this long and bloody civil war can be brought to an honorable and successful termination. It is plain, however, that one of the first things to be done hereafter will be to ascertain if the people of the South desire to return to the Union, and to promote as well as we can, without compromising the authority of the Federal Government, any existing wishes of that kind.

The great misfortune of the case and what creates the chief difficulty, arises from the character and conduct of Mr. Lincoln's administration. It is an administration which does not appear to have had any course of action that could be dignified with the name of a policy. It has lived from hand to mouth on a series of expedients. No one connected with it has been able to hold out to the South a steady, consistent system based on a correct constitutional theory of the war, and leading to a simple and definite constitutional end. This is the reason why multitudes of men in the North have not been able to support Mr. Lincoln's prosecution of the war, and why there has been no Union party in the South. Measures lying wholly outside of the Constitution, or at least lying wholly within very debatable ground, have been resorted to in terrorem for the purpose of being used as auxiliary to the exercise of military force — such as the sweeping edicts of confiscation and emancipation, and the plans of the President for making constructive States within the domains of the States now claiming to be seceded from the Union. The consequence of all this has been to convince the people of the South that the triumph of the military power of the United States involves the loss of all their property, and the destruction of that principle of our system which makes every State the uncontrolled regulator of its domestic institutions. So much for the past. A new drama now opens.

Mr. Lincoln is a candidate for rëelection; and we have under his own hand, since he became a candidate for rëelection, a direct, authentic, and perfectly plain declaration of the conditions on which he will consent to receive the people of the South back into the Union. It is in these words:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON July 18, 1864.

To whom it may concern: —

Any proposition which embraces the restoration of peace, the integrity of the whole Union, and the abandonment of slavery, and which comes by and with an authority that can control the armies now at war against the United States, will be received and considered by the Executive Government of the United States, and will be met by liberal terms on other substantial and collateral points, and the bearer or bearers thereof shall have safe conduct both ways. ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

I have no right to impute to Mr. Lincoln purposes which he has not expressed, or reservations which he has not made. I have seen a great many ingenious explanations written by his political friends, to show how the President did not say that he would not receive and act upon other propositions which he did not mention. But I think if I were to read that paper to a jury of twelve intelligent men, who knew the subject to which it relates, and were to ask them to infer from it that Mr. Lincoln did not mean to make the abandonment of slavery one of three conditions on which he is willing to have a restoration of the Union, I should provoke a very significant smile. As plainly as the English language can speak, he couples together "the restoration of peace," "the integrity of the whole Union," and "the abandonment of slavery," as the three things which must be presented to him in one proposition, by the power that now controls the Southern armies. A proposition, he says, embracing these three things, will be met by the executive government of the United States — how? By liberal terms on those three points? Not at all; they will be met by liberal terms on "other substantial and collateral points." The language is carefully framed to exclude the idea that there can be any more liberality about the point of slavery than about the restoration of peace and the integrity of the Union. The one is as much a fixed purpose with Mr. Lincoln as the two others. He knows that both sections of the country have so understood him, and to this day he has never uttered a word to correct that impression. We are bound to believe that he does not wish to correct it.

Here then is a position which "goes a whole bar's length" beyond the reservation to the supreme court of the question what has become of slavery in the progress of the war. Speaking in a paper addressed to every man on earth who can read English and has any concern in knowing his views, and dealing at the same time with the restoration of peace and the preservation of the integrity of the Union, Mr. Lincoln makes a positive requirement of the abandonment of slavery as an essential feature of any proposition on which he will treat. He did not mean to "palter in a double sense." He meant to be understood. He has been understood. The issue is made up between him and the Democratic party, on this point. If he changes that issue he comes over to us, so far as this matter is concerned. For, my friends, let it be observed that the Democratic party, speaking through General McClellan, its candidate, while it demands the restoration of peace and the integrity of the Union, has not made the condition of the abandonment of slavery essential either to peace or Union. There can be no mistake about General McClellan's position any more than about Mr. Lincoln's. We ask, says General McClellan, nothing but the Union. We, says Mr. Lincoln demand with the Union the abolition of slavery. You of the South, says the one, can come into the Union as you were before you left. You can come into the Union, says the other, but you must abandon slavery before your proposition to return can be considered.

Now let us inquire calmly, which of these courses of action is likely to give peace to this country; present and lasting peace. For the attainment of Mr. Lincoln's object, it is but rational to suppose that absolute and complete subjugation of the white race is essential. It is not within the limits of probability, that the people of the Southern States will consent to abolish slavery at our dictation, until the white race there is so reduced that its consent will be practically unimportant, and will therefore cease to be necessary. The consequence will be that you will have on your hands, for government, a country as large as Europe, in which the whites will be unwilling, if they are able, and unable if they are willing, to coöperate in carrying on civil government. You must govern the country by the sword until you can introduce a new white population, and even then you must constantly interfere to settle the question as to which race is to be the predominant one. The result must be substantially a state of war for generations, or a reduction of vast portions of our country to a condition resembling that of other countries in which African slavery has been improvidently and summarily abolished. That we could make such a country pay the cost of governing it, no rational being can suppose; and that we ourselves can pay the taxes requisite, is just as far from being a rational conjecture.

Mr. Lincoln, I think, before he committed himself to such a course, should have considered where he was carrying the public credit of the United States. The financial scheme on which his administration has been managed has made the property of every man in this country, even that of the depositors in our savings banks, dependent for its value upon the safety and redemption of the public debt. If this war is to be conducted for the object propounded by Mr. Lincoln, that debt is absolutely illimitable, and must consequently become worthless, without any distinct act or acts of repudiation. If, on the other hand, we can have by a change of administration, a definite and constitutional end before us — if peace and reunion on the basis of the Constitution can be secured — the Democratic administration can address itself to the financial measures necessary to protect the public credit, by husbanding its resources, and by a vigorous application of economy to the public expenditures. That it will do so is morally certain, for no political party can, under any conceivable circumstances, assume the awful responsibility of ruining a nation and all its people by a voluntary repudiation.

If there is one thing of which the Democratic party has a right to boast, it is its management of the national credit. That credit has never been injured in Democratic hands, and for myself I do not believe that it ever will be, while the continued existence of the Union shall enable us to have any public credit all. But you can destroy the national credit by the same kind of process by which you can destroy the Union, and that is, by embarking in projects for which the Constitution affords you no warrant, and which open expenditures, compared to which all the present cost of this wasteful and extravagant war are as the drop which you can suspend from your finger to the illimitable ocean.

In every possible light in which it can be viewed, I deprecate this requirement which Mr. Lincoln has made a joint condition with the restoration of peace. It strikes at the principle which lies at the basis of the whole Union, and which denies to the federal power, as the representative of even a majority of the people of the United States, the right to dictate local laws and institutions. There are other communities besides those which hold slaves, that are jealous of their rights of local self-government. And, therefore, thankful as I should be if slavery could be abolished by the consent of those whose affair it is, and who can alone deal with the negro wisely and beneficially for him and themselves, I am unwilling to purchase its abolition by putting at hazard that important principle of local self-government. I do not wish to see what remains of the Union subjected to any further strains. I frankly confess my fears of the effect of such consolidation, and just as frankly I avow my belief that its effect on the stability of the Union will be most pernicious. We are a people more singularly situated than any other people have ever been, who have reached a commanding height of national greatness with republican forms of government. By a most happy thought, our fathers devised a means of constituting a nation out of separate republics, by uniting their inhabitants for certain purposes of government, leaving them for all other purposes independent of each other. What front against the outer world this principle of Union has enabled us to present, I need not remind you. But have you ever reflected upon what it is that preserves constitutional liberty, in our internal condition; what it is that stands as a barrier against the mere physical force of this nation, and protects the rights of minorities and sections from being crushed beneath the same power that can make itself so formidable to the external world? Beyond all question, it is the States, with their separate political rights, their local institutions, their admitted control over their own domestic affairs. Break down these barriers, and one of two consequences must inevitably ensue; we shall either resolve ourselves into a completely consolidated nation, which must of necessity take the form and wield the powers of a despotism, or we shall take refuge against that destruction of our civil liberties, in the formation of sectional confederacies.

Now, whether this result is, or is not to come about, depends in my opinion, upon the clearness with which the people of the United States shall see, and the firmness with which they shall act upon, the requirements of the problem of the restoration of the Union between the North and the South. If, disregarding the principles of the Constitution, and exercising the powers of military conquerors, we demand as conditions of peace things inconsistent with the acknowledged basis of the Union, we shall, if we succeed in exorting those conditions, overthrow the principle that makes Republican institutions possible in so great a country; and then, to avert the final loss of such institutions, we shall in turn destroy the principle that gives us nationality, and disappear from our position among the leading powers of the world. The intrigues that have been and will be set on foot, by foreign influences, to hasten this catastrophe, you can appreciate as well as I can describe them. If, on the other hand, we are wise enough to perceive and follow the safer path, we have a most powerful lever with which to work, in that principle of human nature which the creator of all has implanted in all, and which opens or shuts the reason of mankind according as pride is wounded or is saved. I know how much the sectional passions have been aroused. I know that the people of the North must rise to a great height of magnanimity. But after all, when our own interest dictates the very thing that magnanimity demands, does it require a very great moral effort to reach that temper of mind, which will enable us to see how we can relieve the pride of an adversary and convert him into a friend. This is often the only needful stroke in human affairs, and it is a process of wonderful simplicity and efficacy even in the most imbittered controversies.

There can be no question, as it seems to me, that this administration of Mr. Lincoln stands to-day as a barrier against the reunion of the South and the North. Believing this to be true, I have, as a citizen of the United States, a duty to perform in endeavoring to effect a change. I am bound not to yield to Mr. Lincoln's personal demand for rëelection, when I am convinced that he has made his removal from office necessary. That he himhimself has made this so, is but too apparent from the exaction which he has coupled with the restoration of peace.

Here, then, is exactly where we of the Democratic party stand. We propose no compromise whatever of the authority of the federal government. Our candidate has made this absolutely plain. But we do not admit that Mr. Lincoln has any claim to be for four years longer identified in person with the authority of the government, when we believe that we could have peace if that authority were lodged in the hands of a man who will not make the condition of peace which Mr. Lincoln exacts. We wish to be rid of that condition which we believe enlists the pride of the South against the authority of the government, and by relieving that pride to save that authority.

This is the simple truth of our position, reduced to an exact issue. But the monstrous claim has been put forward, that Mr. Lincoln, constitutionally elected in 1860, was entitled to rule over the whole United States; and that, as the secession of the Southern States has prevented his so ruling for the first term, it will in some way derogate from the just authority of the government if Mr. Lincoln is not elected for the second term. I wish to have a word or two to say on this claim, to my Republican friends, — to my old Whig friends, — whose votes assisted to put into office the author of the rescript "to whom it may concern." I ask you to analyze this strange doctrine, — what there is of it, — and to put it home to your consciences and your intelligence. You and I once belonged to the same political organization, the noble old Whig party of the Union. You thought that the Republican party could be put into power without endangering the political institutions of this country. I thought otherwise; and so we separated. But wherever we went, we could not unlearn the teachings of the great masters of our political faith. In that school in which we were trained in long years of political success or political adversity, if we learned anything which it became us as American citizens to know, we learned that the elective franchise is to be used, not for the benefit of presidents or secretaries, but for the welfare of our country; and that, when an incumbent of office represents a policy injurious to the country, he is to be sacrificed, and the office is to be saved, that it may answer the ends of its creation. So plain is this principle of political ethics that it astonishes me to hear any man who ever bore the name of "Whig" advance a fictitious identity between the incumbent and the office, when the question is on the policy which that incumbent pursues.

Why the very name which we wore so long and with so much glory, and which goes back to an era of the grandest memory, puts to shame this slavish doctrine. The English Whigs of 1688 broke the succession to the British throne, because the continuance of the incumbent was incompatible with the public welfare, and made him and his posterity wanderers on the face of the earth until their whole line was extinct. And are we, the American Whigs of the nineteenth century, to act upon a doctrine that would have kept the Stuarts on the throne, because, forsooth, the law gave them a right to expect to reign indefinitely? The Whig doctrine was that the law gave them a right to reign so long as they were fit to reign. I do not mean to admit that our American franchise is to be exercised on any lower principle, especially when its sole effect on the incumbent will be to retire him to private life, to live like the rest of us under the protection of the Constitution and the laws.

Consider, for one moment, where this doctrine, which has been advanced for Mr. Lincoln, inevitably leads you. You yield to this pretension of a personal claim to reëlection, because there has been a rebellion against the authority which, for the time, resided in his person, and you drop your ballot into the box in his favor, when that ballot, deposited for any other man, just as effectually asserts and protects the authority of the office. You thus debar yourself by a fiction from all opposition to any official acts or measures of Mr. Lincoln's administration, and your vote counts in the grand total of sanction which the result, if it is in his favor, will afford to his entire course. You thus forego all your opinions, whatever they may be, on the financial scheme which has given us an inconvertible paper-currency, and unsettled all the legal and moral basis of all pecuniary relations; on the violent assumptions of an executive authority to seize and imprison citizens without process of law, and in places where no military operations exist; on the suppression of the freedom of speech and of the press; on the interference of military power with the rights of the ballot; on whatever act or principle, or policy, of this administration ought to be passed in review by American citizens, through the only lawful and peaceable means by which such wrongs can be corrected. You will never have another opportunity to express your opinions upon these measures than the one that is now before you; for if Mr. Lincoln is reëlected, the sanction of the American people will have been deliberately placed upon his official acts, and the Constitution will have received at the hands of the people their authoritative support for all the constructions and interpretations which he and his followers and his ministers have undertaken to affix to it. These consequences will manifestly follow, if you adopt and act upon the claim for reëlection that is put forward for Mr. Lincoln on the ground of his personal identification with the authority of the office.

All other claims that can be advanced for him are, I admit, questions of public policy, and are therefore fit to be considered. They resolve themselves into the single question of his capacity to restore the Union. On this question, it seems to me there can be but one judgment passed by intelligent men. He and his supporters put themselves upon this issue, namely: They regard no union as of any value, which is to embrace any slave-holding States. They must therefore either force the Southern States, by war, to extinguish slavery, or, failing in that, they must make a country which will exclude all slave-holding communities. A distinguished Massachusetts senator (Mr. Sumner) has recently expressed the attitude of Mr. Lincoln very forcibly, in these words:

> The President was clearly right when, in a recent letter, he declared that he should accept no terms of peace which did not begin with the abandonment of slavery. ("Good," and cheers.) The Union cannot live with slavery. Nothing can be clearer than this. If slavery dies the Union lives; if slavery lives the Union dies.

Mr. Greeley, too, is equally explicit; for, standing at the head of the Lincoln electoral ticket in the State of New York, he declares

> There is but one obstacle to the American Union to-day, and that is slavery; there is but one peril to the American Union, and that is slavery. We have resolved to put down slavery and restore the Union. (Cheers.) On that platform we stand.

Thus the conditions of mortality for the Union appear to be fixed. Still let us hope that before the final doom is pronounced, the people of this country may have a voice to utter. But it must be uttered now or never. When Mr. Lincoln has been reëlected, the fiat will have gone forth. He will never be able to retrace his steps; he will never disenthral himself from the control of those who have pushed him on to the point where he must make the success or failure of his arms turn upon his power to force the abolition of slavery. The motto of his next administration has been composed. "If slavery dies, the Union lives; if slavery lives, the Union dies." And as all is to be cast upon this single die, — as all our hopes of rebuilding the Union of our fathers are to depend upon this one issue, and as that issue involves a preordained consequence and a declared purpose, it is written so that he who runs may read, that the independence of the Southern Confederacy is to be yielded, if we cannot by arms extort the abandonment of slavery. What hope or expectation the supporters of Mr. Lincoln can have of the holding together of the West and East after such a result has been reached, I am unable to conceive. For myself, so long as there remains any Constitution of the United States to cling to — that instrument to which I have many times sworn fealty — I shall remember and keep my vows. I am a citizen of the United States, bound to the Constitution of my country while it lives. But I cannot shut my eyes to the manifest future. I believe that the Constitution will not live under the experiment of a Northern United States; and with that Constitution goes all hope of Republican self-government for this country.

There are undoubtedly among those who have hitherto acted with the Republican party, many who are now disposed to pause and reflect. I implore them to consider whither we are tending. In former years, my voice with the voices of others, was raised against your organization, your policy, and your candidates, and fell unheeded. Let all that pass away. I ask no credit to myself or to others for any predictions we may have uttered. I shall ask none hereafter in any event. I only beseech you now, now, in the accepted present, in the day of salvation, ere the present has become the future, and we are all alike involved in what that future is to bring — to give to your country your calmest thoughts and your utmost wisdom. Give heed to the counsels of one who has perilled life and reputation on the field of battle in defence of your Union, and who now tells you how it may still be saved, in thoughts and accents that must have struck a resounding chord in your hearts. He has never asked for your suffrages; he wants no place, or power, or dignity. His character seems to have formed itself into one of great strength and moral beauty, by the operation of events upon a pure and patriotic nature. The love of country, impressed upon him when you, oh! city of Philadelphia, gave him in his boyhood to the institution which received him for the Union and trained him to revere its flag — the love of country has been his ruling principle, next to the fear of God. But mark how that love of country has been tempered and enlarged by the great transactions in which he has borne his part. No narrow view of the exigencies of the times has cramped his intellect, no personal wrongs have soured him, no injustice has driven him from his own equipoise, no temptation has led him into the devious ways of the demagogue, no sophistries of his own or of others' coinage have distorted his perceptions of the true principles of our government. He stands to-day in the vigor of life, in military skill, in solidity of character, in varied accomplishments, in wise and sound intellectual habits, and in firmness of principle, the foremost man of his generation in this country; and whatever may be the result of this pending and momentous canvass, his importance to the future welfare of our America will be more and more acknowledged, as such virtues and such capacities become more and more essential to the safety and defence of social order under republican institutions and laws.

As you have done me the honor to ask for my opinions on the issues involved in the approaching election, I close with a recapitulation of what I have said. I believe

First. That this war must be brought speedily to a close, or this country and its inhabitants will be financially ruined. It is impossible now, to do more than pay the interest on the accrued debt, if any provision whatever is to be made for a sinking fund to meet the principal.

Second. That the Lincoln policy of war for the extinction of slavery is a policy for an illimitable debt, because it is a policy for a perpetual standing army of vast proportions; and if adopted, that it must render our public obligations and securities worthless, entail pecuniary ruin alike upon government and people, and overthrow the Constitution.

Third. That the McClellan policy of receiving the Southern States back to their places in the Union as they were before they left it, is the only policy that affords the slightest prospect of peace and reunion, with the Constitution preserved, our nationality saved, and the public credit rescued from destruction.

HENRY CLAY.

EXTRACT FROM A SPEECH OF THE HON. HENRY CLAY, IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, ON THE SUBJECT OF ABOLITION PETITIONS, FEBRUARY 7, 1839.

"Sir, — I am not in the habit of speaking lightly of the possibility of dissolving this happy Union. The Senate knows that I have deprecated allusions, on ordinary occasions, to that direful event. The country will testify, that, if there be anything in the history of my public career worthy of recollection, it is the truth and sincerity of my ardent devotion to its lasting preservation. But we should be false in our allegiance to it if we did not discriminate between the imaginary and the real dangers by which it may be assisted. Abolition should no longer be regarded as an imaginary danger. The Abolitionists, let me suppose, succeed in their present aims of uniting the inhabitants of the Free States as one man, against the inhabitants of the Slave States. Union on the one side will beget union on the other. And this process of reciprocal consolidation will be attended with all the violent prejudices, imbittered passions, and implacable animosities which ever degraded or deformed human nature. A virtual dissolution of the Union will have already taken place, whilst the form of its existence remains. The most valuable element of union, mutual kindness, the feelings of sympathy, the fraternal bonds, which now happily unite us, will have been extinguished forever. One section will stand in menacing and hostile array against the other. The collision of opinion will be quickly followed by the clash of arms. I will not attempt to describe scenes which now lie happily concealed from our view. Abolitionists themselves would shrink back in dismay and horror at the contemplation of desolated fields, conflagrated cities, murdered inhabitants, and the overthrow of the fairest fabric of human government that ever rose to animate the hopes of civilized man. Nor should these Abolitionists flatter themselves, that, if they can succeed in their object of uniting the Free States, they will enter the contest with a numerical superiority that must insure victory. All history and experience proves the hazard and uncertainty of war; and we are admonished by Holy Writ, "that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong." But if they were to conquer, whom would they conquer? A foreign foe? one that had invaded our shores, insulted our flag, and laid our country waste? No, sir; no, sir. It would be a contest without laurels, without glory, — a self, a suicidal conquest, — a conquest of brothers over brothers, — achieved by one over another portion of the descendants of common ancestors, who, nobly pledging their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, had fought and bled, side by side, in many a hard battle on land and ocean, severed our country from the British crown, and established our national independence.

The inhabitants of the Slave States are sometimes accused by their Northern brethren with displaying too much rashness and sensibility to the operations and proceedings of Abolitionists. But, before they can be rightly judged, there should be a reversal of conditions. Let me suppose that the people of the Slave States were to form societies, subsidize presses, make large pecuniary contributions, send forth numerous missionaries throughout all their own borders, and enter into machinations to burn the beautiful capitals, destroy the productive manufactories, and sink into the ocean the gallant ships of the Northern States. Would these incendiary proceedings be regarded as neighborly, and friendly, and consistent with the fraternal sentiments which should ever be cherished by one portion of the Union towards another? Would they excite no emotion, occasion no manifestations of dissatisfaction, nor lead to any acts of retaliatory violence? But the supposed case falls far short of the actual one, in a most essential circumstance. In no contingency could these capitals, manufactories, and ships rise in rebellion and massacre inhabitants of the Northern States.

"I am, Mr. President, no friend of slavery. The Searcher of all hearts knows that every pulsation of mine beats high and strong in the cause of civil liberty. Whenever it is safe and practicable I desire to see every portion of the human family in the enjoyment of it. But I prefer the liberty of my own country to that of any other people; and the liberty of my own race to that of any other race. The liberty of the descendants of Africa in the United States is incompatible with the safety and liberty of the European descendants. Their slavery forms an exception — an exception resulting from a stern and inexorable necessity — to the general liberty in the United States. We did not originate, nor are we responsible for, this necessity. Their liberty, if it were possible, could only be established by violating the incontestable powers of the States, and subverting the Union. And beneath the ruins of the Union would be buried, sooner or later, the liberty of both races."

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S LETTER OF ACCEPTANCE.

ORANGE, NEW JERSEY,
September 8, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter informing me of my nomination by the Democratic National Convention, recently assembled at Chicago, as their candidate at the next election for President of the United States.

It is unnecessary for me to say to you that this nomination comes to me unsought.

I am happy to know that when the nomination was made the record of my public life was kept in view.

The effect of long and varied service in the army during war and peace, has been to strengthen and make indelible in my mind and heart the love and reverence for the Union, Constitution, laws, and flag of our country, impressed upon me in early youth.

These feelings have thus far guided the course of my life, and must continue to do so to its end.

The existence of more than one government over the region which once owned our flag is incompatible with the peace, the power, and the happiness of the people.

The preservation of our Union was the sole avowed object for which the war was commenced. It should have been conducted for that object only, and in accordance with those principles which I took occasion to declare when in active service.

Thus conducted, the work of reconciliation would have been easy, and we might have reaped the benefits of our many victories on land and sea.

The Union was originally formed by the exercise of a spirit of conciliation and compromise. To restore and preserve it, the same spirit must prevail in our councils, and in the hearts of the people.

The reëstablishment of the Union in all its integrity is, and must continue to be, the indispensable condition in any settlement. So soon as it is clear, or even probable, that our present adversaries are ready for peace, upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilized nations, and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interests of the country, to secure such peace, reëstablish the Union, and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace — we ask no more.

Let me add what, I doubt not was, although unexpressed, the sentiment of the Convention, as it is of the people they represent, that when any one State is willing to return to the Union, it should be received at once, with a full guarantee of all its constitutional rights.

If a frank, earnest, and persistent effort to obtain those objects should fail, the responsibility for ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards.

I could not look in the face of my gallant comrades of the army and navy, who have survived so many bloody battles, and tell them that their labors and the sacrifice of so many of our slain and wounded brethren had been in vain; that we had abandoned that Union for which we have so often periled our lives.

A vast majority of our people, whether in the army and navy or at home, would, as I would, hail with unbounded joy the permanent restoration of peace, on the basis of the Union under the Constitution, without the effusion of another drop of blood. But no peace can be permanent without Union.

As to the other subjects presented in the resolutions of the Convention, I need only say that I should seek, in the Constitution of the United States and the laws framed in accordance therewith, the rule of my duty, and the limitations of executive power; endeavor to restore economy in public expenditure, reëstablish the supremacy of law, and, by the operation of a more vigorous nationality, resume our commanding position among the nations of the earth.

The condition of our finances, the depreciation of the paper money, and the burdens thereby imposed on labor and capital, show the necessity of a return to a sound financial system; while the rights of citizens, and the rights of States, and the binding authority of law over President, army, and people, are subjects of not less vital importance in war than in peace.

Believing that the views here expressed are those of the Convention and the people you represent, I accept the nomination.

I realize the weight of the responsibility to be borne should the people ratify your choice.

Conscious of my own weakness, I can only seek fervently the guidance of the Ruler of the universe, and, relying on His all-powerful aid, do my best to restore union and peace to a suffering people, and to establish and guard their liberties and rights,

I am, gentlemen,
very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

Hon. HORATIO SEYMOUR,
and others, Committee.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, July 18, 1864.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

Any proposition which embraces the restoration of peace, the integrity of the whole Union, and the abandonment of slavery, and which comes by and with an authority that can control the armies now at war against the United States, will be received and considered by the Executive Government of the United States, and will be met by liberal terms on other substantial and collateral points, and the bearer or bearers thereof shall have safe conduct both ways.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WATCHWORDS FOR PATRIOTS.

Mottoes for the Campaign, selected from General McClellan's Writings.

If it is not deemed best to intrust me with the command even of my own army, I simply ask to be permitted to share their fate on the field of battle. — Despatch to General Halleck, August 30, 1862.

By pursuing the political course I have always advised, it is possible to bring about a permanent restoration of the Union — a re-union by which the rights of both sections shall be preserved, and by which both parties shall preserve their self-respect, while they respect each other. — General McClellan's Report.

I am devoutly grateful to God that my last campaign was crowned with a victory which saved the nation from the greatest peril it had then undergone. — General McClellan's Report.

At such a time as this, and in such a struggle, political partisanship should be merged in a true and brave patriotism, which thinks only of the good of the whole country. — General McClellan's West Point Oration.

MISCEGENATION

INDORSED BY THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Henry Clay, in September, 1848, when he asked his biographer, Rev. Walter Colton, to write a pamphlet exposing the objects of abolition fanaticism, charged him to show that

> The ultras go for abolition and amalgamation, and their object is to unite in marriage the laboring white man and the black woman, and to reduce the white laboring man to the despised and degraded condition of the black man.

We propose to show that this object has been declared by the Abolition party now in power, and shall prove it, not by mere argument, but by the record of that party in speeches and documents, and through its newspapers. In the course of our extracts, we shall have occasion to give the testimony of Abraham Lincoln, Gov. Andrew, of Massachusetts, Charles Sumner, Henry Wilson, Henry Ward Beecher, Gen. N. P. Banks, Montgomery Blair (Lincoln's Postmaster General), John W. Forney, Hon. Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, Horace Greeley, of the Tribune, Harriet Beecher Stowe (author of Uncle Tom's Cabin), Wendell Phillips, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Theodore Tilton, Lucretia Mott, Parker Pillsbury, Sarah M. Grimke, Angelina G. Weld, the Massachusetts Legislature, William Lloyd Garrison, Albert Brisbane, Dr. J. McCune Smith, William Wells Brown, C. C. Burleigh, Seth B. Cole, Lieut. Col. Hoyt, of Kansas, the N. Y. Tribune, N. Y. Times, N. Y. Evening Post, N. Y. Independent, N. Y. Principia, Anti-Slavery Standard, Anglo-African, Bangor Whig, Oswego Times, Leavenworth Conservative, the New York Loyal League, the New York Central Lincoln Club, and other Republican authorities.

Lincoln and the Republican party proclaim, to-day, that the war shall not end until slavery is abolished. So far the country thoroughly understands them. But the question further arises: What is to be the condition of the negro when he has attained his freedom? We fear that the people do not fully realize the answer that Lincoln and the leaders of his party have already made to this question. The occasion of the discussion which elicited many of the expressions of opinion to be quoted, was the publication, in the early part of 1864, of a very curious pamphlet, entitled "Miscegenation." Some conservative Republicans have denied that the ideas which inspired this pamphlet have any wide-spread advocacy in the Republican party. We shall see.

The New York Tribune, several months before this pamphlet was published, contained an editorial article of a column, arguing in favor of the equality of the negro with the white, and asserting that diversity is the condition precedent of races on this continent, and their assimilation the problem. After the appearance of the pamphlet, it published an editorial concerning it wholly favorable, from which the following is an extract: —

From the Tribune, March 16th, 1864.

There is, no doubt, a great prejudice against the black race in the United States; but it is impossible to say that this is not the result of a cruel and systematic degradation, and it will continue to be impossible to say this with the least logical accuracy until all traces of the bondage in which the blacks have for nearly two centuries been held have disappeared. Such prejudice is by no means a novelty, nor has it been at all confined to blacks. All Christians in the middle age supposed that Jews exhaled a bad odor from their bodies, and the marriage of a Jew and Christian at that period would have been far more likely to provoke a mob in any civilized city than the marriage of a white man and a black woman would be now. There is the simple fact. It is impossible to get around it, or under it, or over it, with the whole copperhead power of wriggle. Now, the white hatred of the black in this country is precisely of this character. Delicate people say that it is natural. We answer that it is impossible to prove that it is natural. Of course it is easy to classify its different sources. A man of great refinement may dislike to associate with an ignorant negro as he would with any ignorant man of whatever tribe. A man proud of his purse may scorn a poor negro as he would a poor white man. A man systematically acquiescent in the wrongs and cruelties of society, may shun a negro as he would any unpopular white. A man who has himself been under-estimated may be jealous of any attempt to do justice to others. But we must insist that all this settles nothing except our human inhumanity, — except that in spite of our religious professions, we do not dwell together as brethren — except that we do not, in spite of our Bibles, believe that God has made all men of one blood.

It is hard to decide how long this prejudice may continue to influence society; and it will probably continue to be felt long after all traces of it have disappeared from the statute books of all the States. But this thing is certainly clear, that under the Constitution in its most liberal interpretation, and admitting our cherished American doctrine of equal natural rights, if a white man pleases to marry a black woman, the mere fact that she is black gives no one a right to interfere to prevent or set aside such a marriage.

If a man can so far conquer his repugnance to a black woman as to make her the mother of his children, we ask, in the name of the divine law and of decency, why he should not marry her?

Horace Greeley, in whose paper this appeared, is to-day the principal elector on the Republican ticket for Abraham Lincoln for the State of New York. For most Republicans, the authority of the Tribune is sufficient to decide any question, but we will not stop here.

Next, perhaps, in influence and circulation in the Republican party, is the professedly religious Independent, edited by Henry Ward Beecher. The leading editorial article of two columns in the issue of February 25, 1864, was upon the subject of miscegenation, and contained the following language : —

Leaving out of view our native born American of English descent, there are enough of other stocks on this soil to make three other nations, — namely, the Irish, the Germans, and the negroes. Even the negroes number one million more than the whole population of the United States at the adoption of the Constitution. But these three stocks have not come hither to establish themselves as distinct peoples : but each to join itself to each till all together shall be built up into the monumental nation of the earth !

Read this again, Irishmen and Germans ! The article continues : —

We believe the whole human race are one family — born, every individual, with a common prerogative to do the best he can for his own welfare; that in political societies all men, of whatever various race or color, should stand on an absolute equality before the law; that whites and blacks should intermarry if they wish, and should not unless they wish; that the negro is not to be allowed to remain in this country, but is to remain without being allowed, — asking nobody's permission but his own; that we shall have no permanent settlement of the negro question till our haughtier white blood, looking at the face of the negro, shall forget that he is black, and remember only that he is a citizen.

The article concludes : —

Whether or not the universal complexion of the human family at the millennium "will not be white or black, but brown or colored," we certainly believe that the African-tinted members of our community will in the future gradually bleach out their blackness. The facts of to-day prove this beyond denial. Already three-fourths of the colored people of the United States have white blood in their veins. The two bloods have been gradually intermingling ever since there were whites and blacks among our population. This intermingling will continue. Under slavery it has been forced and frequent; under freedom it will be voluntary and unfrequent. But by and by counting the years not by Presidential campaigns but by centuries, the negro of the South, growing paler with every generation, will, at last, completely hide his face under the snow.

And the Washington correspondent of the Anti-Slavery Standard says that " this article in the Independent expresses the views of MOST OF THE INTELLIGENT REPUBLICANS IN CONGRESS upon the subject. Nobody here advocates amalgamation, though doubtless there are very many who believe that, in time, the two races will amalgamate."

The Independent of Feb. 4, 1864, contains an extended article on the hero of negroism — Toussaint L'Ouverture — lavish in commendation, warm in eulogium, full of the spirit that pervades the pamphlet, " Miscegenation." At the close occurs this significant

int of what radicalism has in store for "white-kinned but black-hearted citizens": —

They must cease to call unclean those whom God has cleansed; they must acknowledge genius, whatever be the color of the skin that enwraps it; and they must prepare themselves to welcome to the eadership of our armies and our Senate, as Southern ubstitutes for Jeff. Davis and his drunken Comus-rew, that have so long bewitched and despoiled is, black Toussaints, who, by their superior talents nd principles, shall receive the grateful homage of an ppreciative and admiring nation.

The New York Evening Post, which advo-ates Lincoln's reëlection, and the publisher f which, Mr. Henderson, was removed from ffice for corruption and fraud, speaks of it as wrong and pusillanimous policy to exclude he negro from our country, and says: —

We are a more heterogeneous and mixed peo-le than any that ever before appeared upon the arth; more than our ancestors even of Great ritain, and to this mixture we owe much of our eculiar energy, and nearly all our peculiar liberal-y and genial kindness of heart. Nowhere in the orld are there so few invetcrate prejudices of ace, nowhere so few pernicious distinctions of lass, nowhere so many large, just, comprehensive nd beneficent social arrangements, as in the nited States, because nowhere else has there een such a collision, and final commingling of aces. * * Can we doubt that if we are true to he grand opportunities of our position in refer-nce to these poor debased Africans, as well as n respect to the hordes of uncouth foreigners onred upon our shores, we shall not only elevate hem to a higher condition, but produce in our-elves a manliness and sincerity of character, that ill lift the whole nation as far above other nations n moral dignity as it already is in physical ower?

The Twentieth U. S. Colored Regiment, on heir passage through New York city, were resented with a flag and an address by — o quote from the address — "the mothers, ives, and sisters of the members of the New ork Union League Club," which closed as ollows: —

When you look at this flag, and rush to battle r stand at guard beneath its sublime motto, "God nd Liberty," remember that it is also an emblem of ve and honor from the daughters of this great me-ropolis to their brave champions in the field, and hat they will anxiously watch your career, glory-ng in your heroism, ministering to you when ounded and ill, and honoring your martyrdom ith benedictions and with tears.

It required only the dittle word "obey," dded to "love and honor," to make this al-nost a marriage contract. But the Loyal eague never presented such an address to hite soldiers. A Republican orator in Jack-sonville, Ill., said, a few months ago, that when the war was over the "brave Othellos of the South would come North and claim their fair Desdemonas."

Charles Sumner, after all the brave deeds and noble sacrifices of our white soldiers, can only see the negro in this war. These are his words: —

Wherever I turn in this war I find the African. If you ask for strategy, I know nothing better than that of the slave Robert Small, who brought the rebel steamer Planter, with its armament, out of Charleston, and surrendered it to our Commodore as a prize of war. If you ask for successful courage, I know nothing better than that of the African Tillman, who rose upon a rebel prize crew, and overcoming them, carried the ship into New York.

Sumner, in one day, in the last Senate, offered a series of seven resolutions on the slavery and negro questions; presented memorials praying that the right of suffrage may be extended to persons of African descent; introduced a bill to repeal the Fugitive Slave Act, and another to enable negroes to testify in Federal courts. A negro was put in nomination for the office of chaplain at the organization of the last Massachusetts Legislature, and was barely defeated, and Mr. Sumner wrote to some of his friends, expressing his "mortification that the friends of human progress in the Legislature of the Old Bay State had not been more united, and elected a colored chaplain."

If this is "human progress," the world may well pray to remain stationary.

Henry Wilson, in the last Senate, said that "the black soldier was equal to the white soldier in everything, and superior to him in endurance."

Miscegenation was a part of the original purpose of the Abolitionists.

Gen. Banks, when in the House of Representatives, said, "In regard to whether the white or black race was superior, he proposed to wait until time should develop whether the white race should absorb the black, or the black the white." General Banks is now creating rotten burroughs in Louisiana to elect Mr. Lincoln, and he recently issued an order compelling white and black children to mingle together at public schools.

Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, said, in a speech in Boston, in 1860, "Slavery will die out, because the day shall surely be when there will be one whole family of man upon a sanctified earth as there will be in heaven. But I do not intend to wait for the providence of God to work it out."

Hon. Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, in his reply to Mr. Cox's speech on miscegenation, quoted a passage from a work on Central America, in which it was stated that "the great work of practical amalgamation had been going on quietly for generations; that color was considered a mere matter of taste, and that some of the most respectable inhabitants had black wives and mongrel children," and Mr. Kelley added that the incident purified our minister of some prejudices, and continued: "Our fellow-citizens of African descent, freed by the rebellion, will not be long in Americanizing this, to them, congenial region, in which complexional differences do not affect the social or political position of a man, if we have the sense and humanity to give them a fair chance for culture and enterprise.

Forney, commenting on this in the Philadelphia Press, says: "These are practical, and therefore valuable, truths. They open the way for statesmen to new thoughts and to new preparations for the eternal adjustment of the tremendous issues growing out of the war."

Thus all the administration leaders and organs who have spoken of this subject at all, have favored the "sublime mingling of the races." The "new thoughts" and "eternal adjustment," spoken of by Forney, are, of course, miscegenation.

"If anybody wants to marry a negro honestly," says the Bangor Whig (Republican, of course), "let him do it."

"The only possible basis of national peace and prosperity," says the Oswego Times, an administration organ, "is the recognition of the equal manhood and citizenship of every race on American soil, without regard to color, nationality, or previous social condition."

"The slave of yesterday," says the Leavenworth Conservative, "the soldier of to-day, must be, will be, the citizen of to-morrow."

The front rank of the Abolitionists, who have always brought the others of the party up to their standard, are over head and ears in miscegenation.

As early as 1863 Wendell Phillips said, —

Remember this, the youngest of you: that on the 4th day of July, 1863, you heard a man say, that in the light of all history, in virtue of every page he ever read, he was an amalgamationist to the utmost extent. I have no hope for the future, as this country has no past, and Europe has no past, but in that sublime mingling of races, which is God's own method of civilizing and elevating the world. God, by the events of his providence, is crushing out the hatred of race which has crippled this country until to-day.

Theodore Tilton followed more boldly, devoting a whole address to the defence of miscegenation, on one occasion, and saying, —

The history of the world's civilization is written in one word, — which many are afraid to speak, and many more afraid to hear, — and that is amalgamation.

Parker Pillsbury, on receiving advance sheets of the pamphlet, wrote, in rapture, to the author: —

CONCORD, N. H., January 10, 1864.

Author of Miscegenation — Care American News Company, 121 Nassau Street, New York: —

Though all unknown to me, I thank you a thousand times for one hasty reading of the sheets you have so kindly and so complimentarily sent.

My testimony can do you little good; indeed, publicly known, might do you more harm than good. But your work has cheered and gladdened a winter morning, which I certainly began in cloud and shadow.

You are on the right track — pursue it; and the good God speed you.

I have long been so confident of the correctness of your philosophy that I would gladly see our law of divorce so modified as that new marriages among the American races might even now take place where unfruitful or unhappy unions or (disunions) are recognized.

It may not be time to say this aloud; but it will yet be said, and I think not too soon.

All the mysteries of the wondrous apocalypse now unfolding in our country, are not even dreamed of yet; and I hail your work as a true prophecy.

Pardon my haste, for I am doubly loaded with work; but I am,

Most truly yours to aid,

PARKER PILLSBURY.

Pillsbury is so enthusiastic, that he desires divorces granted so that white men may discard their white wives, and marry negroes instead!

Angelina G. Wild and Sarah M. Grimke write to the author, —

We are wholly one with you in opinion as to the result and the desirableness of the result which is inevitably before our country.

Lucretia Mott writes to the author, —

It was an early and bold step in the Massachussits Anti-Slavery Society to petition for the repeal of the law making intermarriages of the races a crime and penal offence. By their persistency this repeal was effected.

Albert Brisbane writes to the author, —

My opinion is that the different races now existing on the earth are but the roots, the rude elements of a future and perfect race.

Dr. J. McCune Smith writes to the author, —

I am willing to put my signature to your doctrines.

William Wells Brown, another negro, and particularly liked by the Republican party, says, —

This rebellion will extinguish slavery in our land, and the negro is henceforth and forever to be a part of the nation. His blood is to mingle with that of his former oppressor, and the two races blended in one will make a more peaceful, hardy, powerful, and intellectual race than America has ever seen before.

The call for the Anti-Slavery Convention, last year, — of which Garrison, who now supports Lincoln earnestly, and the motto of whose life has been, "The Constitution is a league with death and covenant with hell," — ends as follows : —

Let the approaching anniversary, therefore, be well attended by the tried men and women, whose purpose it is still to continue the great moral struggle until before the Constitution and laws all are made free, and complexional distinctions are unknown.

WENDELL PHILLIPS, } Secretaries.
CHARLES C. BURLEIGH, }

The Anti-Slavery Standard published a long and complimentary notice of "Miscegenation," saying, —

The future must decide how far black and white are disposed to seek each other in marriage. The probability is that there will be a progressive intermingling, and that the nation will be benefited by it. We are sure that many will agree with us in finding the pamphlet interesting and instructive, and in thanking the unknown author for it.

The New York Principia (Rep.) says of the argument in the pamphlet, —

It needed not one tithe of it to prove that God has made of one blood all nations of men, endowed them with equal rights, and that they are entitled to all the civil and political prerogatives and privileges of other citizens.

The pamphlet, "Miscegenation," is eloquence, poetry, and romance, compared to some of these expressions of men who have led and still lead the Republican party. The pamphlet lays down the precise platform upon which the Republicans must stand if they carry out their theories. It is to the party to-day what Helper's book was a few years ago. The Republicans, when we quoted from that book, stoutly denied that it represented their views. To-day it is behind the age, and "miscegenation" takes its place, flaunting its banners of "progress" — progress toward anarchy and towards a war of races, as well as a war of states. The subject is disagreeable to talk of; but abolition and civil war were disagreeable to talk of five years ago; yet, if the nation had been better warned of the dangers that lay in its path, a different spirit might have actuated the people, and compromise might have preserved to us peace and prosperity.

Some idea of this pamphlet may be obtained from its table of contents, which is as follows : —

1. Physiological Equality of the White and Colored Races; 2. Superiority of Mixed Races; 3. The Blending of Divers Bloods essential to American Progress; 4. The March of the Dark Races Northward; 5. The Mystery of the Pyramids — The Sphynx Question Answered; 6. All Religions derived from the Dark Races; 7. The Type Man a Miscegen; 8. Love of the Blonde for the Black; 9. Present and Future Relations of the Irish and the Negro; 10. The Mistake of all Religions and Systems of Education; 11. How the Anglo-American may become Strong and Comely; 12. The Miscegenetic Ideal of Beauty in Women; 13. Secret of Southern Success; 14. Heart Histories of the White Daughters of the South; 15. All our Victorious Battlefields baptized by the Blood of the Negro; 16. Progress of Public Opinion and National Policy towards Miscegenation; 17. The Bloods of all Nations find their Level: 18. The Future — No White, no Black; 19. Miscegenation in the Presidential Contest; 10. An Omen.

To those who desire to obtain the pamphlet for reference or argument, as showing the logical conclusions of Republican teachings, it may not be out of place to mention that it will be sent to any part of the country by addressing E. P. Patten, 35 Park Row, New York city, and enclosing the price: one copy, thirty cents; five copies, one dollar. We invite especial attention to chapters 9, 16, 18, and 19.

Harriet Beecher Stowe, the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," introduces into a later novel, written by her, as the principal characters, a mulatto man and woman, to show the benefit of a mixture of bloods.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, who detracts from his fame by writing abolition articles, thinks the negro is better than the white man. He writes of the negro, —

He has avenues to God,
Hid from men of Northern brain,
Far beholding, without cloud,
What these with slowest steps attain.

That is to say the negro has the avenues straight to the throne of God, while the white man labors to attain it with slow and weary steps.

Henry Ward Beecher said, in reference to colonization, in one of his sermons: —

What! Drive out the colored people from among us? I would sooner that these two hands undertake to uproot and cast out every shrub, bush, and tree that grows between this and the Rocky Mountains.

The answer to the question "What will you do with the negroes when they are freed?" has always been, "They must be placed on an equality with the white, side by side with the white laboring population, with no prejudice of race working against them, and no right denied them."

In the N. Y. World of Sept. 23, will be seen the description of a scene at the Rooms of the Central Lincoln Club, in New York city, of which Charles S. Spencer is President. After a Lincoln mass meeting, addressed by the United States District Attorney, and other Lincoln orators, who dwelt largely on the wrongs of the black race, their superiority, and their natural and physical capacity for the highest enjoyment, the floor was cleared for a negro ball: —

In came the colored belles into the Twenty-third Street Republican headquarters, arrayed in all that gorgeous and highly colored, not to say highly scented, splendor for which the dark daughters of the Æthiop race are æsthetically distinguished. One might pick out all colors among the hundred and fifty belles who soon tripped in on the light fantastic toe over the floor of the Republican grand council chamber. Some of them sat on the platform, or picked their bouquets to bits on the rostrum, sacred but half an hour before to Lincoln eloquence and the theory of miscegenation; while others, seized by eager partners, whirled round in the dizzy waltz, displaying all that extravagant voluptuousness and wriggling of figure for which the dancing African female is so remarkable. Some of the bells were octoroons, to suit we suppose, the love-sick glances of Republicans as yet only in the vestibule of the great miscegenation church. Others were of the quadroon type; others yet mulattoes, of great vivacity and variety of tint; while not a few were of the pure Congo or Bozoo character, black as the ace of spades, and ready for any work from shaking a carpet to talking philosophy and humanitarianism with the most perfect possessor of the Lincoln creed.

On the floor during the progress of the ball were many of the accredited leaders of the Black Republican party, thus testifying their faith by their works, in the hall and headquarters of their political gathering. There were Republican office-holders, and prominent men of various degrees, and at least ONE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTOR ON THE REPUBLICAN TICKET.

The Tribune, of two or three months previous, gave a description of a meeting at New Orleans, of negroes, largely interspersed with white men and women from the North, and addressed by white Abolitionists, in which the writer devoted much of his space to the portrayal of the beauty of the mulatto ladies present. In a speech before a Loyal League Club in Brooklyn, reported in the Brooklyn Eagle, June 30, Hon. Seth B. Cole accounted for the good fighting qualities of the Southern people by the fact of their association with the negroes.

The New York Tribune of Feb. 24, 1864, in referring to a remark in Congress, of Mr. Clark, of New Hampshire, that it was the interest of the country that black men should be employed in the war to save the blood of white men, responded, that "it is equally for the interest of the country that white men should be employed, because it will save the blood of black men," and on another occasion the Tribune said that Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana, need have no personal fears of the social and political equality of the blacks, for no statute could ever raise him to their level.

After all the teachings we have quoted, it is no wonder the negro began to consider himself a better man than the white man. The Anglo-African, the negro organ in New York, has a sharp attack upon Elizur Wright, because he presumes to say that the negro has not as much virility as the whites. It says, —

No, friend Wright, you need not disturb yourself about the black man of these United States; he has a good standing color, and an abundance of endurance; just brush some of those knotty cobwebs from your brain and look at him: tall, brawny, and well-limbed, sound-brained as God made him, a man and a brother. You sharp-nosed, hatchet-faced, lank-haired people, aided by science and the "hub," have vainly tried to crush the manhood out of him, and failed; do give him up; you cannot lie him out of his manhood. He is a better man and a better citizen than you or your race "ever dare be," under any circumstances, in all climates; if not, why do you cut down his equal chances? Why shut your eyes to facts? Bluff Ben. Butler, the other other day, started on a forced march of some two or three days. He had two white and two black regiments of infantry. He was in a climate, moreover, "favorable to the whites." How was it when they arrived there? One-half the white soldiers had straggled, exhausted, on the road — every black soldier answered to his name at roll-call. Pshaw! Don't "fool" any longer. If you want this rebellion wiped out take three hundred thousand of our blacks; give us Ben. Butler or let us go alone, and in sixty days the South will be wiped out.

Here is what Lieut. Col. Hoyt, a Western radical, wants the negroes to do: —

I hate the South to-day, not only as my enemy, not only as the enemy of my Government, but as the enemy of all mankind. I hate her piratical institutions, which rob men of their manhood and women of their virtue. I hate her history, and I hate her traditions, for upon all I behold the unwashed stains of that unavenged blood extorted by the lash of the slave-whip. I have believed, I still fondly believe, that the sun of another Saint Domingo may rise upon her, and a million of Toussaint Louvertures, clad in the habiliments of war, and with vengeance written on their faces, with one desperate and triumphant stroke, dash in pieces the accursed South. Are Kansans proud to own John Brown, of Ossawatomie? I, for one, say, in the whole history of this State there is nothing reflecting such lustre as the citizenship of the gray-haired martyr of Harper's Ferry.

Hon. Montgomery Blair, Mr. Lincoln's Postmaster General, in his speech at Rockville, Md., during the cabinet imbroglio, thus unequivocally charged his associates in the cabinet and in the party, with the attempt to bring about practical miscegenation: —

The Abolition party, while pronouncing philippics against slavery, seek to make a caste of another color by amalgamating the black element with the free-white labor of our land, and so to expand, far beyond the present confines of slavery, the evil which makes it obnoxious to Republican statesmen; and now, when the strength of the traitors who attempted to embody a power out of the interests of slavery, to overthrow the government is seen to fail, they would make the manumission of the slaves the means of infusing their blood into our whole system, by blending with it 'amalgamation, equality, and fraternity.' The cultivators of the soil must then become a hybrid race, and our government a hybrid government, ending, as all such unnatural combinations have ever done, in degraded, if not abortive, generations, and making serfdom for the inferior caste, — the unmixed blood of the conquered race inevitably asserting a despotism over it. To facilitate this purpose, a concerted appeal is now made to the people of the free States through the press, to open the way to this daring innovation, beginning in the Southern States, unhappily now brought under the ban of the Calhounite conspirators. With this view, it is proposed to declare the State governments vacated in that section when they are restored to the Union, and all the loyal men of the South, whom the treason of Presidents Pierce and Buchanan, in complicity with Southern traitors, has subjugated, are to come under absolute submission to the representatives of the Northern States in Congress without the vestige of a State right, a State law, or constitution to protect them; nay, not even the franchise of a vote to send a solitary representative to the legislative body to which their destiny is to be committed.

The New York Times (Rep.), of March 26, says of this miscegenation: —

It may readily be imagined that it is with great reluctance that we speak out our minds in this matter. But we have no hesitation in saying that if we had at the outset conceived it possible that hostility to slavery would ever have led to wholesale intermarriage with negroes, or of all marriageable Republicans and their sisters, that party should never have received any countenance or support from this journal. We owe it to ourselves and posterity to say that the odious matrimonial arrangements, into which so many of those whose opinions on certain great questions of public policy we have hitherto shared, have taken us wholly by surprise.

Mr. Lincoln is as much an aider and abettor of the Abolitionists in this new policy of miscegenation as he has been in their policy of emancipation. He will go wherever they push him. Hear Frederick Douglas's account of his visit to the White House: —

I have been down there, said he, to see the President, and, as you were not there, perhaps you may like to know how the President of the United States received a black man at the White House. I will tell you how he received me, — just as you have seen one gentleman receive another (great applause), with a hand and a voice well balanced between a kind cordiality and a respectful reserve. I tell you I felt big there. (Laughter.) Let me tell you how I got to him; because everybody can't get to him. He has to be a little guarded in admitting spectators. The manner of getting to him gave me an idea that the cause was rolling on. The stairway was crowded with applicants. Some of them looked eager; and I have no doubt some of them had a purpose in being there, and wanted to see the President for the good of the country! They were white, and as I was the only dark spot among them, I expected to have to wait at least half a day; I had heard of men waiting a week; but in two minutes after I sent in my card the messenger came out, and respectfully invited "Mr. Douglas" in. I could hear in the multitude outside, as they saw me pressing and elbowing my way through, the remark, "Yes, damn it, I knew they would let the nigger through," in a kind of despairing voice, — a peace Democrat, I suppose.

In an address to a bogus association calling itself the Working Men's Democratic Republican Association, from New York, Mr. Lincoln took especial pains to place working negroes and white men on an equality. Said he, in his turgid and awkward way, —

None are so deeply interested to resist the present rebellion as the working people. Let them beware of prejudices, working disunion and hostility among themselves. The most notable feature of the disturbance in your city, last summer, was the hanging of some working people by other working people. It should never be so. The strongest bond of human sympathy outside of the family relation should be the one uniting all working people, of all nations, tongues, and kindreds.

"Some working people by other working people," means negroes by white men, and the President suggests that the white man should love the negro better than any one except a relative, and where such a love existed, of course he might possibly, in time, become a relative.

We have room for no more extracts, but these are sufficient.

The attempt to raise the colored race to a social equality with the white must result in a conflict of races and the annihilation of the negro. It is one of those wild and impracticable theories of the "agitators," never to be realized in this or any other generation, but that lead to strife and anarchy if permitted to obtain in governments or in communities. The negro is to be made a sacrifice to the bigotry and political hatreds and ambitions of the Abolition party. The work has already begun. The African is dying by thousands in the track of our armies. The cry for help for homeless and starving men, women, and children has reached us, and true philanthropy, while deploring the abortive and reckless fanaticism, calling itself philanthropy, which has caused this suffering, has sent material aid. Let it be remembered that it was prophesied years ago that if the Abolitionists obtained influence and power, a civil war would result; let the prophecy be recorded here, that, if the American people indorse the unnatural theories now advanced by these same men, they invite a war of the races, which, if begun, can only end by the extirpation of the negro from the continent. Miscegenation is but another pet object of the Lincoln party, of the same stamp with emancipation, confiscation, and subjugation. If the nation is willing to be led to slaughter in a vain and disastrous attempt to accomplish these objects, let it continue Lincoln in power; if it is willing only to go to the battle-field for the sake of restoring Union and peace, let it remove him.

Mottoes for the Campaign, selected from General McClellan's Writings.

The true issue for which we are fighting is the preservation of the Union and upholding the laws of the general government. — Instructions to General Burnside, January 7, 1862.

We are fighting solely for the integrity of the Union, to uphold the power of our national government, and to restore to the nation the blessings of peace and good order. — Instructions to General Halleck, November 11, 1861.

You will please constantly to bear in mind the precise issue for which we are fighting; that issue is the preservation of the Union and the restoration of the full authority of the general government over all portions of our territory. — Instructions to General Buell, November 7, 1861.

We shall most readily suppress this rebellion and restore the authority of the government by religiously respecting the constitutional rights of all. — Instructions to General Buell, Nov. 7, 1861.

Be careful so to treat the unarmed inhabitants as to contract, not widen, the breach existing between us and the rebels. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

I have always found that it is the tendency of subordinates to make vexatious arrests on mere suspicion. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

Say as little as possible about politics or the negro. — Instructions to General Burnside, January 7, 1862.

The unity of this nation, the preservation of our institutions, are so dear to me that I have willingly sacrificed my private happiness with the single object of doing my duty to my country. — Letter to Secretary Cameron, October, 1861.

Whatever the determination of the government may be, I will do the best I can with the Army of the Potomac, and will share its fate, whatever may be the task imposed upon me. — Letter to Secretary Cameron, October, 1861.

Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organization of States, nor forcible abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a moment. — Letter to President Lincoln, July 7, 1862.

In prosecuting this war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject to the necessity of military operations. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist; and oaths, not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our present armies. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

In the arrangement and conduct of campaigns the direction should be left to professional soldiers. — General McClellan's Report

DOCUMENT No. 18.

REPUBLICAN OPINIONS

ABOUT

LINCOLN.

THE matter here submitted to the judgment of honest freemen is like evidence drawn by cross-examination from opposing witnesses If they are under a bias, it is a bias which adds strength to their testimony. When Democrats declare their want of confidence in Mr. Lincoln's character and capacity, his supporters dispense themselves from weighing his charges, by raising a cry of "Copperheadism!"—a cry which would seem to be regarded as a sort of knock-down argument that leaves no more to be said. But when Republican statesmen, Republican organs, and Republican associations avow their belief that Mr. Lincoln is weak, is vacillating, is incapable, is selfish, is lawless, is tyrannical, is politically dishonest, we have a body of testimony against which the senseless cry of "Copperheadism" will not avail. When the ablest men of Mr. Lincoln's own party declare him incapable, the fair presumption is, that he is incapable; when they declare him a vulgar, crafty office-seeker, of weak character and tyrannical instincts, who has demonstrated his utter unfitness for his great station, the charges, at any rate, cannot be got rid of by the glib-tongued slander so much in vogue, that such accusations are inspired by secret sympathy with the rebels.

The matter here presented is somewhat bulky; but it is only a small part of the Republican testimony which might have been collected. It is the aim of this selection to present expressions which have a representative character—in which the writer does not merely express his own views, but is the organ of many other minds. When multitudes thus speak by deputy, the attention of the reader is saved and economized, and he is enabled without weariness to get the distilled utterance of Republican thought respecting the personal claims and character of Mr. Lincoln.

The force of this pamphlet lies in the documents; we encumber them with no other commentary than brief explanatory remarks to describe the occasions which called them forth.

The first of these documents in importance, though not first in order of time, is a pamphlet on "The Next Presidential Election," which was the forerunner of the "Pomeroy Circular." This pamphlet was prepared and privately circulated in January last, by the same committee of influential Republicans that issued the Pomeroy circular. The organization, of which that committee was the organ, is thus described by Mr. Pomeroy, in a speech made by him in the Senate of the United States, on the 10th of March:

"Some curiosity has been manifested, here and elsewhere, as to the authority and genuineness of a circular issued by me, as Chairman of the National Executive Committee. Such curiosity is very laudable, and I take an early opportunity to say that I did issue that circular, and that it embraces the views of the National Committee upon the subject presented. The Committee was instituted in the usual manner, at a public meeting convened in this city, in the month of January last. That meeting comprised members of Congress and citizens from nearly every loyal State in the Union. The Committee, is composed of members of Congress and other citizens of the United States; all of them, so far as I am advised, of the most unquestioned loyalty, and devoted to the Union and to freedom, as the best means for restoring and preserving the Union. The object of the Committee is to unite the sentiment of the country in the support of men and measures suited to the times. It issued a letter, called by some a circular, which it has distributed, as also the speeches of members of Congress, on the engrossing topics of the day."

The purpose of the organization here described was to head off a crafty attempt of the contracting and office-holding interests, to forestall the action of the Republican Convention, and force Mr. Lincoln on the party against its better judgment. This project was conceived with foresight, and executed with great dexterity. Its instruments were the Republican State Legislatures, elected in the fall of 1863. During that year, and with a view to this very object, the party war-cry given to the Republicans was—"Lincoln and Loyalty—Opposition to the Administration is Treason to the Country." It was foreseen that Republican Legislatures, elected on this issue, would be as pliant as wax to official manipulation from Washington. None but the contractors and office-holders, who concocted the scheme, were long-sighted enough to detect its bearing, till the trap was ready to be sprung. But, in the Assembly of the State Legislatures, in January, 1864, it was seen that they all began to act with the concert of a set of puppets, in nominating Mr. Lincoln for re-election. All the leading men of the party, who were not either office-holders or contractors, then first came to understand the game by which the party had been outwitted and overreached. The organization, described in the foregoing extract from Senator Pomeroy's speech, was quickly and clandestinely formed, and its first important act was the preparation of the following circular, which was secretly sent to influential Republicans throughout the country, leaving out, of course, the contractors and Mr. Lincoln's office-holders. The following is a correct copy of that first circular, re-printed from the original pamphlet, with no other difference than a freer use of italics:—

The effort now making to forestall the action of the Republican National Convention, by procuring the formal nomination of Mr. Lincoln in State Legislatures and other public bodies, is deeply to be deplored.

The more so, because this movement originates with the recipients of Executive favor and patronage, some of whom hold high stations in the administration of Mr. Lincoln, whose object is to perpetuate their own power and means of pecuniary advancement, without any regard whatever to the welfare of the country. While these nominations are made to appear as though they emanated from the spontaneous will of the people, the animus in reality is to defeat their will altogether, by producing such a public clamor in behalf of Mr. Lincoln, as to prevent the assembling of the National Convention at all; or, if it should assemble, to force his nomination upon the country, irrespective of the popular will.

In time of civil war, with all its attendant calamities, the attempt to advance the personal interest and ambition of any one man, or number of men, without regard to the public good, deserves, and should receive, universal condemnation.

To the proper discussion of Mr. Lincoln's claim, to be made a candidate for the next Presidential term, there can be no reasonable objection; but it is the people, and not Mr. Lincoln and his dependents, who should decide upon his claim.

While the great body of the American people have everything at stake upon the right administration of the government, they have really no personal interest in its patronage. Therefore, they are the only disinterested party to select the Presidential candidate without interference from Executive influences.

But now it is too early to commit the people to the fortunes of any Presidential aspirant. The issues of war are ever uncertain; and though we have every reason to hope our gallant armies may have destroyed the rebel power before the meeting of the Convention, they may not. At all events, the people will be much better prepared to decide this question three or four months hence, than they can possibly be to-day.

Already has this premature action alienated many of the friends of freedom, who believe that, even with a fair nomination in a full convention, Mr. Lincoln cannot be re-elected to the Presidency.

There are many solid reasons in the very philosophy of representative government, against the election of a President for a second term.

The unbounded popularity of General Washington, during his administration, convinced the American people that, had he been less than Washington, he might, by the patronage of office, have subverted the liberties of the country, by procuring his own election periodically for life.

The want of a constitutional limitation, to the number of terms to which a President might be eligible, was then felt to be a serious defect.

Washington participated in this sentiment, and peremptorily refused to allow himself to be elected for a third term; and his decision furnished a precedent which had all the force of a constitutional restriction.

During the domination of the Republican party, from Jefferson to Monroe, the practice of the President nominating himself for the second term, and then his successor, through the machinery of a caucus, which virtually transferred the power of election from the people to the Administration, was becoming a precedent which threatened the subversion of republican liberty.

General Jackson, in order to maintain the independence of the elective franchise, became the candidate of the people, in opposition to this caucus system, and, though defeated at first, was, in 1828, triumphantly elected, against the powerful patronage of the government. From that day no President until Mr. Lincoln, ever attempted to revive that odious system of having himself nominated without consulting the people in a National Convention.

General Jackson was made a candidate by the people for a second term against his will, and elected with unparalleled unanimity. Yet, such was the unbounded enthusiasm he inspired, that Jackson saw, as did every reflecting man, that the danger to liberty, which occurred under Washington's administration, was repeating itself.

And so utterly opposed was that stern patriot to the use of patronage for the purpose of procuring a re-election to the Presidency, that he laid down the one term principle as a fundamental doctrine in our democratic system, and it became a part of the political creed of the people, so strong, that no President from that day has been re-elected, and probably never will be by a fair expression of the popular will.

If Mr. Lincoln, in defiance of the teachings of Jackson, in violation of the great principle which underlies our democratic institutions, and in the face of the solemn warnings of history, can now so wield his patronage as to secure his election for a second term, who so blind as not to see that four years hence he will have less difficulty in securing his election for a third term! For, with an army of more than half a million of citizen soldiers under his command, and an annual patronage of a thousand millions of money, he can, if he has one-half the brain attributed to him by his friends, have himself elected from term to term during his natural life.

If the "military necessity" supplies a reason now for his nomination, and the extraordinary patronage occasioned by the war, furnishes the means of his election, as a matter of course, his interest is then to prolong the war as a means of perpetuating his power.

No man with the patriotism of a Washington or a Jackson, would seek to place himself in a position where his interest and his personal ambition would be coincident with the continuance of the rebellion and the perpetuity of the war.

But, aside from the consideration of the second term principle, there is still another and more forcible objection to the nomination of Mr. Lincoln.

The people have lost all confidence in his ability to suppress the rebellion and restore the Union. It is impossible to put out of view the fact, that there is a general feeling of disappointment in the loyal North, that after such a wasting of its precious blood, and such a vast expenditure of treasure, the rebellion continuous unsubdued; and all the promises of the Administration, time and again, for its speedy overthrow have been falsified.

The truth is, that there is no man who does not wear the livery of office, or is not in the pay of the General Government, who does not feel mortified and humbled, that our nation, with its twenty millions of loyal people in the North, with four millions of auxiliaries in the South, to say nothing of a large host of Union men there, has not succeeded yet in overthrowing the insolent slave oligarchy, which does not number five millions all told!

How is it, that Jefferson Davis, with his slender resources, without a navy, without manufactories, is still defiant at Richmond, and has twice sent his rebel hordes across the Potomac, putting in jeopardy even the personal liberty of Mr. Lincoln himself?

It is impossible to prevent the American people from making humiliating comparisons between the rebel chief and the President of the United States. They will understand why this condition of things exists; at the end of the third year of Mr. Lincoln's term. The fault is not in the want of intelligence and bravery, on the part of our soldiers, or the skill of our officers. For both soldiers and officers have proven, on many a battle field, that, in endurance and valor, and all the elements which constitute the great soldier, they are the equals, if not the superiors, of the rebels.

It will not do to throw the blame upon the country, for it has furnished all the men and all the money the President has asked.

It will not do to charge it upon the rebel sympathizers at the North, for they have had no means of interfering with the orders of the President. The responsibility rests alone upon him. He has been weak and vacillating throughout, seemingly incapable of settling upon any definite line of policy in regard to the rebellion.

Two theories in regard to it, have, and now divide, the American people. One is, that the Southern States are still States of the American Union; that their several constitutions and laws, though silent in the presence of the rebel power, will, upon the suppression of the rebellion, revive, and the people return to their former rights.

The other theory is, that they are no longer States in the American Union, in the sense of the Constitution, but the rebellion having acquired the strength and consistency of a belligerent power, the status of the entire population has been changed from citizens to aliens, and they do not return to their rights upon the suppression of the rebellion, but only to such as the supreme legislative power may give them.

Had Mr. Lincoln adopted either one of these theories and adhered to it vigorously, he might long since have ended the rebellion.

Had he chosen the first, he could, before this, have brought back the States, with their institutions and laws, slaves and all.

Had he adopted the other, and sustained Fremont and Hunter, the friends of freedom know that the rebel armies might long ago have been overthrown and the whole rebel territory in possession of the United Slates, with the manacles of every slave stricken off, from the Susquehannah to the Rio Grande.

This vacillation and indecision of the President, has been the real cause why our well-appointed armies have not succeeded in the destruction of the rebellion.

He has constantly been going between these two theories, taking no positive ground for either, but holding on to the skirts of both.

Whether, from the feebleness of his will, which has been unequal to the alternate pressure of the respective leaders of these theories, or whether from the want of intellectual grasp, he has really been unable to comprehend their philosophy, or from the want of political principle and indifference to truth, he has, with that species of cunning which characterizes a certain class of lawyers, sought to ride both theories for the purpose of securing his re-lection.

The cant about "Honest Old Abe" was at first amusing, it then became ridiculous, but now it is absolutely criminal.

Honesty signifies nothing unless there is capacity to wield the power. In the language of Wendell Phillips: Who cares for the honesty of the President unless he be capable? it is not honesty but capacity that is wanted.

When the nation again places in the hands of a Commander-in-Chief the lives of all its able-bodied men, and all its material wealth, it will want a better guarantee than the antecedents of our jocular President can furnish, that the power will be wielded ably, efficiently surely, for the perpetuity of the Union.

Should Mr. Lincoln be forced upon the country in defiance of the better judgment of the Republican party, and the Democratic party be judicious in planting a candidate for the prosecution of the war, upon the first theory above indicated, (which is their theory.) MR. LINCOLN WILL BE MOST UNQUESTIONABLY DEFEATED, UNLESS HE SHOULD BE TEMPTED, IN AN EVIL HOUR, TO USE THE MILITARY POWER IN HIS HANDS, BY SUPPRESSING THE FREEDOM OF ELECTIONS IN THE LOYAL STATES. A victory won by the sword would be no victory, but a lamentable defeat to the friends of liberty.

A convention of patriots, if wise, will never nominate for the Presidency a military leader in actual command of an army, much less the Commander-in-chief, who now has more than half a million of soldiers under his command, and if necessary to success, might have a million before the next Presidential election.

The temptation to a military candidate to use the sword to secure his own election is too great, the warnings of history too impressive, for the American people ever voluntarily to consent to so hazardous an experiment.

Never before in our history has such a combination of high qualities been required as will be needed in the administration of the government for the next four years.

The war has created a debt, the magnitude of which is astounding to consider. The interest alone will oppress the people for scores of years to come; at the same time the means of discharging the debt will, by the necessary operations of the war, have been fearfully weakened. So many hundreds of thousands of men have been called from their industrial pursuits, never to return to them; so much of the material wealth of the country has been destroyed; so many fields for the production of its great staples laid waste; indeed its whole labor system has been perverted or disorganized!

To recover the nation from this state of utter exhaustion, and restore it to its wonted prosperity, will demand an order of intelligence which is bestowed upon but few men in any country at the same time, and the mightiest intellect in our land might well tremble in assuming such responsibility. We want, in our coming President, an advanced thinker; a statesman profoundly versed in political and economic science, one who fully comprehends the spirit of the age in which we live.

Appended to this circular, and forming part of the same pamphlet, was the subjoined article, from a well-known weekly newspaper, edited by a confidential associate in Republican circles. This article derives its importance from the company in which it is found, and its endorsement by the Republican association before described. This seems the proper place to insert it, as it is a tail-piece to the preceding circular:—

THE Arabs have a proverb that curses, like young chickens, always come home to roost. The above noble lines, which were quoted from the primer by Mr. Seward, in the apparent interest of Mr. Lincoln, verify the adage. Their warning having gone the rounds against all outside aspirants, returns to its starting point, and settling upon certain recent signs in the State Legislatures, suggests that somebody is trying to steal at least the nomination and to cheat the usual conventions of the people.

These movements are evidently under the special direction of Thurlow Weed and Seward, but whether intended to be suddenly aggragated into an imposing re-investment of Mr. Lincoln with the toga without the formality of a new election, or whether it is a mere calling of the roll of those who have been bought for any exigency, it is rather difficult at this point to tell. There is one thing certain, however, and that certainty is, that the President himself is thoroughly cognizant of the whole movement, and is plunged to his arm-pits in the succulent patronage which he is doling out in its support.

Judged by this fact, he appears before us in an entirely new light, and, instead of the simple rustic who has innocently amused the country, even in its darkest hours, we find him the full partner of the crafty politician of whom he had all along appeared to be the dupe.

At the time of his election by the radicals, Mr. Lincoln, who is inherently an honest man, did not probably meditate a desertion of their principles; but finding a war unexpectedly upon his hands, he was erroneously persuaded to modify his views to suit the accident, and by certain sacrifices to endeavor to soothe and conciliate the South. Unfortunately his chief adviser was neither a man of foresight nor of courage. It was his belief that the rebellion would be put down in ninety days, and shrinking at the thought of the returning barons, he advised the President to find timely shelter in a conservative course, which, in addition to conciliating their ruffled mood, would quietly store up a large political "good will" towards his re-election. Mr. Lincoln foolishly yielded to this worse than weak idea, and from that moment became the unseen cornerstone of the new "conservative" party.

The first of the public acts with which Mr. Lincoln signalized his new converson was the remarkable dispatch in which he authorized Mr. Seward to announce broadcast to the world that "he did not expect to reduce the insurgent States to obedience by force of arms." The next was the circular by which he assured Europe as well as the Confederacy that our war should be so conducted "as not to alter the status of a single human being." These utterances, made as early as April, 1861, were doubtless honestly intended to appease the rebels, but we have seen that they only resulted in indorsing their power before foreign nations, and at the same time in depriving our cause of the solitary hold which it had upon European sentiment. These extraordinary acts have constantly puzzled the keenest of inquirers. By many it was often thought that they were purely the personal acts of Mr. Seward, and that the President, in whose name they were fulminated, being an easy-going man, was more fond of a juicy story than dry papers, really never saw them. But, aided by our new look into Mr. Lincoln's policy, we are able to translate the apparent contradictions, and to understand them as consistent, if not with his public attitude, at least with the unpromulgated temporizing Seward programme. We can now understand, moreover, the long tampering with the treason of the border States; the motive of the checks administered to the progress of emancipation in Maryland and in Missouri; of the amazing dictation to Congress how to vote on the Confiscation Act, lest he reprove them with his veto; of his removal of the District Attorney of St. Louis, for participating too actively in the radical election; of his lending the patronage of the government to Seward for the election of Horatio Seymour; and, perhaps, most significant of all, because most constant and continuous, of his retaining Weed around him, in face of his open apostacy from the emancipation and republican doctrines, and informal embrace of the "conservative" faith! If these things have no significance, perhaps the fact that Weed is now engineering the Lincoln expression in the Legislatures has!

It may be said that the great edicts of amnesty and emancipation are contradictions to our theory, and that Mr. Lincoln either did these things despite of Seward & Co., or that he is not a full partner to their plans. But the truth is, these acts, like Seward's tardy courage on the subject of the rebel rams, were the results purely of an irresistible pressure of the people, and we may add that the President undoubtedly found rising courage for his task in the fact that the rebel cause was fast sinking under our arms. In degree as the patriotic temper of the country reduced the hopes of the rebellion the President was released from his alarms, and to the same degree became the sincere auxiliary of its wishes. We have the utmost faith in his intentions, but knowing his defects, shall hardly expect to see him converted to the Conness doctrine of striking a rebel wherever you can reach him any earlier than Fernando Wood. Fernando, watching the decline of the Confederacy, has already voted in recognition of the negro regiments. When the planter aristocracy are fugitive, and the released white masses of the South rank as the intensest enemies of slavery, we shall expect to see Abraham and the sage of Bloomingdale weeping on each other's necks in all the beatitude of an excelling abolitionism.

Between this and that, however, there may be much danger in Mr. Lincoln's unfortunate idiosyncracies; and while we have full respect for his intentions, we fear to entrust him (at least while he is bound in with Weed and Seward) with the stupendously important settlement of this war. He is hardly the man to handle this country, while its heart is over generous with reconstituted peace, so that due guarantees may be exacted from its enemies. We may reasonably apprehend any mistake in the future, from what has gone before; and as for general statesmanship, we take his full measure in the fact, that he once actually advised the extradition of four millions of laborers from our eager and entreating soil, while in the next breath, he proposed a bill to encourage foreign emigration. Compared with this gigantic crime against the yearning hemisphere, the retention of these hapless beings in slavery would have been a passable offence!

Manifestly, therefore, this excellent man, though honest as the sun, and perhaps the best story-teller in the world, is not the statesman to pluck this groveling country from the mire, and set its face, with august resolution, against our enemies across the ocean. He is not the man to grapple with a tithe of our responsibilities, foreign or domestic; and no mere political Peter Funks, whom charitable constituencies have sent to the State Legislatures with "permits to trade," can dictate such a candidate upon this rising hour.

We have seen nothing more shameless and insolent, than this legislative nomination, in the whole history of American politics, and the wonder is, that men of so much experience as Weed and Seward have undertaken it. It is an adaptation of the corrupt practices of the "ring" to a larger job than was ever before undertaken in this country. When Rome was in her lowest period of degradation, it was the custom of the Prætorian Guards to sell the Empire to the highest bidder. While our slave oligarchy was in swing, we once predicted that a candidate might yet pay his way to the Presidential chair through the avenues of the convention; but, really, we never expected to see the bribery of the conventions simplified and anticipated, by doling the first chances out, to the more limited consciences of legislative "rings." Indeed, what we least of all expected was, to see these speculators, who have now "got along with" five States, extending their unctuous palms over Uncle Abraham's head, in mock consecration of a political Messiah, who, with his tongue in his cheek all the while, is chiefly anxious to get through the ceremony, that he may delight them with some smutty story.

To fill out the last page of the pamphlet, the committee printed the following squib, conveying, by an apt parable, the idea that, while the superficial current was running in favor of Mr. Lincoln, there was a deep undercurrent in the Republican party, setting strongly against him. The squib, like Mr. Wilkes' article, derives its significance from the respectability of its influential endorsers:

Old Abe and Philosophy of Currents.—During a conversation which took place last week, between our worthy President and a distinguished western Senator, the recent legislative nominations for the next Presidency were incidentally referred to. "Yes," said Mr. Lincoln, nursing his leg with evident gratification—yes, the current seems to be setting all one way!" "It does, really, seem to be setting all one way," was the answer of the Senator; "but, Mr. Lincoln, as you have told me several good stories since I have been here, permit me, if you please, to tell you one." "'It has always been observed, that the Atlantic Ocean, at the Straights of Gibraltar, constantly pours into the Mediterranean, with tremendous volume. The Bosphorus empties into it, at its other end, and rivers are seen contributing to its waters all along its coast. It was, for many years, the constant puzzle of geographers, why the Mediterranean, under all these accessions, never got full and overran its banks. After a while, however, a curious fellow took the notion of dropping a plummet in the centre of the Straights, when, lo! he discovered that, though the tremendous body of water on the surface was rushing inward from the ocean, a still more powerful body was passing outward, in a counter current, at some twenty feet below!'"

"Oh, ah!" said Old Abe, seriously, evidently nonplussed, for the first time in his life; "that does not remind me of any story I ever heard before!"

The Republican Committee, by whom the preceding secret circular was issued, having concluded that Secretary Chase was the strongest man they could present against Mr. Lincoln, put forth, in February, another circular, announcing Mr. Chase as a candidate, and repeating, more briefly, their inculpations of Mr. Lincoln, and the corrupt influences at work to secure his nomination. The following is a copy of this second circular:—

THE POMEROY CIRCULAR.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 1864.

SIR, — The movements recently made throughout the country, to secure the re-nomination of President Lincoln, render necessary some counter-action on the part of those unconditional friends of the Union who differ from the policy of his Administration.

So long as no efforts were made to forestall the political action of the people, it was both wise and patriotic for all true friends of the government to devote their influence to the supression of the rebellion; but when it becomes evident that party machinery and official influence are being used to secure the perpetuation of the present Administration, those who conscientiously believe that the interests of the country and of freedom demand a change in favor of vigor, and purity, and nationality, have no choice but to appeal at once to the people before it shall be too late to secure a fair discussion of principles.

Those in behalf of whom this communication is made have thoughtfully surveyed the political field, and have arrived at the following conclusions :—

1. That even were the re-election of Mr. Lincoln desirable, it is practically impossible against the union of influence which will oppose him.

2. That, should he be re-elected, his manifest tendency towards compromises and temporary expedients of policy will become stronger during a second term than it has been in the first, and the cause of human liberty and the dignity and honor of the nation suffer proportionately; while the war may continue to languish during his whole administration, till the public debt shall become a burden too great to be borne.

3. That the patronage of the government, through the necessities of the war, has been so rapidly increased, and to such an enormous extent, and so loosely placed, as to render application of the "one-term principle" absolutely essential to the certain safety of our republican institutions.

4. That we find united in Hon. Salmon P. Chase more of the qualities needed in a President during the next four years than are combined in any other available candidate; his record, clear and unimpeachable, showing him to be a statesman of rare ability and an administrator of the very highest order, while his private character furnishes the surest obtainable guarantee of economy and purity in the management of public affairs.

5. That the discussion of the Presidential question, already commenced by the friends of Mr. Lincoln, has developed a popularity and strength in Mr. Chase unexpected even to his warmest admirers; and while we are aware that this strength is at present unorganized, and in no condition to manifest its real magnitude, we are satisfied that it only needs systematic and faithful efforts to develope it to an extent sufficient to overcome all opposing obstacles. For these reasons the friends of Mr. Chase have determined on measures which shall present his claims fairly and at once to the country. A central organization has been effected, which already has its connections in all the States, and the object of which is to enable his friends everywhere most effectually to promote his elevation to the Presidency. We wish the hearty co-operation of those in favor of the speedy restoration of the Union upon the basis of universal freedom, and who desire an administration of the government during the first period of its new life, which shall, to the fullest extent, develope the capacity of free institutions, enlarge the resources of the country, diminish the burdens of taxation, elevate the standard of public and private morality, vindicate the honor of the Republic before the world, and, in all things, make an American nationality the fairest example for imitation which human progress has ever achieved.

If those objects meet your approval, you can render efficient aid by exerting yourself to at once organize your section of the country, and by corresponding with the Chirman of the National Executive Committee, for the purpose either of receiving or imparting information.

Very respectfully,

S. C. POMEROY,
Chairman National Executive Committee.

WHILE the respectable and influential Republican Associations which issued the preceding documents, were aiming to counteract the office holders, who had got the start of them, portions of the Republican press indicated their opinion of Mr. Lincoln's incapacity, and their hostility to his nomination. The most important of these were the New-York "Tribune," the New-York "Evening Post," the "Independent," and "Brownson's Quarterly Review." Our space does not permit quotations from all these; but, as a vigorous specimen of manly and truthful criticism, we copy the following extracts from an article in the one last named. Doctor Brownson has been, for the last thirty years, known as one of the ablest and most eminent writers in this country. Two years ago, he was the Republican candidate for Congress in the New Jersey District in which he resides. His charges against Mr. Lincoln are supported, as the reader will see, by great force of reasoning.

[From Brownson's Review for April, 1864.]

We wish to speak of Mr. Lincoln in terms befitting ourselves and his high position, but we must say that he has proved himself totally deficient in administrative talent. No branch of the government has been well and efficiently administered under him. Much routine work, done by old experienced clerks, may have been done regularly enough; some of the Secretaries have been able men, and have managed their respective departments as well as they could be managed under such a chief; but the Administration in the sense that it must receive its impulse, its spirit and tone from the President himself, has been loose, fluctuating, unsystematic, weak, and inefficient, in all save expenditure of men and money. It has lacked promptness, energy, economy. Its extravagance has been appalling, its expenditures enormous, and little to show for them. Its yearly expenses, when all accounts are audited, will be found to be double those of Great Britain in her gigantic wars with the Emperor Napoleon, when she subsidized nearly all Europe, while our resources are far less than hers were at the time. During four years it will have run up a national debt above that of Great Britain, and equal to one-third of the assessed values of the whole Union, according to the census of 1860. And no small portion of this enormous sum has been literally wasted. Vast sums have been expended on expeditions that have come to naught, and on the construction of Monitors, not worth their weight in old iron. Contracts have been made on terms needlessly disadvantageous to the government, and, in most of them, if heavy, the government has been swindled, by collusions between contractors and its own employés. The Administration has not known how to inspire its own agents with a sense of duty, or to hold them to a rigid accountability. It has not known how to husband its resources, or to manage its finances with economy, with advantage to the public service. The people gave generously, Congress voted liberally ample supplies of men and money, but nothing has come of it, but an army of suddenly enriched contractors, speculators, and swindlers, who are using all their influence to prolong the war. The Administration seems never to have regarded economy as necessary. The war, it was sure, would be a short war; the rebellion was always on its last legs, and was sure to be soon put down; and what mattered to so great and rich a nation a few hundred million a year, more or less? Peace would soon return, commerce revive, and the resources of the people reunited would soon extinguish a national debt of any magnitude. Suppose thousands of contractors, speculators, and swindlers do fatten on the spoils of the Treasury; are they not sure to be loyal supporters of the Administration and the war?

Mr. Lincoln's military operations have shown an equal want of administrative capacity. The responsibility is not to be shifted from him to the generals commanding in the field, or to the General-in-Chief, with his headquarters at the seat of government. Generals commanding armies are subordinate to the civil power, and though the ablest, having the best dispositions in the world, they can accomplish little under a weak, indecisive, and vacillating civil administration, that has no intelligible purpose, that changes its purpose every other day, or does not insist on its purpose being carried out.

Mr. Lincoln has never told the army what he wanted or expected of it, for he has never known himself. He wanted to put down the rebellion, indeed, but by force of arms! by political manipulation! or by both combined! At first the troops were called out only to defend Washington, and the war was to be purely defensive. Then there came a cry "On to Richmond." Then an expedition was sent out to gain a few ports on the Southern coast, and then to get a foothold in some rebel State, for political and commercial rather than for military purposes. New Orleans was taken, in order to please the shipping interest, and the Mississippi River was left closed for the benefit of the railroad interest. One day attention is momentarily given to military interests, and the next every thing yields to the desire of manufacturing, by the aid of Federal bayonets, sham States in Rebeldom, and securing a few Congressional or electoral votes for the Administration. What can the military do, liable every moment to be disconcerted by some new trick or crotchet of the Administration? The astonishment is that they have done so much, not that they have not done more.

Then we have never had only about three-fifths of the men present whose names are on the muster rolls, and whom the government is paying. In August, 1862, the President himself told us, that the number of men on the grand roll receiving pay from the government was six hundred thousand, and yet the number present in the several armies was only about three hundred and sixty thousand. Where were the rest? In hospitals? Some of them were, but the greater part were well and hearty, the President said, at home, tending bar, at work on railroads, or on farms, and a considerable number of them, he might have said, had never been enlisted. But for these absent men, stragglers, deserters, or never enlisted, the three hundred thousand additional volunteers called for in July of that year would not have been needed. The administration of the army is all of a piece with this, and probably the government has, all along, being paying for at least one-fourth more men than it has or ever has had in its service. Who dare say that this could happen under a President of even ordinary administrative capacity?

The policy of the Administration in its conduct of the war has been not only expensive, inefficient, but capricious, often unintelligible, to be explained only as one or another influence in the Cabinet, or outside, predominated.

Mr. Lincoln sent a fleet, with a land force under General T. W. Sherman, and took possession of Hilton Head, after one of the most splendid naval victories over land fortifications on record. Sherman, aided by the fleet, could easily, at that time, have taken possession of both Charleston and Savannah, but he had positive orders not to set a foot on the main land. Why? We know not, unless Charleston and Savannah were not strongly enough fortified and garrisoned to render their capture sufficiently difficult and costly—unless it would have too seriously damaged the rebellion, and been too great a humiliation to the rebels. Perhaps it would have irritated them. It has been the misfortune of Mr. Lincoln, from the capture of the arsenal and armory at Harper's Ferry, and the Navy Yard at Gosport, down to the present, to be never ready at the time, to be always behindhand, or in the wrong place, and obliged to re-take, at great expense and terrible loss of life, what a little forethought, promptness and energy might have enabled him to keep, or never to have lost. But for the courage and boldness of General Morris, when he first took command of Fort McHenry, the rebels in Baltimore might easily have taken that fort, the key to the whole position, and carried away Washington and Maryland in the secession movement, and so secured the Confederacy a prompt recognition as the United States by Foreign Powers, for the fort, if attacked only with pikes and scaling ladders by the rebel force then in Baltimore, could have made no defence, and must have surrendered, so destitute had it been left. The President is never ready to strike a home blow, and his measures are generally wrong measures, or right measures at a wrong time, or in a wrong place.

Mr. Lincoln evidently knows nothing of the philosophy of history, or of the higher elements of human nature. He imagines that men act only from low and interested motives, and does not suspect, because he does not feel, the presence of a heroic element, the element, Carlyle would call it, of hero-worship, that makes men admire and cling to, and uphold a bold, daring policy, energetically proclaimed, firmly adhered to, and consistently acted on, though in the face and eyes of their interest. His soul seems made of leather, and incapable of any grand or noble emotion. Compared with the mass of men, he is a line of flat prose in a beautiful and spirited lyric. He lowers, he never elevates you. You leave his presence with your enthusiasm damped, your better feelings crushed, and your hopes cast to the winds. You ask not, can this man carry the nation through its terrible struggles? but, can the nation carry this man through them, and not perish in the attempt? He never adopts a clean policy. When he hits upon a policy, substantially good in itself, he contrives to be-little it, besmear it, or, in some other way, to render it mean, contemptible and useless. Even wisdom from him seems but folly. It is not his fault, but his misfortune. He is a good sort of man, with much natural shrewdness and respectable native abilities; but he is misplaced in the Presidential Chair. He lives and moves in an order of thought, in a world many degrees below that in which a great man lives and moves. We blame him not because he is mole-eyed and not eagle-eyed, and that he has no suspicion of that higher region of thought and action in which lie the great interests and questions he is called upon to deal with, as President of the United States. He has done as much as was in his power to make himself, and should be respected for what he has made himself, and the fault that he is not fit for his position is the fault of us who put him there. His only fault is, the misfortune of being unconscious of hisown unfitness for his place.

GEN. FREMONT'S LETTER OF ACCEPTANCE.

In the latter part of May, a large Convention of Republicans, consisting of delegates from all the loyal States, was held at Cleveland, Ohio, and nominated General Fremont for the Presidency. General Fremont was the popular Republican candidate in the Presidential canvass of 1856. He is one of the most gifted and trusted leaders of the anti-slavery party. In his letter, accepting the Cleveland nomination, he expressed, with manly frankness, his opinion of Mr. Lincoln's character, and the ruinous tendency of his measures. We insert the letter in full:

Gentlemen,—In answer to the letter which I have had the honor to receive from you, on the part of the representatives of the people assembled at Cleveland, on the 31st of May, I desire to express my thanks for the confidence which led them to offer me the honorable and difficult position of their candidate in the approaching Presidential contest.

Very honorable, because, in offering it to me, you act in the name of a great number of citizens who seek, above all things, the good of their country, and who have no sort of selfish interest in view. Very difficult, because in accepting the candidacy you propose to me, I am exposed to the reproach of creating a schism in the party with which I have been identified.

Had Mr. Lincoln remained faithful to the principles he was elected to defend, no schism could have been created, and no contest could have been possible. This is not an ordinary election. It is a contest for the right even to have candidates, and not merely, as usual, for the choice among them. Now, for the first time since '76, the question of constitutional liberty has been brought directly before the people for their serious consideration and vote. The ordinary rights secured, under the Constitution and the laws of the country, have been violated, and extraordinary powers have been usurped by the Executive. It is directly before the people now to say whether or not the principles established by the Revolution are worth maintaining.

If, as we have been taught to believe, those guarantees for liberty which made the distinctive value and glory of our country, are in truth inviolably sacred, then here must be a protest against the arbitrary violation which had not even the excuse of necessity. The schism is made by those who force the choice between a shameful silence or a protest against wrong. In such considerations originated the Cleveland Convention. It was among its objects to arouse the attention of the people to such facts, and to bring them to realize that while we are saturating Southern soil with the best blood of the country in the name of liberty, we have really parted with it at home.

To-day, we have in the country the abuses of a military dictation, without its unity of action and vigor of execution. An Administration marked at home by disregard of constitutional rights, by its violations of personal liberty and the liberty of the press, and, as a crowning shame, by its abandonment of the right of asylum, a right especially dear to all free nations abroad. Its course has been characterized by a feebleness and want of principle which has misled European powers, and driven them to a belief that only commercial interests and personal aims are concerned, and that no great principles are involved in the issue. The admirable conduct of the people, their readiness to make every sacrifice demanded of them, their forbearance and silence under the suspension of everything that could be suspended, their many acts of heroism and sacrifices were all rendered fruitless by the incapacity, or, to speak more exactly, by the personal ends for which the war was managed. This incapacity and selfishness naturally produced such results as led the European powers, and logically enough, to the conviction that the North, with its greatly superior population, its immense resources, and its credit, will never be able to recover the South. Sympathies which should have been with us from the outset of the war were turned against us, and in this way the Administration has done the country a double wrong abroad. It created hostility, or at best indifference, among those who would have been its friends if the real interests of the people could have been better known, while, at the same time, it neglected no occasion for making the most humiliating concessions.

Against this disastrous condition of affairs the Cleveland Convention was a protest.

The principles which form the basis of its platform have my unqualified and cordial approbation; but I cannot so heartily concur in all the measures which you propose. I do not believe that confiscation extended to the property of all rebels is practicable, and if it were so, I do not think it a measure of sound policy. It is, in fact, a question belonging to the people themselves to decide, and is a proper occasion for the exercise of their original and sovereign authority. As a war measure, in the beginning of a revolt which might be quelled by prompt severity, I understand the policy of confiscation, but not as a final measure of reconstruction after the suppression of an insurrection.

In the adjustments which are to follow peace no considerations of vengeance can consistently be admitted.

The object of the war is to make permanently secure the peace and happiness of the whole country, and there was but a single element in the way of its attainment. This element of slavery may be considered practically destroyed in the country, and it needs only your proposed amendment of the Constitution to make its extinction complete.

With this extinction of slavery the party divisions created by it have also disappeared. And if in the history of the country there has ever been a time when the American people, without regard to one or another of the political divisions, were called upon to give solemnly their voice in a matter which involved the safety of the United States, it is assuredly the present time.

If the Convention at Baltimore will nominate any man whose past life justifies a well-grounded confidence in his fidelity to our cordial principles, there is no reason why there should be any division among the really patriotic men of the country. To any such I shall be most happy to give a cordial and active support.

My own decided preference is to aid in this way, and not to be myself a candidate. But if Mr. Lincoln should be re nominated, as I believe it would be fatal to the country to endorse a policy and renew a power which has cost us the lives of thousands of men, and needlessly put the country on the road to bankruptcy, there will remain no alternative but to organize against him every element of conscientious opposition, with the view to prevent the misfortune of his re-election.

In this contingency, I accept the nomination at Cleveland, and, as a preliminary step, I have resigned my commission in the army.

This was a sacrifice it gave me pain to make. But I had for a long time fruitlessly endeavored to obtain service. I make this sacrifice now only to regain liberty of speech and to leave nothing in the way of discharging to my utmost ability the task you have set for me.

With my earnest and sincere thanks for your expressions of confidence and regard, and for the many honorable terms in which you acquaint me with the actions of the committee, I am, gentlemen, very respectfully and truly yours,

J. C. FREMONT.

New-York, June 4, 1864.

To Messrs. Worthington G. Snethen, of Maryland; Edward Gilbert, of New York; Caspar Butz, of Illinois; Chas. E. Moss, of Missouri; N. P. Sawyer, of Pennsylvania, a committee, &c.

SENATORS BEN. WADE AND HENRY WINTER DAVIS ON MR. LINCOLN.

TO THE SUPPORTERS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

In his Annual Message, in December last, Mr. Lincoln proclaimed a plan for re-organizing the rebel States. As a qualification for voting, he required the citizens to swear allegiance to the Emancipation Proclamation, and declared that when one-tenth of the voters should take this oath, they might proceed to organize a State government, which should be binding over the other nine-tenths. His obvious purpose was to create a political machinery for re-electing himself, by conferring upon a small clique of his tools the power of casting the whole electoral vote of several of the rebel States. Even the Republican party in Congress could not be brought to favor so bare-faced a swiddle. They passed a bill for re-organizing the States in rebellion, which, although objectionable in many respects, had the merit of setting aside the corrupt scheme of Mr. Lincoln. This bill the President vetoed by proclamation. This was so gross an outrage, both in substance and in form, that two distinguished Republicans, Mr. Wade, the Chairman of Committee, to which the subject belonged, in the Senate, and Mr. Davis, Chairman of the corresponding Committee of the House, published the very able address to the Republican party which we here copy, and commend to the earnest attention of the country:

We have read without surprise, but not without indignation, the proclamation of the President, of the 8th of July, 1864.

The supporters of the Administration are responsible to the country for its conduct; and it is their right and duty to check the encroachments of the Executive on the authority of Congress, and to require it to confine itself to its proper sphere.

It is impossible to pass in silence this proclamation without neglecting that duty; and, having taken as much responsibility as any others in supporting the Administration, we are not disposed to fail in the other duty of asserting the rights of Congress.

The President did not sign the bill "to guarantee to certain States whose governments have been usurped, a republican form of government,"—passed by the supporters of his administration in both Houses of Congress after mature deliberation.

The bill did not, therefore, become a law; and it is, therefore, nothing.

The proclamation is neither an approval nor a veto of the bill; it is, therefore, a document unknown to the laws, and Constitution of the United States.

So far, it contains an apology for not signing of the bill, as it is, political manifesto against the friends of the government. So far as it proposes to execute the bill which is not a law, it is a grave executive usurpation.

It is fitting that the facts necessary to enable the friends of the administration to appreciate the apology, and the usurpation be spread before them.

The proclamation says:

"And, whereas, the said bill was presented to the President of the United States for his approval less than one hour before the sine die adjournment of said session, and was not signed by him"—

If that be accurate, still this bill was presented with other bills which were signed.

Within that hour, the time for the sine die adjournment was three times postponed by the votes of both Houses; and the least intimation of a desire for more time by the President to consider this bill would have secured a further postponement.

Yet the committee sent to ascertain if the President had any further communication for the House of Representatives reported that he had none; and the friends of the bill, who had anxiously waited on him to ascertain its fate, had already been informed that the President had resolved not to sign it. The time of presentation, therefore, had nothing to do with his failure to approve it.

The bill had been discussed and considered for more than a month in the House of Representatives, which it passed on the 4th of May; it was reported to the Senate on the 27th of May, without material amendment, and passed the Senate absolutely as it came from the House on the 2d of July. Ignorance of its contents is out of the question.

Indeed, at his request, a draft of a bill substantially the same in all material points, and identical in the points objected to by the proclamation, had been laid before him for his consideration in the winter of 1862-1863.

There is, therefore, no reason to suppose the provisions of the bill took the President by surprise.

On the contrary, we have reason to believe them to have been so well known that this method of preventing the bill from becoming a law without the constitutional responsibility of a veto, had been resolved on long before the bill passed the Senate.

We are informed by a gentleman entitled to entire confidence, that, before the 22d of June, in New Orleans, it was stated by a member of General Banks's staff, in the presence of other gentlemen in official position, that Senator Doolittle had written a letter to the Department that the House Reconstruction bill would be staved off in the Senate to a period too late in the session to require the President to veto it in order to defeat it, and that Mr. Lincoln would retain the bill, if necessary, and thereby defeat it.

The experience of Senator Wade, in his various efforts to get the bill considered in the Senate, was quite in accordance with that plan; and the fate of the bill was accurately predicted by letters received from New Orleans, before it had passed the Senate.

Had the proclamation stopped there, it would have been only one other defeat of the will of the people, by an executive perversion of the Constitution.

But it goes further. The President says:

"And, whereas, the said bill contains, among other things, a plan for restoring the States in rebellion to their proper practical relation in the Union, which plan expresses the sense of Congress upon that subject, and which plan it is now thought fit to lay before the people for their consideration"—

By what authority of the Constitution? In what forms? The result to be declared by whom? With what effect when ascertained?

Is it to be a law by the approval of the people, without the approval of Congress, at the will of the President?

Will the President, on his opinion of the popular approval, execute it as law?

Or is this merely a device to avoid the serious responsibility of defeating a law on which so many loyal hearts reposed for security?

But the reasons now assigned for not approving the bill are full of ominous significance.

The President proceeds:

"Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known, that, while I am (as I was in December last, when by proclamation I propounded a plan for restoration) unprepared, by a formal approval of this bill, to be inflexibly committed to any single plan of restoration"—

That is to say, the President is resolved that the people shall not by law take any securities from the rebel States against a renewal of the rebellion, before restoring their power to govern us.

His wisdom and prudence are to be our sufficient guarantees.

He further says:

"And while I am also unprepared to declare that the free State Constitutions and governments already adopted and installed in Arkansas and Louisiana shall be set aside and held for naught, thereby repelling and discouraging the loyal citizens who have set up the same as to further effort"—

That is to say, the President persists in recognizing those shadows of governments in Arkansas and Louisiana, which Congress formally declared should not be recognized—whose Representatives and Senators were repelled by formal votes of both Houses of Congress—which it was declared formally should have no electoral vote for President and Vice-President.

They are the mere creatures of his will. They cannot live a day without his support. They are mere oligarchies, imposed on the people by military orders under the forms of election, at which generals, provost-marshals, soldiers and camp-followers were the chief actors, assisted by a handful of resident citizens, and urged on to premature action by private letters from the President.

In neither Louisiana nor Arkansas, before Banks's defeat, did the United States control half the territory or half the population. In Louisiana, General Banks's proclamation can didly declared :—" The fundamental law of the State is martial law."

On that foundation of freedom he erected what the President calls " the free Constitution and government of Louisiana."

But of this State, whose fundamental law was martial law, only sixteen parishes out of forty-eight parishes, were held by the United States, and in the five of the sixteen we held only our camps.

The eleven parishes we substantially held had two hundred and thirty-three thousand one hundred and eighty-five inhabitants ; the residue of the State not held by us, five hundred and seventy-five thousand six hundred and seventeen.

At the farce called an election, the officers of General Banks returned that eleven thousand three hundred and forty-six ballots were cast ; but whether any, or by whom, the people of the United States have no legal assurance ; but it is probable that four thousand were cast by soldiers or employees of the United States military or municipal, but none according to any law, State or national, and seven thousand ballots represent the State of Louisiana.

Such is the free Constitution and government of Louisiana ; and like it is that of Arkansas. Nothing but the failure of a military expedition deprived us of a like one in the swamps of Florida ; and before the Presidential election, like ones may be organized in every rebel State where the United States have a camp.

The President, by preventing this bill from becoming a law, holds the electoral votes of the rebel States at the dictation of his personal ambition.

If those votes turn the balance in his favor, is it to be supposed that his competitor, defeated by such means, will acquiesce ?

If the rebel majority assert their supremacy in those States. and send votes which elect an enemy of the government, will we not repel his claims ?

And is not that civil war for the Presidency inaugurated by the votes of rebel States ?

Seriously impressed with these dangers, Congress, "the proper constitutional authority," formally declared that there are no State governments in the rebel States, and provided for their erection at a proper time ; and both the Senate and the House of Representatives rejected the Senators and Representatives chosen under the authority of what the President calls the free Constitution and government of Arkansas.

The President's proclamation "holds for naught" this judgment, and discards the authority of the Supreme Court, and strides headlong towards the anarchy his proclamation of the 8th of December inaugurated.

If electors for President be allowed to be chosen in either of those States, a sinister light will be cast on the motives which induced the President "to hold for naught" the will of Congress rather than his government in Louisiana and Arkansas.

That judgment of Congress which the President defies was the exercise of an authority exclusively vested in Congress by the Constitution, to determine what is the established government in a State, and in its own nature, and by the highest judicial authority, binding on all other departments of the government.

The Supreme Court has formally declared that, under the 4th section of the IVth article of the Constitution, requiring the United States to guarantee to every State a republican form of government, "it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State ;" and "when Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority, and its decision is binding in every other department of the government and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal. It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue ; and, as no Senators or Representatives were elected under the authority of the government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, Congress was not called upon to decide the controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there."

Even the President's proclamation of the 8th of December, formally declares that "whether members sent to Congress from any State shall be admitted to seats constitutionally, rests exclusively with the respective Houses, and not to any extent with the Executive."

And that is not the less true because wholly inconsistent with the President's assumption in that proclamation of a right to institute and recognize State governments in the rebel States, nor because the President is unable to perceive that his recognition is a nullity if it be not conclusive on Congress.

Under the Constitution, the right to Senators and Representatives is inseparable from a State government. If there be a State government, the right is absolute. If there be no State Government there can be no Senators or Representatives chosen. The two Houses of Congress are expressly declared to be the sole judges of their own members.

When, therefore, Senators and Representatives are admitted, the State government, under whose authority they were chosen, is conclusively established ; when they are rejected, its existence is as conclusively rejected and denied ; and to this judgment the President is bound to submit.

The President proceeds to express his unwillingness "to declare a constitutional competency in Congress to abolish slavery in States" as another reason for not signing the bill.

But the bill nowhere proposes to abolish slavery in States.

The bill did provide that all slaves in the rebel States should be manumitted.

But as the President had already signed three bills, manumitting several classes of slaves in States, it is not conceived possible that he entertained any scruples touching that provision of the bill respecting which he is silent.

He had already himself assumed a right, by proclamation, to free much the larger number of slaves in the rebel States, under the authority given him by Congress to use military power to suppress the rebellion; and it is quite inconceivable that the President should think Congress could vest in him a discretion it could not exercise itself.

It is the more unintelligible from the fact that, except in respect to a small part of Virginia and Louisiana, the bill covered only what the proclamation covered—added a Congressional title and judicial remedies by law to the disputed title under the proclamation, and perfected the work the President professed to be so anxious to accomplish.

Slavery as an institution, can be abolished only by a change of the Constitution of the United States or of the law of the State; and this is the principle of the bill.

It required the new Constitution of the State to provide for that prohibition; and the President, in the face of his own proclamation, does not venture to object to insisting on that condition. Nor will the country tolerate its abandonment—yet he defeated the only provision imposing it!!

But when he describes himself, in spite of this great blow at emancipation, as "sincerely hoping and expecting that a constitutional amendment abolishing slavery throughout the nation may be adopted," we curiously inquire on what his expectation rests, after the vote of the House of Representatives at the recent session, and in the face of the political complexion of more than enough of the States to prevent the possibility of its adoption within any reasonable time; and why he did not indulge his sincere hopes with so large an installment of the blessing as his approval of the bill would have secured.

After this assignment of his reasons for preventing the bill from becoming a law, the President proceeds to declare his purpose to execute it as a law by his plenary dictatorial power. He says:

"Nevertheless, I am fully satisfied with the system for restoration contained in the bill as one very proper plan for the loyal people of any State choosing to adopt it; and that I am, and at all times shall be, prepared to give the executive aid and assistance to any such people so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any such State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and the laws of the United States; in which cases military governors will be appointed, with directions to proceed according to the bill."

A more studied outrage on legislative authority of the people has never been perpetrated.

Congress passed a bill; the President refused to approve it, and then by proclamation puts as much of it in force as he sees fit, and proposes to execute those parts by officers unknown to the laws of the United States, and not subject to the confirmation of the Senate!

The bill directed the appointment of provisional governors by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The President, after defeating the law, proposes to appoint, without law, and without the advice and consent of the Senate, military governors for the rebel States!

He has already exercised this dictatorial usurpation in Louisiana, and he defeated the bill, to prevent its limitation.

Henceforth we must regard the following precedent as the presidential law of the rebel States:—

"EXECUTIVE MANSION,
"WASHINGTON, March 15, 1864.

"His Excellency Michael Hahn, Governor of Louisiana:

"Until further orders, you are hereby invested with the powers hitherto exercised by the military Governor of Louisiana.

"Yours, ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

This Michael Hahn is no officer of the United States. The President, without law, without the advice and consent of the Senate, by a private note, not even countersigned by the Secretary of State, makes him dictator of Louisiana!

The bill provided for the civil administration of the laws of the State—till it should be in a fit temper to govern itself—repealing all laws recognizing slavery, and making all men equal before the law.

These beneficent provisions the President has annulled. People will die, and marry, and transfer property, and buy and sell; and to these acts of civil life courts and officers of the law are necessary. Congress legislated for these necessary things, and the President deprives them of the protection of the law!

The President's purpose to instruct his military governors "to proceed according to the bill"—a makeshift to calm the disappointment its defeat has occasioned—is not merely a grave usurpation, but a transparent delusion. He cannot "proceed according to the bill," after preventing it from becoming a law.

Whatever is done will be at his will and pleasure, by persons responsible to no law, and more interested to secure the interests and execute the will of the President than of the people; and the will of Congress is to be "held for naught," "unless the loyal people of the rebel States choose to adopt it."

If they should graciously prefer the stringent bill to the easy proclamation, still the registration will be made under no legal sanction; it will give no assurance that a majority of the people of the States have taken the oath; if administered, it will be without legal authority, and void; no indictment will lie for false swearing at the election, or for admitting bad or rejecting good votes; it will be the farce of Louisiana and Arkansas acted over again under the forms of this bill, but not by authority of law.

But when we come to the guarantees of future peace which Congress meant to enact, the forms as well as the substance of the bill must yield to the President's will, that none should be imposed.

It was the solemn resolve of Congress to protect the loyal men of the nation against three great dangers, (1) the return to power of the guilty leaders of the rebellion, (2) the continuance of slavery, and (3) the burden of the rebel debt.

Congress required assent to those provisions by the Convention of the State; and if refused, it was to be dissolved. The President "holds for naught" that resolve of Congress, because he is unwilling "to be inflexibly committed to any one plan of restoration," and the people of the United States are not to be allowed to protect themselves unless their enemies agree to it.

The order to proceed according to the bill is, therefore, merely at the will of the rebel States; and they have the option to reject it, accept the proclamation of the 8th of December, and demand the President's recognition!

Mark the contrast! The bill requires a majority, the proclamation is satisfied with one-tenth; the bill requires one oath, the proclamation another; the bill ascertains voters by registering, the proclamation by guess; the bill exacts adherence to existing territorial limits, the proclamation admits of others; the bill governs the rebel States by law, equalizing all before it, the proclamation commits them to the lawless discretion of military governors and provost-marshals; the bill forbids electors for President, the proclamation and defeat of the bill threaten us with civil war for the admission or exclusion of such votes; the bill exacted exclusion of dangerous enemies from power and the relief of the nation from the rebel debt, and the prohibition of slavery for ever, so that the suppression of the rebellion will double our resources to bear or pay the national debt, free the masses from the old domination of the rebel leaders, and eradicate the cause of the war; the proclamation secures neither of these guarantees.

It is silent respecting the rebel debt, and the political exclusion of rebel leaders; leaving slavery exactly where it was by law at the outbreak of the rebellion, and adds no guarantee even of the freedom of the slaves he undertook to manumit. It is summed up in an illegal oath, without a sanction, and therefore void. The oath is to support all proclamations of the President, during the rebellion, having reference to slaves.

Any government is to be accepted at the hands of one-tenth of the people not contravening that oath. Now, that oath neither secures the abolition of slavery nor adds any security to the freedom of the slaves the President declared free.

It does not secure the abolition of slavery; for the proclamation of freedom merely professed to free certain slaves while it recognized the institution.

Every Constitution of the rebel States, at the outbreak of the rebellion, may be adopted without the change of a letter; for none of them contravene that proclamation; none of them establish slavery.

It adds no security to the freedom of the slaves. For their title is the proclamation of freedom.

If it be unconstitutional, an oath to support it is void. Whether constitutional or not, the oath is without authority of law, and therefore void.

If it be valid and observed, it exacts no enactment by the State, either in law or Constitution, to add a State guarantee to the proclamation title; and the right of a slave to freedom is an open question before the State Courts on the relative authority of the State law and the proclamation.

If the oath binds the one-tenth who take it, it is not exacted of the other nine-tenths who succeed to the control of the State government; so that it is annulled instantly by the act of recognition.

What the State Courts would say of the proclamation, who can doubt?

But the master would not go into Court—he would seize his slave.

What the Supreme Court would say, who can tell?

When and how is the question to get there?

No habeas corpus lies for him in the United States Court; and the President defeated with his bill its extension of that writ to this case.

Such are the fruits of this rash and fatal act of the President—a blow at the friends of his administration, at the rights of humanity, and at the principles of Republican Government. The President has greatly presumed on the forbearance which the supporters of his administration have so long practised, in view of the arduous conflict in which we are engaged, and the reckless ferocity of our political opponents.

But he must understand that our support is of a cause and not of a man; that the authority of Congress is paramount, and must be respected; that the whole body of the Union men of Congress will not submit to be impeached by him of rash and unconstitutional legislation, and if he wishes our support he must confine himself to his executive duties—to obey and execute, not make the laws—to suppress by arms armed rebellion, and leave political re-organization to Congress.

If the supporters of the Government fail to insist on this, they become responsible for the usurpations which they fail to rebuke, and are justly liable to the indignation of the people, whose rights and security, committed to their keeping, they sacrifice.

Let them consider the remedy for these usurpations, and, having found it, fearlessly execute it.

OUR PROFOUNDEST PERIL.

[From the Tribune, September 3, 1863.]

* * * * * *

But even dismemberment, through the triumph of the Confederate traitors, is not our chief peril. That involves our country's degradation to an insignificant rank among the nations; but a free people may accept and happily adorn such rank, as the history of Switzerland attests. It would be a great misfortune to be thus struck down; but it would not be absolute ruin. That can only overtake us through a loss of the spirit of liberty. Rome, with Hannibal thundering at her gates, was in imminentt peril. With Nero domineering over her cringing Senate and corrupted populace, though her external grandeur was unequalled, her armies everywhere triumphant, she was utterly undone.

In times of public peril like the present, it seems necessary to wink at official acts of arbitrary power, which would not be endured a moment in a state of peace. We do not surrender our liberties, but we hold them in abeyance while the nation's fate trembles in the balance. We are living under a regime, not of law, but of force. "In law the war is silent," is the gist of a very old maxim. Any of us may be snatched up at a moment's notice, immured in prison indefinitely, without other warrant than some functionary's order, and whoever is must make the best of his fate, knowing that it is casual and transitory. In our poor judgment, nine-tenths of the arbitrary arrests thus far, had better not been made, and we would not deprive the government of the power to make them in a crisis like the present. Let it be distinctly understood, however, that each arrest will be made the subject of rigid and dispassionate inquiry after peace, and that, while no one should suffer for his innocent mistakes, in honestly endeavoring to serve and save the country, it will go very hard with any one who is proved to have gratified his own malice, or his love of exercising despotic power, without the warrant of a public necessity.

What we mainly apprehend, however, is not that individuals shall suffer—they always do and must suffer in a convulsion like this—but that the salutary popular instinct, which guards with jealousy every infringement of constitutional safeguard for liberty, may be debauched and broken down. We fear there are too many patriots this day who, if their hearts were laid open, would be willing to reward, with an imperial crown, the military genius who would speedily and utterly crush out the rebellion. In view of this tendency, it is in one sense fortunate that our struggle has as yet developed no Cromwell, Napoleon, nor even an Andrew Jackson. Corrupted as public sentiment has become, by forty years truckling to the slave power, too many might be willing to evince their gratitude to the saviour of our nationality, by making him a present of our liberty. * * * What we are concerned with is not the monstrous perversion of a current history of a great European nation, but the lurking disease in our own system, which is betrayed by the patient reception and ready toleration of such impudent apologies for usurpation by conspiracy and wholesale murder. Be sure that the people, who are prepared to listen with complacency to column after column of such excuses for the overthrow, by military force, of a sister Republic, and the establishment, on its ruins of an ultra Asiatic despotism, are not too secure in the enjoyment of their own liberties.

The Cry is, "Mac, my Darling."

AIR—"Oh, my Nora Creina, dear."

Mac, my darling, proud I am
To hear that you've been nominated;
Last we met at Antietam,
Where you the rebel might abated.
In the seven days' fight I stood Beside you on the hills and meadows,
And while our brave boys poured their blood,
We knew your heart was throbbing with us!
Oh, my captain, dear and true, [you
The coward tongues that would ignore
Are base as false—thank Heaven they are few!
Your soldiers trust you and adore you.

Abe may crack his jolly jokes
O'er bloody fields of stricken battle,
While yet the ebbing life-tide smokes
From men that die like butchered cattle;
He, ere yet the guns grow cold,
To pimps and pets may crack his stories;
Your name is of the grander mould,
And linked with all our brightest glories!
Oh, my general, dear and true,
The lying tongues that would defame you,
Are base as false—thank Heaven they are few!
For as our chosen chief we claim you.

They say—these dogs of churlish heart,
Who never heard a bullet whistle—
You'd let the Union drift apart
Like down-flakes from a shaking thistle;
They say, oh captain—but the words
Stick in our throats—we can't adjust 'em'
But lift to Heaven our dinted swords,
And answer only this: "We trust him!"
Yes, oh friend of rights and laws,
Despite the sneers of fool or craven,
Where hearts beat highest for the cause,
You have your home, your shrine and haven!

With patient toil and pitying breast
You sought your soldiers' blood to treasure,
Nor ever tried the cruel test,
How much we could endure to measure.
They feared you, for they saw our love;
To win success they would not let you;
But while the white stars shine above,
The boys you led will ne'er forget you!
Yes, oh captain! loved and true,
Desert you—we would perish rather;
Thank Heaven the hearts are not a few
That call you brother, friend and father!

The Veteran's Story.

"Crack! crack! went the rifles, and sharper each crack:
We heard a quick gallop—up rode little Mac.
'Twas 'Forward, my lads!' We went in with a dash;
There was cheer upon cheer, then a volleying crash,
A rush, a blind tumult, a shattering peal,
A thundered 'Charge bayonets!' the clash of cold steel,
A sharp, sudden pang, and, still clutching my gun,
As I fainted, I heard a 'Hurrah, boys! they run!'"

So the old veteran spoke, and, forgetting how much
His lame leg would pain him, he flourished his crutch;
The twinge stopped him short, and across his scarred face
There wrinkled a something, half smile, half grimace.

"Had you seen," he went on, "our young general when
He heard rolling round him the shouts of his men.
He shut up his field-glass, and let the reins fall,
And wiped his hot brow, and looked round on us all.

I shall never f rget the proud glance of his eye,
His smile of calm triumph his bearing so high,
But it all faded out as he saw where I lay;
('Twas a bayonet-thrust made me this cripple they say),
And he spoke, his voice choking," (the vet-'ran's did too),
"'My brave lad, I wish I could bear it for you.'
Do you wonder," he cried, and looked down at his limb,
"If I'd twenty to give I would give them for him?"

McClellan the Brave.

AIR—"Columbia the Gem of the Ocean."

What means this exciting commotion?
What means all this rallying of men?
And those shouts like the roar of old ocean—
Hark! we hear them again and again.
'Tis an army of freemen uprising,
Our birthrights from tyrants to save;
An army with banners and torches,
And our leader, McClellan the brave.

CHORUS.

Our leader McClellan the brave,
Our leader McClellan the brave:
An army with banners and torches,
And our leader McClellan the brave.

II.

Shout our war-cry wherever your voices
Can proclaim to the world where we stand,
And tell that a nation rejoices
That her day of redemption's at hand.
Let the friends of the UNION now muster,
The life of that UNION to save;
Not a star shall fade out of the cluster
If We're led by McClellan the brave.

CHORUS.

If we're led by McClellan the brave,
If we're led by McClellan the brave,
Not a star shall fade out of the cluster
If we're led by McClellan the brave.

III.

We have suffered in silence and sorrow,
Till our patience is quite worn away;
And we pray for the light of to-morrow,—
The dawn of our victory's day.
From the East and the West we are coming,
Forever our banner shall wave,
Defiance we bid to our foemen,
As we march with McClellan the brave.

CHORUS.

As we march with McClellan the brave,
As we march with McClellan the brave,
Defiance we bid to our foemen
As we march with McClellan the brave.

IV.

Rise up in your might, oh, ye patriots!
Fling the banner of faith to the air;
And wherever the fray shall be fiercest,
And success the most doubtful—be there!
Be firm in the right and unflinching,
Determined your country to save;
Make the world ring with shouts for the Union,
And hurrah for McClellan the brave

CHORUS.

Hurrah for McClellan the brave,
Hurrah for McClellan the brave,
Make the world rtng with shouts for the Union,
And hurrah for McClellan the brave.

Voice of the Army.

AIR—"Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled."

NO WORD AGAINST LINCOLN, BUT ALL ITS SOUL FOR "LITTLE MAC."

Comrades of the tented field,
Who the flag would never yield,
Making of your hearts a shield
Where the pennon flew;—
Men who have, with steady breath,
Rushed on lines of blazing death,
Thus a wounded brother saith:—
"To yourselves be true!"

Faithful to the Nation's Chief,
Work he bliss or work he grief,
Till the hour of just relief
When our votes we fling;
If he err, not ours to heed;
If he err, 'tis ours to bleed;
This the soldier's simple creed,
And to this we cling!

But, at length the hour is here
When, with soldier-conscience clear,
We in judgment may appear
On his hateful thrall.
Past respect for his high place
Bids us only veil the face,
Shrinking back from the disgrace,
Sad and silent all!

Turn, oh comrades of the tent,
Of the flag with bullets rent,
Of the field with blood besprent,
Turn to brighter skies!
See, with soldier brow and hand,
Sympathizing, calm, and grand,
Chosen Chief of all the Land,
Our own McClellan rise!

Let no ribald king or clown
Lie away our Chief's renown.
Strike the coward scoffers down,
Teach them what they are!
Bats and owlets dread the dawn,
Cowards, plunderers — all the spawn
Far from our dread work withdrawn —
Strive his way to bar.

Vain their efforts, brother tried,
Sharer of our woe and pride,
"Little Mac," our friend and guide,
Our watchword and our star!
Hail him, drums, with glad alarms,
Hail him with your fiery charms
All the din of battling arms:
YE HIS MUSIC ARE!

The Hour and the Man.

AIR — "The Bonnets of Bonny Dundee."

I.

When the blackness of war overshadowed the land,
The youthful McCLELLAN was called to command.
As he belted his sabre, and sprang on his steed,
'Twas Scott, the brave veteran, who bade him God-speed.

CHORUS.

Come fill up the cup, and come fill up the can,
And cheer! for the hour has come, and the man;
Our gallant young hero we've placed on the track,
And we'll seat in the White House our brave little Mac.

II.

Says Mac to his soldiers — "Strike down the armed foe,
"But to wounded and prisoners all gentleness show;
When the battle is over let violence cease, —
Remember we fight but for UNION and PEACE."

CHORUS.

III.

There were foemen before him and foes in his rear, —
In front of him Richmond; but Washington near, —
For Lee and Old Abe were in rivalry then, — Lee killing, old Abraham stealing his men.

CHORUS.

IV.

How the army was saved — by what miracles wrought,
Ask the soldiers who under McClellan have fought;
How they felt when he lost his command, and again
When he galloped once more at the head of his men.

CHORUS.

V.

South Mountain, Antietam, encircled his name
With a halo as bright as the dawn's ruddy flame;
'Twas then — when his praises rang over the land,
Old Abra'm removed the young chief from command.

CHORUS.

VI.

The people have patiently bided their time,
To brand with their verdict the infamous crime;
In the joker's own coinage the debt we'll pay back —
Walk out Mr. Lincoln — walk in little Mac.

CHORUS.

Come fill up the cup, and come fill up the can,

And cheer! for the hour has come, and the man;
Our gallant young hero we've placed on the track,
And we'll seat in the White House our brave little Mac.

The "World's" Campaign Songs, No. 6.

Soon We'll Have the Union Back.

AIR—"The Hunter of Kentucky."

Good people all both great and small,
I sing a tale of pity;
My hand I fling across the string,
And waken up the ditty;
A ruined land that once was grand,
Is not a joking matter—
Though Abe we know, the more our woe,
The more his jokes he'll chatter!
Oh, McClellan,
Georgie B. McClellan,
Shall we have the Union back?
Tell us "Mac"—McClellan!

All evil sure we could endure,
Thrice all the ills we suffer,
Could we but glance on any chance
Our Union to recover.
There gleams one way, a flash of day,
But one bright bow of promise,
Good Lord, alack! just give us "Mac,"
And take Abe Lincoln from us!
Oh, McClellan,
Georgie B. McClellan.
The one to bring the Union back
Is only "Mac"—McClellan.

Then not a rag of our old Flag Should ever part asunder!
"Fair terms of peace if you will cease—
If not, we'll give you thunder!"
A million swords to back our words
Beneath McClellan gleaming,
And soon, ye know, Jeff D. and Co.
For France they would be steaming!
Oh, McClellan,
Georgie B. McClellan,
Soon we'll have our prisoners back
Under "Mac"—McClellan.

The people all, both great and small,
Except the sons of Shoddy,
Are on the track for "Little Mac"—
They're with him soul and body;
For well they know the nation's woe
Can never be abated
Till in command of all the land
Our Chief we have instated!
Oh, McClellan,
Georgie B. McClellan,
The Union will come leaping back
Under "Mac"—McClellan.

The "World's" Campaign Songs, No. 7.

God Save our Noble Land.

AIR—"America."

God save our noble land,
From Treason's two-edged brand Drawn to devour!
From fierce Rebellion's rage,
Matchless on History's page;
God save our heritage
By his high power.

From equal woe of lust,
That treads into the dust
Our league of State;
That, ruling, breaks the law,
And, fighting, blackens war;
God save us from its maw Insatiate!

O, God! we're wroth to feel
The rasp of Faction's heel
On Freedom's neck!
Nor shudder less to know
How those we trusted so,
To thwart, with right, the foe,
Our fond hopes wreck!

Save, then, our fathers' God!
The land our fathers' trod
With trust in thee.
Thou gavest them a chief,
Oh! send us, too, relief;
And let the reign be brief,
Of Tyranny.

Our fathers' George was Thine;
In him Thy light did shine
On Freedom's flag.
Their sons two Georges trust,
Oh! make them strong and just,
And let them to the dust
All factions drag!

War Democratic View of McClellan's Nomination.

"He will immediately take steps to bring about a cessation of hostilities." — Chicago Platform.

CORPORAL CASEY SOLUS. AIR — "Ould Ireland, you're my Darling."

May I niver taste bite nor sup to-night
But I joy to hear the story,
For the Rebels 'll catch in McClellan their match,
An' we'll soon have "payce" wid glory!
Such "steps" he will take as 'll make 'em awake
To a sinse of their situation,
An' wid thrayson dead on a bloody bed
Of the war we shall have a "cessation!"

CHORUS OF SOLDIERS. AIR: "Yankee Doodle."

That's the kind of talk for us,
That's the peace we covet; —
Treason dead on a bloody bed,
And our starry flag above it!

CORPORAL CASEY AS BEFORE:

Little Mac's the man wid a wholesome plan
For an airly "payce" attainin', —
Wid threble might to purshue the fight
Decisive triumphs gainin'!
We do hate and abhor every form 'o war,
We but fight for con-ciliation,
An' wid thrayson dead on a bloody bed
Of the war we shall have a "cessation!"

CHORUS OF SOLDIERS AS BEFORE:

That's the kind of talk for us,
That's the peace we covet, —
Treason dead on a bloody bed,
And the stars and stripes above it!

CORPORAL CASEY AS BEFORE:

Och! The hour is nigh to see them fly
In wild confusion scatthered,
From their broken lines, an' their murdherin' mins,
An' their earthwork torn an' tatthered!
Wid a fiery brand in wan stout hand,
And an olive branch in the other, —
They will all come back undher "Little Mac,"
An' we'll have an end o' the bother!

CHORUS OF SOLDIERS AS BEFORE:

That comes home to the southern heart,
That's the way to strike it, —
"The brand in hand if you still withstand,
The olive branch if you like it!"

The "World's" Campaign Songs, No. 9.

We subjoin what we believe to be the first campaign song ever written in behalf of the Democratic nominee for President. It was composed early in the August of 1861, immediately after the first Bull Run, and when General McClellan was first called to save our endangered national capital from capture. It is valuable as giving what was then the army feeling, and feeling of the country; and its allusion to McClellan's early and very important victories in West Virginia will be read with interest. The song, we may add, is not original in our columns, having achieved wide popularity in army circles more than three years ago: —

"There's no such Word as Fail, Boys."

BY ONE OF THE RANK AND FILE.

AIR — "The Low-backed Car."

McDowell's day is over —
A true and gallant man,
With a heart as big as a bullock's heart,
But wanting a head to plan;
Now brighter hours are dawning,
And brighter hopes me hail;
For with young McClellan to lead our lines,
There's no such word as fail!
There's no such word as fail, boys;
There's no such word as fail!
For with young McClellan to lead our lines,
There's no such word as fail!

No fault against McDowell,
No blame have we to urge,
He wasn't a red-tape martinet,
That soldiers pest and scourge!
Warm-hearted was McDowell,
His courage proof of mail, —
But he did belong to that luckless class
Who do know how to fail:
Who do know how to fail, boys,
As witness all our men;
But with young McClellan to lead our lines,
We'll try the game again!

Virginia's western counties
Resound McClellan's name, Philippi, Grafton, Romney are
The first-fruits of his fame;
And soon the lurid halo
Of the rebel flag shall pale,
For McClellan belongs to the chosen class
Who don't know how to fail!
Who don't know how to fail boys,
Who won't know how to fail,
Who couldn't be taught at whatever price,
The will or the way to fail.

So burnish up your weapons, boys,
And keep your powder dry,
Bull Run will have done us a deal of good
When next the same we try;
One fair, square chance but give us, boys,
And you'll see the rebels quail;
For our leader is now of the chosen class,
Who don't know how to fail!
Who don't know how to fail, boys,
Who won't know how to fail,
And who cannot be taught at whatever price,
The will or the way to fail!

The New Yankee Doodle.

Brothers East, and brothers West,
Blent in true communion,
Loving peace, but loving best —
And evermore — the UNION!
Little Mac and trusty Pen —
Names we join so handy —
They shall be our banner men,
Yankee doodle dandy!

We have got a work to do,
For this Yankee nation;
And we mean to put it through Spite of all creation!
Little Mac, &c.

We by wit, and toil, and skill,
Must save our starry banner;
And, by George and Pen! we will,
In the neatest manner.
Little Mac, &c.

Columbia bids us free her flag
From a double treason,
Flaunting South, a bastard rag,
North, a mask of reason.
Little Mac, &c.

Far and wide, War's horrid brand
Sways its red dominion;
We must sheathe it, and our hand
Loose the Dove's white pinion
Little Mac, &c.

We must bring our brothers back
Erring but repenting,
Opening to them Honor's track,
And from Hate relenting.
Little Mac, &c.

In our hands averted swords,
No less keen for sheathing,
And upon our lips kind words,
Peace and Union breathing.
Little Mac, &c.

We have had enough of wool,
Quite too much of shoddy;
We must break up Lincoln's school
With — "Exit Everybody!"
Little Mac, &c.

Little Mac will take the chair,
And prove the better teacher;
Doing justice everywhere —
As bids the Sacred Preacher.
Little Mac, &c.

Swords to ploughshares shall be turned,
And bullets into ballots;
And, evermore, the counsel spurned,
Both North and South — of Zealots!
Little Mac, &c.

O brothers, let us falter not
Nor of a doubt be tellin';
All other watchwords be forgot —
In "Union and McClellan!"
Little Mac, &c.

Our foes in Lincoln green are clad,
But we in Truth's blue armor;
They with the lust of Power are mad,
But Right's our only charmer.
Little Mac, &c.

Yet a month, and little mere,
All their hordes shall perish;
While we cheer, from shore to shore,
The Georges both we cherish.
Little Mac and trusty Pen,
Names we join so handy;
They shall be our banner men —
Yankee doodle dandy!

The "World's" Campaign Songs, No. 11.

Union and Peace.

Air — "America."

My Country! from thy woes,
From all thy gathering foes,
There comes release!
Yon banner wide is flung;
Behold its folds among,
Words breathed by every tongue —
Union and Peace.

The Jester jests in state,
The Zealot gluts his hate,
And spoils the land.
They hear the orphan's cry,
The parent's saddening sigh,
The widow's wail float by,
Yet mocking stand.

What care they that distress, —
That woe and want oppress
A people free?
Free thought they seek to kill;
Prisons with victims fill;
With haughty, lawless will,
Crush Liberty.

Their reckoning day draws nigh:
Aye! Hear the people cry
Trickster away!
Corruption, weakness, guile,
Misrule and malice vile —
A nation's bane long while,
Give place to-day.

Aye! thunder forth the shout!
Aye! fling the banner out
Which tyrants shun,
Our Constitution free;
McClellan, Liberty,
And let the chorus be,
THE UNION WON.

Then bear our banner high;
The Union saved — we cry
Let warring cease!
Our Rally-cry shall be, —
Speech, press, and ballot free;
McClellan, Liberty,
Union, and Peace.

For the Journal of Commerce.

McClellan and Union.

In the day of our peril, the day of our need,
When our banner droops low o'er the blood-reddened plain,
See! the hero McClellan steps forward to lead
Our nation disheartened to glory again.
The UNION his watchword; the Union of old,
To our patriot fathers more precious than gold,
Our own sacred birthright, by counsel or sword,
The Union—it must and it shall be restored!

Too long have fanatics, more zealous than brave,
The fires of dissension and anarchy fanned,
And traitors, loud heralded loyal, but gave Fresh food to the flames that were wasting the land,
They mocked at the blood that so nobly was shed,
And the warnings forgot of our patriot dead;
And when in defiance the Southron uprose,
For conquest they eagerly rushed on their foes.

Yes, false was the war-note they sounded, when first
"To arms for the Union," was heard thro' the land, Already for conquest and vengeance athirst,
Their reign o'er the ruins of Union was planned.
Their pretence to sever the African's chain,
For this they would fling to the winds, as in vain,
The rights that our forefathers perished to save,
And see Anarchy triumph o'er Liberty's grave.

From the fields of the slain, from the desolate land,
With the dark cloud of tyranny hovering nigh,
A leader, a hero, the people demand,
Who will dare for his country to do or to die.
One with wisdom to plan, and with strength to abide
By the counsels which genius and courage have tried,
Who will lead back our country to glory and power —
God bless our McClellan — the man for the hour!

McClellan the patriot, whose record shines pure,
Unstained and unchanged from the first to the last;
Serene in his triumph, or calm to endure
The arrows which envy and calumny cast.
McClellan the warrior! whose deeds and whose fame,
No song and no trumpet have need to proclaim —
Ah! thousands of brave men, in battle's hot breath,
'Neath the glance of his eye would cheer on to the death.

McClellan and Union! let this be our cry,
And the reign of the despot and traitor shall cease;
A nation shall lift up our standard on high,
And rejoice in the dawning of triumph and peace.
McClellan and Union! In God is our trust —
This temple of Liberty cannot be dust:
Our own sacred birthright — by counsel or sword —
The UNION it must and it WILL be restored!

Our Captive Soldiers.

A UNION SOLDIER TO SECRETARY STANTON.

Twenty-five acres of homestead, —
Meadow, orchard, and spring, —
And amid the laden fruit trees
The voices of song-birds ring.
Where the rippling stream glides lightly
By the fields of rustling corn,
And the winter hearth shines ruddy
When the summer days are gone.

I left that dear old homestead,
In the North, to join the fight;
To brighten our country's honor,
Or die to set her right.
To fight 'mid the smoke and rattle
Where the deadly bullets hiss,
To find a death in battle,
But not such a death as this.

Twenty-five acres of mire,
Cut by a filthy trench;
Stumps, and swamps, and brier;
Vermin, offal, and stench.
Through that black ditch is crawling
The drainings of a sink
Rippled with living corruption,
And this we have to drink!

Thirty thousand wretches
People this region infernal; — Fathers, brothers, husbands,
In misery seeming eternal!

Twenty-five acres o f white men!
(Oh, happier those who fell!)
Whenever new-comers enter,
They whisper, "Is this hell?"

Naked, with nothing to shelte
Against the hot sun's ray;
Hungering, wasting, starving;
Dying a hundred a day.

Horrors no tongue can utter;
Horrors of which could boast
No Black Hole of Calcutta,
No pen on the African coast.

Oh! you who have brought us to it,
And left us in our despair,
(No hope of exchange or succor,)
As you sit in your cushioned chair,
Think what will be your portion
In future, — not one of bliss!
To-morrow I'll cross the "dead line,"
And make an end to this.

THE STOCKADE PRISON, ANDERSONVILLE, Ga.

"Traitors, Clear the Track."

BY WALTER ANONYM.

AIR — "Scots wha hae."

[From The Boston Post.]

Democrats! whom Jackson led,
Whigs! with Webster at your head,
Forward, with elastic tread:
'Tis a common cause.
Come, united heart and hand,
To redeem our cherished land,
By the Noble "Union" stand,
And our sacred Laws.

By the cursed "free-soil" fraud,
By those specious lies abroad,
Shout we now, with one accord,
Union! — "Little Mac!"
O'er each valley, lake, and dell,
Where a patriot's soul doth dwell,
Shall the thrilling chorus swell:
"Traitors, clear the track!"

See! the eagle from his crag
Leaps, to greet the Union flag;
Who would falter now, or lag
At his Country's call?
Up! the time is flying fast!
List, McClellan's bugle blast!
Up! restore the glorious past!
Forward, one and all!

By our youthful heroes' graves Strewn where'er the "Old Flag" waves, Ne'er shall Abolition knaves
Rule our land again.
Purge the land of every trace
Of the sordid, hireling race:
Every mark and line efface
Of the loathsome stain.

We shall need no "sobriquet"
To excite our ranks to-day;
Peace and glory lead the way,
No more spur we back.
On our glorious banner, see!
Union! Laws! true Liberty!
Thirty millions of the free!
"Traitors, clear the track!"

Not the Chieftain from the wars,
Red with blood, and rough with scars,
Not the ghastly son of Mars
Do we honor now;
But the patriot, brave and bold,
Unsubdued and uncontrolled,
With the "Old Flag's" tattered fold
Wreathed around his brow.

Dally not! the hour draws near,
'Tis the time for faith, not fear:
Steadily the "Old Ship" steer
Through the stormy rack.
O'er each valley, lake, and dell,
Where a patriot's soul doth dwell,
Let the thrilling chorus swell:
"Traitors, clear the track!"

Rally round McClellan.

A PARODY BY BOZ.

AIR — "Battle Cry of Freedom."

Yes, we'll rally round McClellan, boys, rally once again,
Shouting the battle-cry of Union.
And we'll rally from the hillside, we'll gather from the plain,
Shouting the battle-cry of Union.

CHORUS.

The Union forever, hurrah, boys, hurrah!

Down with Abe Lincoln, up with the star;
While we rally round McClellan, boys, rally
once again,
Shouting the battle-cry of Union.

We are springing to the call of our brothers
dear and brave,
Shouting the battle-cry of Union.
And we'll aid them with our votes our country
now to save,
Shouting the battle-cry of Union.

CHORUS.

The Union forever, hurrah, boys, hurrah!
Down with Abe Lincoln, up with the star;
While we rally round McClellan, boys, rally
once again,
Shouting the battle-cry of Union.

We will welcome to our numbers all loyal men and true,
Shouting the battle-cry of Union.
Who will never with their hands in their brothers' blood imbrue,
Shouting the battle cry of Union.

CHORUS.

The Union forever, hurrah, boys, hurrah!
Down with Abe Lincoln, up with the star;
While we rally round McClellan, boys, rally
once again,
Shouting the battle-cry of Union.

So we're springing to the call from the East and from the West,
Shouting the battle cry of Union.
For McClellan is the man we have loved the best,
Shouting the battle-cry of Union.

CHORUS.

The Union forever, hurrah, boys, hurrah!
Down with Abe Lincoln, up with the star;
While we rally round McClellan, boys; rally
once again,
Shouting the battle-cry of Union.

McClellan, the Pride of the Nation.

DEDICATED TO THE KEYSTONE CLUB, PHILADELPHIA.

AIR — "The Red, White, and Blue."

McClellan, the pride of the Nation!
Our hearts and our voices unite
To hail our country's salvation,
And rejoice in the triumph of right.

The people already have spoken,
Proclaimed him the man of their choice,
The rod of the despot is broken,
And every true heart must rejoice.
Then, hurrah for the man of our choice;
Three cheers for the chief of our choice,
The people already have spoken,
McClellan's the man of our choice.

The gloom which so long has hung o'er us,
Will vanish and soon disappear;
And a radiant future before us,
The heart of the nation will cheer,
As of old, ere foul treason assailed it,
The banner of Union shall wave, —
The hope of the millions who hailed it, —
The flag of the free and the brave.
Hurrah for the free and the brave,
The flag of the free and the brave,
The hope of the millions who hailed it,
The flag of the free and the brave.

With McClellan the Chief of the Nation,
The Union of old he'll restore,
And give us an administration
Of Justice and Honor once more.
The Arch of the Union unbroken, —
Its Keystone as firm as of old;
Yes, the people already have spoken,
The triumph of right is foretold.
Then hurrah for the man of our choice!
Three cheers for the Chief of our choice,
The people already have spoken,
McClellan's the man of our choice.

McClellan Campaign Song.

Hark! hear ye the bugle that rouses the people
To save this great nation from ruin and shame?
Whose loud notes are ringing o'er hill and o'er valley,
Proclaiming our faith in McClellan's proud name.
Then up with our banner! Our gallant young leader
Is our best and our bravest — His deeds are our fame.

No jokes from his lips when the whole land is sodden
With the blood that has burst from the hearts of our braves;
When the face of our country, 'neath the hot breath of battles
Where our heroes have struggled, is blistered to graves.

Then up with our banner! Emblazoned upon it,
"We'll give to the country the man that she craves."

He will carry the flag he has led on to battle, —
Not a star would he tear from its broad field of blue;
The flag that 'mid sorrows, privations, and troubles,
O'er the heads of our Fathers triumphantly flew.
Then up with our banner! Our hero and statesman
Can conquer all storms that fanatics can brew.

We don't label him "honest," experience teaches
That trumpeting trademarks but cover deceit;
No rebuke from his lips of his senseless detractors;
His glorious record all falsehood can meet.
Then up with our banner for General McClellan!
Our hopes and our honors we throw at his feet.

He tells us no stories to suit the occasion,
When gravest of destinies balance the scale;
He acts like a man and he talks like a statesman,
Though we never yet heard of his "splitting a rail."
Then up with our banner for George B. McClellan!
With him as our leader, say, how can we fail?

History of the Rise and Fall of the Irrepressible Conflict.

AIR — "Villikens and his Dinah."

There was an old joker in Springfield did dwell,
He wandered all over his stories to tell;
He joked irrepressibly by night and by day,
Till his smutty jokes drove decent people away.

(Spoken — Chorus for the smutty joker and the Ohio clergymen.)

Ri tu ral, ri tu ral, ri tu ral li da,
Ri tu ral, ri tu ral, ri tu ral li da,
Ri tu ral, ri tu ral, ri tu ral li da,
Ri tu ral, ri tu ral, ri tu ral li da.

Lonely he sat in his rickety chair,
His pockets was empty, his table was bare,
Says he, "I have joked all my fortune away,
I will starve if I don't find some joke that will pay."

(Spoken — Chorus for the joker looking for something to turn up.)

Ri tu ral, &c.

He put on his hat, to the street he did go;
Through the highways and byways he went to and fro;
He hunted and squinted through high and through low,
Till all at last he espied a good jolly negro.

(Spoken — A good strong chorus for the almighty negro.)

Ri tu ral, &c.

This darky was jolly as jolly could be—
A rollicking, frollicking, darky was he;
His ears and his mouth were a musical riddle,
His leg like a drumstick, his foot like a fiddle.

(Spoken — chorus for the jolly nigger.)

Ri tu ral, &c.

He looked him all over from his head to his foot;
Says the joker, "I think this fellow will suit;
I have it — I have it — I see how I may
With Sambo get up a good joke that will pay."

(Spoken — Chorus for the inventor of the irrepressible conflict.)

Ri tu ral, &c.

So he called together the people so dear,
They mustered and rallied from far and from near;
They crowded around him one fine summer day,
To listen and learn what the joker would say.

(Spoken — Chorus for the first Black Republican mass-meeting.

Ri tu ral, &c.

He talked of the wrongs of the negro so loud,
Till he touched the poor tender hearts of the crowd;
He talked till he made the fools all believe,
And the joker and Sambo both laughed in their sleeve.

(Spoken — Chorus for the joker and Sambo, the Siamese twins.)

Ri tu ral, &c.

They sighed and they sobbed as they crowded around,
They cried till their tears ran down to the ground;
Their poor tender hearts were exceedingly sore,
They wondered they never had seen it before.
(Spoken — Solemcholy chorus for the weeping Wide-Awakes.)
Ri tu ral, &c.

When the joker had found what a hit he had made,
He started with Sambo a full stock in trade;
And the madmen and fools shouted loud as he went,
"The joker we'll have for our next President."
(Spoken — Chorus for torch-light processions.)
Ri tu ral, &c.

'Mid the smoke and the fumes of the Wide-Awake torch, —
Like the ravings of madmen in drunken debauch, —
'Mid the groans for the nigger, and the devil to pay,
They elected the joker one unlucky day.
(Spoken — Chorus for the rail-splitter drifted into the apex of great events, — Lincoln to the Canadian Peace Committee.
Ri tu ral, &c.

To the sequel we look with sad'ning eye,
While the plaints of the widow ascend to the sky,
While the tears of the orphan and blood of the slain
Point the finger of Banquo to the joker again.
(Spoken — We'll omit the chorus: there there is no joke in this.)

Now debt and taxation pile high up the while,
Like pyramids reared on the banks of the Nile;
While the toils of our fathers all vanish in smoke,
We begin then to see the point of the joke.
(Spoken — A very long chorus for shoddy and greenbacks.)
Ri tu ral, &c.

And now, my dear hearers, I'll finish my song:
There's an end to the joke, and we'll have it ere long;
When "MAC" and his legions, the people have spoke,
They'll send him to Springfield to finish the joke.
(Spoken — The Chorus will be sixteen good hearty cheers for GEN. MCCLELLAN.)
Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!
(Repeat four times.)

A Song for the Boys.

TUNE — "Yankee Doodle."

Come on, my jolly boys, and sing
Of Mac and of Antietam;
The Union we shall soon restore,
The rebels — we shall beat them.

With "Little Mac" we'll make them crack,
And put them in confusion,
If they refuse to heed the laws
And mind the Constitution.

With "Little Mac" upon the track
And Pendleton beside him,
We'll beat old Abe, the basswood babe,
With Fremont, too, astride him.

Old Uncle Abe is a used up babe,
With all his jokes and toddy;
The Copperheads have seen the threads
That were not in the shoddy.

Come on my jolly boys and sing
Of "Little Mac," the victor,
We'll show old Abe he can't be king,
Nor Fremont be dictator.

The Habeas Corpus we'll restore,
And all the Constitution;
The rebels South and traitors North
Shall meet with retribution.

Hurrah! my brave old army boys,
Make haste to save the nation;
Our Mac will lead without the need
Of a comet proclamation.

Our "Little Mac" is just the man
To restore the nation's glories;
He never will on battle-field
Indulge in smutty stories.

The "loyal" leagues who go for war
For the sake of speculation,
May take the shovel or the hoe,
Or perish by starvation.

"Little Mac" upon the Track.

AIR—"Tippecanoe and Tyler too."

Oh have you heard the glorious tidings
Coming from the West?
The people are rising to a man,
And have put "Little Mac" upon the track
To drive out the radical clan,
And "Old Abe" along with the rest—
For they will drive out the radical clan.

When he took the chair "Abe" promised fair,
Honest to be, and true:
But he managed so badly the ship of state
That we put "Little Mac" upon the track,
And will work for him early and late;
For we must have a pilot new—
And we'll work for Mac early and late.

They told us the war would end at least
In sixty days;
But our burdens increase and will never cease
Till, with "Little Mac" upon the track,
We have one who can conquer a peace,
And our flag in triumph upraise—
For "Little Mac" can conquer a peace.

The thieves will try to make us think Lincoln is the man;
They steal our treasure without stint or measure;
But with "Little Mac" upon the track
There will be an end to their pleasure,
Let them plunder then if they can—
For he will put an end to their pleasure.

A needless war our souls abhor,
But the UNION we'll maintain,
No luck we shall get with the present set;
But with "Little Mac" upon the track
There will be a change, you may bet;
For our rulers are foolish and vain—
And there will be a change, you may bet.

They say five hundred thousand more
The war will close;
They must go at the call like leaves to fall;
But with "Little Mac" upon the track
There will be no more drafting at all;
For he knows how to manage our foes—
And there will be no more drafting at all.

Our gallant soldiers know very well
Who holds them dear—
When in battle tried, who fought by their side;
And now "Little Mac" is upon the track,
With loud huzzas they will cheer;
For "Mac" is the soldier's pride—
And with loud huzzas they will cheer.

Then let us be up and doing our work,
The time is at hand;
Our banner is flying, and we must be trying
For "Little Mac" to keep a clear track,
For our foes will be cheating and lying;
But on truth we will take our stand—
For there will be cheating and lying.

May God grant peace and liberty,
Union forever and aye,
And gladden our sight with a future bright,
With an open track for good "Little Mac;"
For he will do the thing that is right
When "Old Abe" is out of the way—
For he will do the thing that is right.

SPEECH OF GOVERNOR SEYMOUR

AT PHILADELPHIA.

The Governor appeared on the stage at eight o'clock, attended by the Committee of the Keystone Club. The hall was instinct with life and enthusiasm in an instant. The entire audience arose, and three stirring cheers greeted the speaker. The enthusiasm could not be quieted. Cheer followed cheer, shout echoed shout. At length Mr. Vaux conquered a temporary peace, and introduced Governor Seymour.

Mr. Seymour arose amidst the wildest and most uncontrollable enthusiasm. He said, —

GOVERNOR SEYMOUR'S ADDRESS.

Fellow-Citizens: I am suffering great pain from illness, and therefore must crave your indulgence while I attempt to speak to you with regard to the great issues which, at this time, agitate the minds of the American people. I stand before you, to-night, impressed with the magnitude of these issues. I stand before you an earnest man. I may hold mistaken views, but God knows I utter no word which is not prompted by the deep convictions of my judgment. (Cheers.) I do not stand here to-night in the spirit of intolerance, or to excite your passions or your prejudices against that portion of our fellow-citizens who do not agree with us in political sentiment. If I am honored by the presence of one of those who differ with us in regard to our duty at this time, I ask of him that, for the moment, he will lay aside his prejudices and listen to me while I shall attempt to show him, with entire respect, why I believe that it is not in the power of this administration to save the Union, and that to place that administration in power for four years more, would be dangerous to the liberties of the Union. (Loud cheering.) I do not claim superior wisdom. I do not claim for the Democratic party unerring judgment. I do not ask our Republican friends to yield to us in any degree, but simply to listen to the wisdom of our fathers. I ask them to return to the paths they trod when our country was great and prosperous. (Applause.) I look upon public affairs from a peculiar stand-point; one which gives me opportunities of seeing the waste of this terrible war in which we are engaged. The State of New York, since the commencement of this war, has sent about three hundred and fifty thousand men to the field. We have contributed in our due proportion — as the State of Pennsylvania and other States in this confederacy have contributed their just quota to sustain the armies of the government in the contest in which it is engaged. You know that under the peculiar organizations of the State governments, the governors of the respective States have many opportunities of knowing of the progress of the war better than the administration at Washington. It has been my duty to commission the officers of the State of New York. It has been my duty to give commissions to the young men of that State who have gone forth in the bloom and beauty and pride of their manhood, alas, many of them never to return to their peaceful homes, and the embraces of their families. (Applause.) I have seen much of the waste of this terrible war, in sweeping our young men into early graves, or imposing upon our country unwonted taxation that, in various forms, has been imposed upon the country, to enable it to carry on the war to a successful issue. Standing then amid new-made graves — the graves of hundreds and thousands of our strong and vigorous young men — the hope of our country — we should be recreant to our duty, false to liberty, and untrue to the memory of our fathers, if we did not call this administration to judgment, and demand of them an account of the blood and treasure that they have called for, and which has been so freely poured forth at their command. (Applause.)

Under the Constitution of the United States, it is not only our right but our duty to sit in judgment upon the policy of that administration. We are to do this, not in any spirit of passion or prejudice, but as it becomes men entrusted with the great liberties conferred upon us by the Constitution of the land. (Repeated cheers.)

This war has now been carried on for three years. This government has had placed at its disposal about two million five hundred thousand men. There has been no demand made upon the country for money that has not been responded to by all classes of citizens. I appeal to you, my Republican friends, if this is not true. While we have differed from you on questions of policy—while we have thought that this administration was not conducting the war on right principles—I appeal to you in this hour of our country's danger to know whether we, as well as you, have not made a free response to the demands which our government has made upon us? (Applause.) I do not propose to go into any history of the war. I accept the fact that we are at war. I accept the fact that the country is now brought to the extreme verge of peril, and the questions to-night are not the questions of the past. We are not to ask ourselves what brought the war about. The question is how the country, can preserve its existence and perpetuate its liberties? Draw the curtain over the past, and let us in the spirit of true manhood, without reference to past differces, determine what we shall do to save the country. (Tremendous cheering.) We have given to this administration, as I have said, more than two millions of men. You know how promptly their demands have been met. You know that from time to time they have promised us decisive results, and you know how these expectations nave been disappointed (Cheers.) When this war was commenced the government relied npon two forces to produce submission to its authority. One was the force of the armies, and the second was the force of the policy of the government. Why have we continued the war for these four years without causing the South to submit to our arms? Is it because our people have not given to the government all the support it demanded? Has it been because our sons and brothers who have gone forth to the contest have been untrue and recreant in the hour of conflict? I repel the charge, if any man be found base enough to make it. (Great Applause.) I admit that the war has been waged with varying fortune. I admit that we have sustained disaster as well as gained victories, but I contend that never in the history of the world have a people responded to the call of a government as our people have responded to the call of this administration, and never has such heroism been displayed as has been displayed by our armies in the field. (Applause.) The administration has been gratified in every wish; and war is not at an end, nor is peace restored. Has the army failed in its duty? Go to the swamps of Virginia, go to the sea-coast of South Carolina, go to the tropical fields of Louisiana, and you will find everywhere the graves of the American soldier. The soil of Virginia is become to us a sacred soil in a new and a terrible significance. (Cheers.)

At the beginning of the war, the administration said that, if we would give them seventy-five thousand men, they would put down resistance. You gave them seventy-five thousand men, and the resistance was not put down. I do not find fault with the administration for not accomplishing this with an inferior force, but I do insist that, when they assumed charge of the government of the country, they were bound to have known more of the resources of the South; they were bound to have known more of the character of our countrymen. (Great applause.) Do you remember that, three or four years ago, it was unsafe for any man to stand up in this community and attempt to show the resources and strength of the South? These things were overlooked in the spirit of arrogance, and we were told that all this resistance could be crushed out with a little force, and if any one did not believe it he was disloyal to his country, and held treasonable views. (Laughter and applause.) Now, I say that our armies, after they were filled to their proper proportions, did accomplish all that was required of them. They said, close up the Mississippi River, seal up the ports of the South, and the rebellion will die of itself (Laughter), the South is not self-sustaining. The Mississippi River was closed. The ports of the South were sealed, and the rebellion did not die. Then larger armies were needed, and the whole world was astonished at the call for six hundred thousand men. The cry was changed. They now said; open the Mississippi River, give us control of the great highway of the West, and it will bring peace and the submission of the South. Vicksburg was taken (Applause), and the Mississippi was open for the transport of our armies and the munitions of war. Not only was Vicksburg captured, but the army of Pemberton was destroyed. West of the Mississippi River there was not an organized force of any respectable strength opposing the Union troops. Lee's army was defeated at Gettysburg. Following these victories the country gave the government six or seven hundred thousand men to add to the armies in the field; and more, the people, thinking that they could trust this administration, gave them also political power, so that they stood nine months ago not only a government at the head of the greatest armies ever known in history, but a government that, as the elections in the free States showed, was sustained by the people through the whole Union.

I believe that all, notwithstanding political views and political prejudices, will admit that our armies have done their work. We, in common with our Republican friends, have honored the names of Grant and Farragut, Sherman, Sheridan, and all the heroes of the war. We deny that their efforts have been unsuccessful; and the blame of continued war is not with our armies. The blame rests elsewhere. It is the administration which has failed to bring this war to a close. (Repeated and prolonged cheering.) I aver that the failure is only due to the policy of the administration. (Applause.) I aver that our armies have not only overcome the forces of armed resistance, but have done it while at every step they have been hindered by the action of the Government at Washington. The lives of the people of the North have been cut off, and the progress of our armies at the South, obstructed by measures of the administration, which have been most fatal to us in the prosecution of the war. (Loud applause.) I do not merely deal in argumentative speculations. I call your attention to what our armies have done. The army, more than two years ago, gave us possession of Louisiana and the great commercial port of New Orleans. For two years the administration has had its own way there. What has been the result of those two years of government? They have not tranquillized one foot of land. Every man knows that the civil, political, and business condition of that State is worse to-day than it was when the armies of our country handed it over to the control of the administration at Washington. (Loud applause.)

In order to determine how far the administration at Washington has availed itself of our victories, I call you to the condition of our country at the outset of this war and then to its condition to-day. Our armies, at an enormous expenditure of life and of treasure to you and to the people of every northern State, have battled courageously southward. But what has the administration done behind them? We have it from their own lips; it is set forth in their own edicts and their own orders, — the orders which have been issued by the generals in the field with the sanction of the administration, — that rebellious discontent has travelled northward as our armies have fought their way to the South. The State of Missouri remained in this Union of its own will; there was love enough there for the Union to put down resistance to the authority of the General Government at the very outset. How is it to-day, after three years' of rule of the administration at Washington? You are compelled to make contributions in men and in money, to hold in the Union, by force, a State which originally was with us of its own will.

Look at the condition of Kentucky, one of the most glorious States in the Union, which in former times gave us statesmen whose names we love to remember — the names of Clay and of Crittenden, and associated with the memory of Jackson. When armed resistance to the authority of the Government first began, the people of Kentucky resolved to stand by us. They severed the ties of consanguinity; they broke away from the dearest associations of relationship; and you remember with what joy we hailed such men as Wickliffe, Guthrie, and Crittenden, who stood by the flag and Constitution of our land. But since the Government at Washington has taken the control of that State in hand all has changed. The presence of armies there is now required, and those men who were with us at the outset now come here to tell you of the injury and insult to which they have been subjected. My friends, it would bring tears into the eyes of the strongest men in this audience if they could listen to the recitals of men like Wickliffe, Guthrie, and others, when they tell of the insults and wrongs heaped, not upon men alone, but upon women, refined women. I ask, in God's name, in this land of ours, are men so lost to all sense of manhood, that they would tear the gentle sister and the loving wife from their homes, because they still cherish a love for one who may be fighting under the flag of the South? Now, I care not how severely war may be waged against men, but I do protest in the name of all civilization; I do protest by the love we bear to our families; I do protest in the name of the most sacred relationships that, to punish a woman for an exhibition of true womanhood, for clinging with love and tenderness even to the erring, is a mean tyranny unparalleled in history. (Great applause.) I met those men, a few days since, at Chicago. Their forms, their countenances, all about them bore the air of true nobility; and when they stated in the convention the wrongs and outrages to which they had been subjected by an ungrateful administration, — an administration which clung to them like frightened children in the early hours of peril, — it drew tears into every eye; and we felt there could be no hope from an administration that could sink so far below the level of manhood as to heap such insult upon the people of Kentucky. What has the administration done for the Union in its management of that great State?

But go a little farther eastward, to the State of Maryland. It is, perhaps, doubtful what course that State would have taken, if left free to act for itself. But, I ask you, if, for the past three years, the control of the Government, in shaping its policy and its domestic relationships, has been of a character that tended to bring that State back to its allegiance? (Cries of "No, no.") You know it to be true, that men of that State, who clung with patriotic devotion to the flag of their country, are to-day writhing under the injustice of this Government, and cursing it from their very hearts, because they have been thus trampled upon? ("That's so," and applause.) Within three days, a general, who holds military control in that State, ordered the only paper there which had put up the name of George B. McClellan (tremendous and continued cheering) for the presidency, to be suppressed. The people of Maryland were undertaking the discharge of a great and solemn duty when they entered into this presidential canvass. It is their right to criticise the action of this administration. What reason was given (and I invite your particular attention to it) — what reason was given for this action? If the paper had violated the laws, why not bring the proprietors into court? why not make some charge against them? But the order states that the commanding officer fears there will be popular violence. We are actually told that within forty miles of the very capital itself, under the shadow of the vast armies we have given to it, the administration cannot guarantee protection to citizens in the exercise of their chartered rights. When your delegates met at Chicago, for the purpose of placing a presidential ticket in nomination, an order was issued by another general (and it has not been disavowed), that the people of Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana — States that placed Mr. Lincoln in the presidential chair; that gave him overwhelming majorities — should not be permitted to purchase powder, shot, ammunition, or arms of any description. And thus you are told by another order that, as I said, while our armies are battling southward, rebellious discontent is travelling northward, until it has reached the lakes, and in three great States of this Union, this administration has lost confidence in the people — aye, and the people have lost confidence in it. (Great applause.) I will not follow this subject further, but I implore each man, within the sound of my voice, to lay the map of our country before him; then to take the edicts of generals and the legislation of Congress, and see how far, by the showing of the administration and its friends, discontent has spread itself since the commencement of this war. Is it not then a gross wrong to the people of this country, and to the armies of the country, for them to point you to the battle-field, and tell you that there is but one way to restore the integrity of this Government, and that by force, and force alone. They tell you this to divert your attention from the fact that they have not only signally failed to coöperate with the army and to avail themselves of victories, but have undone the work of the soldier, and made it impossible for themselves to restore the Union whether we have victories or not. (Applause.)

I will assume that in the next thirty days the army of Lee is destroyed; that of Hood annihilated, and every form of organized opposition is driven out of the field; and then our Republican friends, who have looked forward hopefully to victories that were to bring us peace and union, will see for the first time the full measure of the impolicy of the acts of the administration. For the first time they will see the dangerous position into which our country has drifted, amid the smoke and carnage of battle. These victories will only establish military governments at the South, to be upheld at the expense of northern lives and treasure. They will bring no real peace if they only introduce a system of wild theories which will waste as war wastes; theories which will bring us to bankruptcy and ruin. The administration cannot give us union or peace after victories. (Applause.) Men of Pennsylvania, I remember that in former years our country, under the policy of conservative men, increased from a people of three millions to a nation of thirty millions; that within the lifetime of one man it advanced from a feeble colonial existence into the full measure of one of the mightiest powers upon the face of the earth. I saw the husbandman cheerfully laboring, sure of the fruits of his toil. The light taxation that fell upon him was nothing; he could count his gain almost clear as he pondered how he would give some new comfort to his family, some new advantage of education or of social condition to his children. I saw cheerful labor in your workshops — the machinery, instinct with life, that seemed to perform the duties almost of animated men. I saw your streams leap forth in the morning from your hills, and glide away at evening into their rest, after turning the mechanism that gave wealth to your State. To-day, the weary laborer turns up the sod with the consciousness that the larger part of his product must go to pay the cost of the blood-shed and carnage; and he labors on with still less courage when he feels that, perhaps, the son that he has looked to as the companion of his labors hereafter, is to be torn from him for the purposes of war. When I enter your home I find that the mothers, the sisters, and the wives go less cheerfully around to their daily duties; and when there is sadness by the fireside there is sadness and gloom throughout all the land. (Great applause.) How can we return again to our former condition — free and prosperous, the admiration and the envy of the world? Men may tell you that victories will do it. Victories alone will not bring back these things. If we had had a wise, just, magnanimous administration, we have already won victories enough to have given us peace, prosperity, and national happiness. (Cheers.) It is only because the public mind has been occupied with the great drama of war; it is only because you have been watching with fearful anxiety your sons and brothers in the field that you have not seen the full measure of the evils which the policy of this administration has brought upon the country. If six months ago we had achieved complete military success, and the smoke of the battle were now wafted away, there would not be found to-day one man in the land to stand up and say that it was wise or well to replace this administration in power. (Loud applause.)

Let us then assume that we have gained victory and inquire if with victories this administration can restore peace to the land. (Applause.) In the first place, you have seen how it has been in those States that have been brought back to the Union: in the border States that never went out of the Union, and in those States which gave to the administration not only military and pecuniary support, but even political support. We have found that, precisely as we have given the administration political power, in the same ratio they have trod down our political rights. ("Good! good!" Applause.) When the administration went beyond the effort to restore the Union and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and said, "We will drive the Southern people to desperation; we will unite them as one man in opposition to our armies; we will shed the blood of our people, and pile upon them onerous taxes in order that we may carry out a vindictive and revengeful policy of confiscation," they did not stop at this. There was no unconstitutional act passed in regard to the South, that was not accompanied by an unconstitutional invasion of the rights of the people of the North. (Cheers.) When they said to the South, "You shall not have the Union as it was,"—when they said, as the attorney-general of my own State said in this city, a few days ago, "We do not want the Union as it was, but the Union as it ought to be," they also suspended the habeas corpus in the North. When they projected confiscation for the South, the courts, laws, and judiciary of the North were trampled under foot; your personal rights were not secure; and, for the first time, our homes were liable to be invaded by the subordinates of the Government. In Great Britain the humblest hut in the kingdom, although it may be open to the winds and rains of heaven, is to the occupant a castle impregnable even to the monarch; while in our country the meanest and most unworthy underling of power is licensed to break within the sacred precincts of our homes. But, look further. As I said, armed opposition is driven from the field in Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, and parts of Louisiana; and yet this portion of our country, already conquered, requires more troops to hold it under military rule than are demanded for our armies to fight the embattled forces of the Confederacy. If you will make the computation for yourselves, from the proportion of troops required to hold these States, you will find that more men will be needed to keep the South in subjection to the arbitrary projects of the administration than are required to drive the armies of rebellion from the field. The peace you are promised is no peace, but is a condition which will perpetuate and make enduring all the worst features of this war. They have passed an act of confiscation. They say to the people of the South, "When we have conquered you, we will take from you your homes and your property, and drive you out without shelter in the world." This cannot be called a war measure, because the property of a people cannot be confiscated until you can lay your hands on it. (Laughter.) It is not a measure to help our armies, for the threat of confiscation renders the resistance to them more determined and desperate.

But it may be said, when we achieve victories, then we intend to be lenient; but if you intend to be lenient after victory, why did you pass these laws to hinder victory. (Applause.) But they have done more. They have said we will mould their institutions; we will place them under a military government. Mr. Sumner would reduce the Southern States to the condition of colonies; but Mr. Lincoln says they shall be admitted back as States when one-tenth of the population shall ask it, and this one-tenth shall govern, control, and represent the State. But if only one-tenth of the people are willing to come back, who is to hold the other nine-tenths in subjugation? (Great laughter and cheering.) At whose expense is it to be done? My friends of Pennsylvania, if you want to govern Georgia—if you want to enable one-tenth of its people to exercise this extraordinary power over the other nine-tenths—you must pay for the privilege you must give up your sons to the work. You must give them up to die of lingering diseases, sickening and sad, far away from their homes, without even the poor privilege which they now have, of knowing that they die upon the battle-field for the flag of their country. Every intelligent officer of our army will tell you that the waste of life is not so great during the most active service as in periods of inaction, when the men are herding together in the camps, when the mind becomes stagnant, and the system becomes peculiarly susceptible to disease; then it is that the work of death goes swiftly on. Are you willing, men of Pennsylvania, to give up your sons to the slow, lingering death of Southern camps—in God's name for what? To inaugurate this monstrous government of one-tenth, in violation of all the principles of American liberty; to allow the administration this precedent, dangerous to yourselves, that it is right to maintain a military subjection at this enormous cost of blood and treasure. If this policy prevails, you are to have a series of drafts upon your population; you are to have increased burdens of taxation thrown upon your labor; you are to have a perpetuation of that maxim which men are not ashamed to put forth,—that monstrous libel upon our institutions,—that in times of war there are no rights which the head of your Government is bound to respect. Read your Declaration of Independence; read your Constitution. When were those great principles of public liberty and private security established? Where was it that you had worked out for you the guarantees that were afterward engraved in the Constitution, that your rights of conscience should not be interfered with; that you should have freedom of speech; that no man should lay his hand upon your person unless he did so by the sacred authority of the law; that your home, though it might be the humblest in the land, yet all blessed as the shrine of domestic love and affection, should be to you a tower of strength, secure and inviolable? How were these great guarantees obtained? They were won by your fathers upon the battle-field. (Loud cheers.) War does not extinguish liberty. We fought our war of the Revolution to win, preserve, and perpetuate liberty. (Loud cheers.) War does not suspend the rights of men; and he who dares to say that Abraham Lincoln, at the head of his enormous armies, may rightfully do what George Washington would not do in the darkest hour of the Revolution, does not know what constitutional liberty is. (Tremendous applause.) The Union cannot be restored under this policy. It is not possible to hold that vast extent of country with its peculiarity of climate and condition in military subjection.

It is claimed by our Republican friends that these are war measures, but that when the victories are gained, the Government will be magnanimous. I hope this may be true; but what has been the teachings of the past? Is it not true, my Republican hearers, that after the news of some signal victory, won at the common cost of all the citizens of the Northern States, you display towards those who differ from you an arrogance that you did not the day before? Has the policy of the Government been made magnanimous, rational, and patriotic by victory? I point you to the legislation of last winter, after the wonderful successes of our armies. If you had visited Washington you would have found thirty thousand men lying in your hospitals. Day after day the dead were borne forth to be deposited in their graves, and your hearts would have sickened at the sight of pain and of death. Then if you had left the hospital with its rude and humble appointments, after having seen the devotion of these suffering men, whose eyes, perchance, amidst their deepest agony or in their dying hours would light up at the sight of their country's flag, after having been impressed with their virtue, their courage, and their patriotism; if you had passed to the Capitol and walked through its gilded halls, adorned with all that art and riches could place there, with every emblem that told of our former greatness and liberty, and listened to the representatives of the people assembled there, you would have heard, with astonished ears, that in this hour of victory they were pouring forth the language of bitterness, vindictiveness, and strife. Has this Government been made magnanimous, just, or generous by victories? ("No, no!" Cheers.) I appeal to you again, my Republican friend, if it is not true that in your daily walks of life you have manifested the same courtesy and consideration toward those who disagreed with you in matters of judgment in the hour of victory, that you did when, in the darkest hour of the republic, you cried, "Let us lay aside all differences of opinion, and rally once more around the flag of our country." (Loud cheering.) Read over the acts of vindictive legislation passed in the last three years, — acts of confiscation, acts of punishment, acts of expatriation, acts sanctioning the violation of your most sacred rights and liberties, — and say whether the history of the past gives you a right to hope for wisdom and magnanimity in the future? These acts must be repealed before the country can be united and tranquillized. The administration must say to the people of the South: "Come back again and enjoy with us constitutional liberty; for if it is denied to you, in the end it will be denied to us. Let us forget the immediate past, and go back to the story of the Revolution. Our flag would not be complete, — the glorious category of the States of this Union would be imperfect — if we were to strike out the homes of Marion or Sumter, the grave of Jackson, and the birthplace of so many men associated with our history." If they tell you they will repeal these acts, they tell you they intend to do what they should have done a year ago. But they cannot and will not repeal these laws.

I would not say one unkind word of the President of these United States, — I would speak of him respectfully as the head of the Government; but neither Mr. Lincoln or his cabinet have now control over national affairs. I believe most sincerely that if it was in the power of Abraham Lincoln and the members of his cabinet to undo the past, they would cheerfully wipe it out. I believe if they were able to resume again their private stations, and felt themselves safe from an injured, outraged, and deceived community, if they felt that the laws they had violated would not be used against them, they would with joy leave the places of power, and give the Government into other hands. Why was Mr. Lincoln nominated at Baltimore, against the judgment of three-fourths of his own party; against the judgment of almost all the Republican members of the Senate? They were opposed to the nomination of any man who had identified himself with illegal arrests, and with violations of constitutional law. I ask you this question, my Republican friends, and I ask it with all respect and sincerity. God knows my heart, — that in this sad moment I cherish no resentments; I wish for nothing but the good of my country, and the salvation of its liberties. (Tremendous outbursts of applause. The chairman proposed three cheers for Governor Seymour, and the audience rose en masse and gave them, with waving of hats and handkerchiefs, and with the wildest enthusiasm.) In their private conversations they freely acknowledged that they preferred some other man than Mr. Lincoln. It was natural, of course, that those who held place under him should desire his nomination. But the great operating cause that produced his nomination was this, that there were men in the army and others surrounding him who did not dare to let him go into private life; who did not dare to be brought back under the jurisdiction of the laws of the land, the judgment of their peers. (Cheers.) The nomination was made because men who had enriched themselves by unworthy means from the treasury of the country feared to be brought to that account to which they will be brought when our Government is restored and our Union reinstated. (Cheers.) Mr. Lincoln and his administration will not repeal the law that denies you any remedy against wrongs done by them to our person or property, because they know that to do this is to bring themselves to judgment. They will not pursue a course that will give us a restored Union, because a restored Union reinstates the authority of law, and there would be an investigation of the frauds and failures that, in an unusual degree, have marked the conduct of affairs during the last three and a half years.

I do not mean to say that the administration is to be condemned because, under circumstances so unusual as those which have existed during this war, bad men have taken advantage of the confusion in affairs to do acts of wrong, but I do complain that when these wrongs are done the Government deliberately passes laws that protect the doer and thus makes wrong-doing its own act. Moreover, in an election like this, when the Government is spending such an enormous amount of money, and the liability to speculation is so great, the administration that will say to contractors, as has been openly said in circulars, "You have had a good contract, out of which you have made money, and we expect you to use a part of that money to assist to replace us in power," renders itself a partner in fraud and corruption. The contractor will say to this Government, "You shall not make a peace that shall put an end to all my profits. You called upon me to give my money, in violation of the laws of the land, to put you in power; you called upon me to do that which every great man has said is subversive of constitutional liberty and good order; and now, when you have gained your share of the triumph, you shall not turn around and cheat me of my share of the spoils." (Laughter and applause.) Has the administration, under these circumstances, the power to stop this plunder, and this drain upon the people of the country? They cannot do it; they have placed themselves in the power of men who can bring them before a grand jury and punish them as criminals for their acts. They cannot retrace their steps. It is impossible for them to restore the Union and bring back the South to her former fraternal relationship without saying that all they have done for the last three years has been wrong. Suppose there is a victory, and you call upon Mr. Lincoln to give us again peace, prosperity, and national happiness, — to do the work of pacification, by assuring the people of the South that if they return they shall have again at least the security of their homes. Mr. Lincoln lifts his manacled hand and says, "I cannot; there is the confiscation law, which I must obey." We beg him that at least he will allow them to live under their own State governments, so that we may be relieved of the taxation necessary to maintain a military government. Again, Mr. Lincoln lifts a manacled hand, and says, "I cannot; there is my proclamation; I stand before the country shackled by proclamations and shackled by acts of Congress; I can do nothing to pacify the South." He is powerless unless he can induce Congress to undo all that it has done; he cannot disregard the wishes of those who have become his masters — for one man makes another his master when he enters into an arrangement with him that will not bear the inspection of the world, or the investigation of the laws of the land. (Loud cheering.) The Democratic party can restore the Union, and I believe it will. (Great applause.) If that is true, then I appeal to my Republican friends if they are not bound to give the Government into our hands.

Will any man say that we engage in this contest for political triumph? What is a political triumph? I stand before you to-night, a candidate in my own State for an honorable office. (Cheers.) What matters it if politics alone were to be considered, whether I am elected or beaten? A few brief years and I shall pass away and slumber in the grave. (Voice: "God bless you.") In a little time, we, with all our passions, our hopes, and our fears, shall be no more. No; the issues in this contest are the destiny of our country, the liberty of our land, the preservation of the Constitution, and the union of the States. We do not battle for constitutional law and for personal rights for ourselves alone. A change of parties may, perhaps, make you, my Republican friends, the objects of wrong under the precedents that you yourselves have established; but we battle for your rights as well as for ours. There is no man living who values the good opinion of others more than I do; but when the Democratic party comes into power, if any man in this land sees fit, in the most public place, to stand up and denounce me as all that is bad and base, I pledge myself here, I will battle for his right to do so, at the cost of my life. (Tremendous and continued cheering.) I wish that all could feel as I do on matters of religion — that they should love the gospel of peace and good-will, that they would speak kindly even of the erring, and that Christian love and charity should abound in all the relations of life; but, if there be those who would convert the temples of God into arenas for fierce, vindictive, partisan demonstration, I will stand in front of their porch and defend to the utmost their right to do so. We battle not for a party, but for all. In ordinary political elections the interests of the party may be a sufficient object, but now there is too much at stake. I therefore aver that when our Republican friends say to you and to me, "You sympathize with the South; you have kindly feelings for the South,"— they only say, "You can make peace with the South better than we." When they charge that we had ancient affiliations and cordial relations with the South, and that we desire the political help of the South, they only give another reason why we should be permitted to avail ourselves of these peculiar advantages to bring back our Union. (Laughter and cheers.) Is it not monstrous that the charge is brought in the self-same breath,—first that we desire a separation of the Union, and next that all our interests and sympathies are in favor of the restoration of the Union? They, on the other hand, have a political motive against restoring the Union. If this is true, they ought to give up the work to us. They ought to say to us, "You have supported us for four long years; you have given us three millions of men and three thousand millions of treasure; you have burdened your States with taxation, and loaded down your municipalities: your homes have been deprived of many comforts; more than all, you have given up your loved ones to die, and sad vacancies are left by the fireside. We have tried our policy for four years; we have failed to restore peace and to bring back the Union, and now, in common fairness, you should be allowed to try the effect of your policy."

We are not parties to their vindictive legislation. Let me tell you of this Confiscation Act. Before you can confiscate property you have got to get it. After wasting men and arms you will find that those who fight for their homes are the men who fight on and fight ever. (Applause.) And when you have got the property it will be in a desolated country, and its value will be destroyed. But in attempting to confiscate the property of the Southern people, the administration have in fact confiscated yours by the increase of taxation which their policy threw upon you. It is dangerous for a government to have more power than it can exercise wisely and well. Our fathers wished to avoid this danger; they did not fear for the rights of the States, for these cannot be trampled out of existence. The armed heel of military power may tread upon them for a day, but in the end they will rise again in their might and integrity. But our fathers said, "If we give this central government power which it cannot exercise judiciously, it will become odious to the people." They were called upon to form a government for a vast extent of country. They said, "If we have a king, he cannot know the peculiar wants of the people in the middle of Pennsylvania or in the middle of New York. He lacks the intimate knowledge of these localities necessary to one who is to legislate upon their affairs."

With an aristocracy the same difficulty would arise. They hit upon the common-sense idea which you all act upon in your daily life. There is no man in the community who is efficient at all trades and professions. There are lawyers, doctors, and clergymen. If you desire a lawyer you go to a person especially learned in that profession. You say he may not be a very honest man, but he understands law thoroughly. (Laughter.) Your family is sick; you do not go again to the lawyer but to the doctor. He may know nothing of law but he is an excellent physician. One man, or one set of men, cannot govern this country. There must be men of skill in all departments, in all localities, to do their separate work. The people of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, or of Oneida County, in New York, from which I come, may not be the best people in the world, but they know a great deal better than anybody else what schools they want, and who they prefer for justice of the peace and for constable. The people of Virginia and Pennsylvania have different interests. The people of Pennsylvania cannot legislate for Virginia, but Virginia can legislate better for herself than any one can for her. And so our fathers said, "We will only allow the Federal Government to do that which it cannot do amiss; to do that which it can do better than any one else. It shall represent our national power and dignity; it shall maintain our foreign affairs and treaties." That is the principle upon which our government is founded; that each section shall legislate on those subjects that particularly concerns it. Now, the administration calls upon you, men of Pennsylvania, to legislate for the people of Georgia, at your own cost of blood and money. We cannot trample upon the rights of the people of another State without trampling upon our own as well.

The attempt to gain power by a large jurisdiction and centralization, will result always in weakness.

A year ago a person came to me to ask my opinion about the draft. I said it was contrary to the genius of our institutions; that it was the habit of the people to come together in school districts, and make their voluntary contributions, and then in towns, and next in counties; and these little contributions at last swelled up the vast quotas of the States, and made the mightiest army that the world had seen, until the Government itself said, we can take no more, and rejected these offerings. I told them if they passed the conscription act it would prove to be a confiscation act against the North. The act was passed. It produced resistance, and the country shrank away from it by coming forward and giving large bounties. It fell heavily upon the homes of the poor. It proved the most expensive and burdensome method that could have been adopted of obtaining troops. And so, my friends of the Loyal League, a hand was laid upon your property in the form of bounties; and while you talk of confiscating the property of the people of the South and prolonged the war for that purpose, and united the opposition in the South, you crush out the life of the North. A selfish, narrow, and vindictive legislation reaches your own homes, for you have departed from the wisdom of our fathers and the principles of the Constitution. We must go back to these. We must teach every man in the land that his person is sacred, and he will love the laws that protect him. We must teach the poorest citizen that his home is sacred against any power of the State, and he will love the government that throws its shelter around his loved ones. We must teach him that the law and Constitution protect the right of conscience. What has brought here the millions of men who, of later years, have crossed the ocean? They have come here to enjoy not only the privileges which Almighty God has given to us, in our vast, extended, fertile plains, in our wide scope of territory, but they knew our Government gave freedom of conscience, freedom of home, and freedom of manhood. If we speak of dangers in the future, we do not allude to the conflict of party, — there is no danger that one party will array itself against another; but when you have destroyed the finances of the country; when you have vitiated its currency; when you have deranged profitable business so that the merchant dares not go on, and the manufacturer thinks it unsafe for him to continue his operations because of the uncertainty of the future; when the comforts of life become so costly as to be beyond the reach of men in ordinary circumstances, then you will discover that there is danger not of a conflict of parties, but that men of all parties, suffering and injured, Republican more than Democrat, because more deceived, will turn upon this administration, and endanger the security and peace of the society in which we live. Is it safe, my Republican friends, for you to go on prolonging this war for the sake of vindictive legislation? The war between France and England and Russia was settled when France and England had gained far less advantage than we have gained in this contest.

The men who were drafted this year under the five hundred thousand call have but one year to serve; the three-years' men who were taken into the army in 1862 will go out of the service next year, — their terms begin to expire in the spring; in nine months the army will need the largest additions that have been made to it at any one time. As the administration shrank from calling for more three-years' men just before an election, the places to be vacated by the one-year men must be provided to be filled in nine months; and thus it is reasonable to believe that the largest draft that has yet been made will be ordered at the beginning of the year 1865. I do not speak unadvisedly, for the administration has intimated to me that they expect another draft. The State of New York had furnished an excess of three-years' men, and I asked that, in making up the quota of New York, one three-years' man should be counted as equal to three one-year's men. They said they could not do that, as they needed men immediately; but they provided that a three-years' man should count as one man on this draft, as one man on the next draft, and as one man again on the third draft, and thus the matter would be equalized. So it appears from this that we are to have at least two drafts more. (Voice — "That's refreshing!") Every man knows that we must have this further draft. After war is ended, under the policy of this administration, we shall be compelled to maintain large armies to hold the people of the South in subjection, to carry out the emancipation proclamation and the confiscation act.

I appeal to you to investigate these questions, and ascertain what policy and what party are the most likely to restore union and peace; and when you have decided what the right is, let no man deter you from doing it, whatever may be the consequences. I am full of hope this night. I believe that we are to triumph, and that once again the flag of our Union shall float over all this broad land. (Loud cheering.) The day will come when again, in the counsels of our party, as we call the roll of States, the Gulf of Mexico will send up a response to the voice that shall come from the borders of our great lakes. Georgia shall echo back to Maine, the Atlantic to the Pacific; and hereafter we shall go on governing our country by the voice and will of the free people of the States, rendered wiser by the trials and sufferings through which they have passed. May the God of our fathers — he who gave them wisdom to frame our Constitution and establish our Union, — grant us the wisdom to retrace the steps which we have trod; to renew that union; restore the supremacy of that Constitution; and begin once again our career of national greatness and national glory. (Long and continued cheering.)

PAPERS FROM THE SOCIETY

FOR THE

DIFFUSION OF POLITICAL KNOWLEDGE.

S. F. B. MORSE, Pres. C. MASON, Cor. Sec., 13 Park Row

Freedom of the Press wantonly violated,

LETTER OF MR. MARBLE TO PRESIDENT LINCOLN,

Reappearance of the Journal of Commerce,

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS ON THIS OUTRAGE.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY, ABRAHAM, LINCOLN,

President of the United States.

SIR: That the King can do no wrong is the theory of a monarchy. It is the theory of a constitutional republic that its chief magistrate may do wrong. In the former the ministry are responsible for the King's acts. In the latter the President is responsible for the acts of his ministers. Our Constitution admits that the President may err in providing for a judgment upon his doings, by the people, in regular elections. In providing for his impeachment, it admits that he may be guilty of crimes.

In a government of laws, and not of men, the most obscure citizen may, without indecorum, address himself to the Chief Magistrate, when to the Constitution whence you derive your temporary power and he the guaranty of his perpetual rights, he has constantly paid his unquestioning loyalty, and when to the laws, which your duty is to care for a faithful execution of, he has rendered entire obedience.

If the matter of his address be that in his person, property and rights, the Constitution has been disregarded and the laws disobeyed; if its appeal to the principles of justice be no more earnest than the solicitude of its regard for truth, and if the manner of his address be no less temperate than firm, he does not need courtly phrases to propitiate an attentive hearing from a magistrate who loves his country, her institutions, and her laws.

In THE WORLD of last Wednesday morning was published a proclamation, purporting to be signed by your excellency and countersigned by the Secretary of State, appointing a day of fasting and prayer, and calling into military service by volunteering and draft four hundred thousand citizens between the ages of eighteen and forty-five. That proclamation was a forgery, written by a person who, ever since your departure from Springfield for Washington in 1861, has enjoyed private as well as public opportunities for learning to counterfeit the peculiarities of your speech and style, and whose service for years as a city editor of the New-York Times, and upon the New-York Tribune, acquainted him with the entire newspaper machinery of the city, and enabled him to insert his clever forgery into the regular channels by which we receive news, at a time when competent inspection of its genuineness was impossible and suspicion of its authenticity was improbable. The manifold paper, resembling in all respects that upon which we nightly receive from our agents news, and from the government itself orders, announcements, and proclamations, was left with a night clerk about 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, after the departure of every responsible editor, and was at once passed by the night editor into the hands of the printers, put in type, and published. No newspaper in the country but would have been deceived as we were!

Our misfortune was complete. At an early hour, however, before the business of the city had fairly begun, it was discovered that we had been imposed upon, and were being made to appear the instruments of a deception of the public. There was no delay in vindicating our character. Our whole machinery for spreading news was set in motion instantly to announce that we had been deceived by a forgery—that your excellency had issued no proclamation. The sale of papers over our counters was stopped. Our bundles to the Scotia, bound for Europe that day, were stopped. The owners' and purser's files were stopped. News-room bundles and files were stopped, and the agent of the line was informed that the proclamation was a forgery. Our printers and pressmen were brought from their homes and beds to put in type and publish the news of our misfortune. Our bulletin-boards were placarded with the offer of reward for the discovery of the forger; and to the agent of the Associated Press I sent a telegram reciting all the facts, for him to transmit at once to nearly every daily paper in the North, from Maine to California. Thus, before the Scotia sailed, before your Secretary of State had officially branded the forgery, the wings which we had given to Truth had enabled her to outstrip everywhere the Falsehood we had unwittingly set on foot, and in many places the Truth arrived before the forger had come to tell his tale.

For any injury done to ourselves, to the government, or to the public, this publicity was ample antidote. It indeed made injury impossible.

But the insult to your excellency was the greater in proportion to the eminence your station. Early in the afternoon of Wednesday, therefore, I went with Mr. Wm. C. Prime, the chief editor of the Journal of Commerce, which had been deceived precisely as we were, to the headquarters of the Department of the East, and we laid before the commanding general every clue in our possession which could lead to the discovery of the guilty persons. All the facts above recited were telegraphed at once to you, through the Secretary of War, by General Dix. I assert our utter blamelessness. I assert, moreover, that I have never known a mind so prejudiced, in which acquaintance with these facts would not enforce the conviction of our utter blamelessness.

Here was the absence of an intent to do wrong; here was an antidote for an injury unwittingly assisted, more complete and effectual than the injury itself; here was alacrity in search of the wrong-doer, and assistance rendered to your subordinate to discover the author of the insult done to you.

With these facts set fully before you by the General commanding this department, you reiterated an order for my arrest and imprisonment in Fort Lafayette; for the seizure and occupation of The World office by a military guard, and the suppression of its publications. The Journal of Commerce, its editors and publishers, were included in the same order.

I believe, though I cannot state of my own knowledge, that to the commanding general's assertion of our entire blamelessness it was owing that the order for our arrest and incarceration was rescinded. But the order for the suppression of The World was not rescinded. By your command General Dix sent a strong military force to its publication office and editorial rooms, who ejected their occupants, and for two days and three nights held possession there, injuring and abstracting some of their contents, and permitting no one to cross the threshold.

Not until Saturday morning did this occupation cease. Not until to-day has The World been free to speak. But to those who have ears to hear, its absence has been more eloquent than its columns could ever be.

To characterize these proceedings as unprecedented, would be to forget the past history of your administration; and to characterize them as shocking to every mind, would be to disregard that principle of human nature from which it arises that men submitting once and again to lawless encroachments of power, with every intermission of a vigilance which should be continual, lose something of the old, free, keen sense of their true nature and real danger. CHARLES was doubtless advised to, and applauded for, the crimes by which he lost his crown and life. Nor can you do any so outrageous, oppressive, and unjust a thing that it will not be applauded by those whose prosperity and power you have created and may destroy.

To characterize these proceedings as arbitrary, illegal, and unconstitutional, would seem, if such weighty words have not been emptied of all significance, to befit better an hour at which you have not arrived, and a place where not public opinion but the authority of law speaks, after impeachment, trial, conviction, and judgment.

But, sir, the suppression of two daily journals in this metropolis—one the organ of its great commercial public, the other a recognized exponent of the Democratic principles which are shared by half or nearly half your fellow-citizens—did shock the public mind, did amaze every honest and patriotic citizen, did fill with indignation and alarm every pure and loyal breast. There were no indignation meetings, there were no riots, there was no official protest. But do not imagine, sir, that the Governor of this state has forgotten to do his duty; do not imagine that the people of this city or state, or country have ceased to love their liberties, or do not know how to protect their rights. It would be fatal to a tyrant to commit that error here and now. A free people can at need devise means to teach their chief magistrate the same lesson

To you, sir, who have by heart the Constitution which you swore to "preserve, protect, and defend," it may be an impertinence to cite those natural and chartered rights therein enumerated, among which are these That the people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable seizures, and that no warrant even shall issue, except upon probable cause supported by oath, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized; that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law; yet these are the most priceless possessions of freemen, and these you took away from me.

Even a captured and guilty criminal who knew that his crime would be proved, and that the law would assuredly visit upon him condign punishment, might with propriety plead these rights and demand of the chief magistrate to throw over him these shields. Assaulted by the bayonets of a military commander, he might protest and assert his inalienable right to the orderly processes, the proofs, and the punishment of the law. But has the Saxon tongue any terms left for him to use, who, being the victim of crime, has been made also the victim of lawless power?

It is the theory of the law that, after the commission of any crime, all proceedings taken before trial shall be merely preventive; but the proceedings taken against THE WORLD were of the nature of a summary execution of judgment. Would trial by law have been denied, would the law itself have been set aside for the bayonet, would a process as summary as a drum-head court-martial have been resorted to by you, in a peaceful city, far from the boundaries of military occupation, had the presses which consistently applaud your course been, as we were, the victims of this forger? Had the Tribune and Times published the forgery (and the Tribune candidly admits that it might have published it and was prevented only by mere chance) would you, sir, have suppressed the Tribune and Times as you suppressed THE WORLD and Journal of Commerce? You know you would not. If not, why not?

Is there a different law for your opponents and for your supporters?

Can you, whose eyes discern equality under every complexion, be blinded by the hue of partisanship?

THE WORLD had sustained the government in its struggle to preserve our imperiled nationality. It had helped inspire the martial spirit of the people, and encourage them to the sacrifices they have so nobly made. It had advocated those measures of financial policy which could best preserve the tone and vigor of the government in the contest. It had deserved well of the Republic, and of those who love it.

But it also exposed and denounced the corruptions attendant upon your administration. It had opposed a delusive and enervating system of paper money. It had vindicated the fame of a patriot general, whom you had removed from command on the eve of victory. It had deprecated your re-election. Did you not find in these facts the provocations to your wrong and your persistence in wrong? Had you not made up your mind against us before the underling, your partisan, had concocted his plot? When you answer these interrogatories, I will produce the proof of threats made against us by those nearest you, and assuming to exert your prerogative, before this trick of forgery furnished you with the specious pretense of an accusation.

Can it be possible, sir, that for a moment you supposed that journals like ours could afford to be guilty of this forgery? Let the unanimous voice of your own press answer. Such a trick would hardly have succeeded in Sangamon county, Illinois. For a party which is about to go before the people, and ask them to commit to its hands the administration of affairs, which has been more generous and forbearing to your errors than you have been just to its guides, permit me to say, that it was less possible to be true of any one of them than it was of any man, high or low, who suspected them.

And so the end has proved. The confessed and guilty forgers were your own zealous partisans. JOSEPH HOWARD, Jr., who has confessed his crime, was a Republican politician and Loyal Leaguer, of Brooklyn. Consider, sir, at whose feet he was taught his political education, and in whose cause he spent his political breath Mr. HOWARD has been from his very childhood an intimate friend of the Republican clergyman, HENRY WARD BEECHER, and a member of his church. He has listened year in and year out to the droppings of the Plymouth sanctuary. The stump speeches which there follow prayer and precede the benediction he for years reported in the journal which is your devoted organ in this city. For years he was the city editor of that journal, the New-York Times; for a long time he was the Washington correspondent of the chief abolition newspaper of the country, the New-York Tribune; he has been a frequent contributor to the columns of the Independent; he journeyed with you from Springfield to Washington; he represents himself a favored visitor at the White House since your residence there.

By a curious felicity the stylus with which his amanuensis copied on tissue paper the proclamation and signed your name was abstracted from the editorial rooms of the Tribune. The party principles upon which you were pledged to administer the government have been the daily meat and drink of this forger. The stock-brokers who were his confederates will be found to be of the same kidney. They have all denounced as faithfully as you the party by whose defeat you rose to power. They have been the noisy champions of an exclusive loyalty; they have preached in club-houses and at street corners those politics which stigmatize constitutional opposition to the administration as disloyalty to the government. They all advocated a paper-money legal tender; they have all countenanced the paper inflation; they have all been heedless of the misery to poor men which such inflations breed; they have all rejoiced at the speculation thus fostered, and by speculation they had hoped to thrive.

For twenty-four hours something was pardoned to your presumed natural trepidation, since our blamelessness having been alleged to you by those here whom it was your duty to believe, it seemed only prudent to await your recovery.

For the next twenty-four hours, from moment to moment, it was expected that you would hasten to confess and repair your mistake. But the mistake thus prolonged grew to the proportions of a crime; and till the discovery of the forger stripped its mask off and disclosed the inspiring cause of the act, it grew monstrous hourly in men's eyes.

We were patient, that the immeasurable infamy of the act might swell to its full proportions, and stand complete.

By the recall of your arbitrary order, you have not made reparation for the wrong you have done. The injury and the insult yet remain. The violation of the Constitution stands recorded, and unless adequately atoned, becomes a fatal precedent. For the purpose of gratifying an ignoble partisan resentment you have struck down the rights of the press, you have violated personal liberty, subjected property to unjust seizure, ostentatiously placed force above law, setting a dangerous example to those who love force more than they respect law; and thus, and by attempting to crush the organs of free discussion, have striven to make free elections impossible, and break down all the safeguards of representative government.

It is you that in this transaction stand accused before the people. It is you who are conspicuously guilty. It is upon you that history, when recording these events, will affix the crime of a disregard of your duty, oblivion of your oath, and a pitiable subserviency to party prejudice and to personal ambition, when the country demanded in the presidential office elevated character, devotion to duty, and entire self-abnegation.

But you are not to be left to the judgment of history alone. Thank GOD, by the provisions of our Constitution, not yet wholly abrogated, the people are soon to pass upon your claims to re-election, and the right of impeachment yet remains to their representatives. The people and their representatives have the right to speak, when the pen is struck from the hands of a freeman by the bayonet;

when the Bastile, once broken down on the other side of the Atlantic by the reverberation of our Revolution, is reconstructed here.

In stormy times like these, amid dangers with which an unsuppressed rebellion environs us, his would have been a rash hand which had hastily set in motion for another purpose than the suppression of rebellion, the machinery of justice; who had invoked against the disloyalty of rulers the retribution and redresses of the law. The danger of such a conflict of authority is so far passed, that not even a president could now plead national safety as an excuse for refusing to do justice or submit to judgment.

Yet no citizen who regards his duties should ever hesitate, at the last, to oppose lawless deeds with legal remedies. The law may break down. It will then disclose to a watchful people the point of greatest danger. Courts may fail; judges may be intimidated by threats or bribed by the allurements of power, and those who have sworn to execute the laws may shrink from the fulfillment of their oaths. A craven Congress may sit silent, and idly watch the perishing liberties of the people whom they represent, but this cannot deter him, who, in defending his rights, is determined to do his whole duty, and to whom it is still competent to commit the final issue to that Power, omnipotent and inscrutable, which presides in events and sways the destinies of nations and the hearts of men.

MANTON MARBLE.

NEW-YORK, May 23, 1864.

Historical Notes.

[From the Journal of Commerce.]

We request our readers to peruse carefully an article published on the outside of this paper, which was prepared as an editorial for our edition on Thursday morning last, and which some of our contemporaries have already kindly published.

During the day on Wednesday the editors of this paper had been diligently engaged in aiding General Dix in tracing the authorship of the forged proclamation, having, in conjunction with THE WORLD, offered a reward of $100 for his detection, and in company with Mr. Barnes, of THE WORLD, having placed in the hands of the general such facts as have subsequently enabled the authorities to arrest the guilty party. In the evening, at about 9 o'clock, our office was occupied by a military force, and soldiers were dispatched to various parts of the city and Brooklyn, with brief and peremptory orders to arrest the editors and convey them to Fort Lafayette, by steamer, which was waiting to receive them at the Battery.

These orders came from the President, and no discretion was allowed to General Dix. We have the best reason to know that the general himself was earnestly opposed to the proceeding, and exerted himself strenuously to induce a suspension of the arbitrary act. The highest praise is due to General Dix for the course he pursued in the matter, and we feel under the strictest obligations to the correspondence between him and the War Department, of which we shall avail ourselves hereafter, to exhibit, in the clearest and most unquestionable manner, the entire innocence of the editors of this journal of the crime with which they were charged. We pause also to say that the officers of his staff, and the officers who were placed in charge of our office (Captain Hinsdale and Lieutenant Wales) were exceedingly courteous and gentlemanly in the performance of a most unpleasant duty, and we gladly bear testimony to their honorable conduct.

Two of the editors of the Journal were arrested. One of them, Mr. Hallock, was in the office at the time of the arrest. Mr. Prime was absent for a few moments before and was approached, as he entered the office, by a person who, finding one of General Dix's staff, who was stationed at the door executing, entered himself and was by him conveyed to headquarters. He was there received with great courtesy by General Dix, who informed him that the order for his arrest had been suspended, but that the order to take the newspapers received in force, and he could not be permitted to enter the office. Mr. Stone, having been at the residence in Brooklyn that the office was occupied by the military, at once proceeded to New-York to join his associates and ascertain the nature of the difficulty, and learning of their arrest he spent the night in endeavoring to find the clerk having charge of the Journal of Commerce, and to obtain a search warrant, which was issued by him at about one o'clock. Meantime the facts had leaked out, and a large crowd of sympathizing friends had collected around Mr. Stone's house, and followed Mrs. Stone that they were seeking to convey him to Fort Lafayette, and so she was left through the night in the deepest anxiety as to his fate. Mr. Hallock was very kindly allowed to arrange some office matters of importance, and to write a note to his family, who were of course thrown into the greatest distress by his arrest. He was then conveyed in a carriage to the battery, where the commanding officer found him, and he was released. The editor-in-chief was also much concerned and anxiety quickly silenced at the close of the Associated Press dispatches for the night.

From 9 o'clock on Wednesday night till 11 o'clock on Saturday morning no office was permitted to enter or depart, and the people of America had an excellent opportunity of seeing this free State in American estimation.

During this time we made no representation or appearance of any kind to the United States authorities. We continued ourselves with an occasional inquiry at the squares whether any new orders were received, receiving a negative reply until Saturday, when an order was given requiring the editors to appear at the office of the Journal of Commerce "to be sworn."

We have in our previous articles recited the history of the escape of the Journal of Commerce and the arrest of its editors.

Let us pause for a moment to the origin of the fraud which was perpetrated on us.

The forgery was a rare one, and has made his celebrity. Our article for Thursday morning pointed to the man.

Mr. Joseph Howard, the guilty individual, was educated in the newspaper business on the New York Times, and is familiarly known as "Howard of the Times." He was a fine young newspaper man, familiar with all the facts necessary to accomplish his purpose. He was a favorite contributor to the Independent, president of the First Republican Association in Brooklyn, long a member of the Rev. Mr. Beecher's church, member of the Republican Committee of Kings county, and employed many times in remote question on the Eagle. He is well known in political circles, the intimate friends of the most eminent of the Republicans, and it was a singular circumstance, which we have thought it our duty to lay before the authorities, that on Tuesday, the day prior to one of our reporters was he had been drinking champagne at the private room with one of the most prominent Republican politicians in the city, who is known to be a heavy stock operator. We do not subscribe the current calumnies. It is a reprehensible commentating of facts, and we shun all such ends.

The investigations of the stock operations, connected with the forgery and subsequent developments, the political reasons, are now over.

We entertain no feeling of animosity toward the young man. He has done us a great, in some respects an irreparable injury. We endeavored last by both word and deed. Mr. Beecher and other prominent gentlemen of the Republican party have written on General Dix, each accord expressions in his favor, stating that he was misled or prematurely moved, or something of the kind, so that he be not hanged. And that was quite right. We should be glad, and that was quite right. We should be glad, and that was quite right. We should be glad, and raused to us and our contemporary, should all be credited to the account of the guilty young man, it might be made to appear that the punishmeot was already nearly adequate. But we have nothing to do with the punishment of the guilty, leaving him to his political friends who have influence at Washington. Our present concern relates only to the treatment of the innocent.

We were caught, as were others—not the New-York WORLD alone, but other papers, who by pure accident, and nothing else, were enabled to discover the fraud in time to suppress immense editions already printed, destroy stereotype pages containing the forgery, and save their reputations. We suffered.

They would not have been punished as we were, had they published it. No one dreams that if the radical newspapers had been caught, the administration would have pursued the course they took. It was one of the accidents of the morning, that while only a few hundred copies of the Herald were sent out containing it, two conservative papers issued it in a large part of their editions. Then arose the storm of political hatred and partisan animosity, and the men at Washington went mad.

To the disgrace of American history, an order was instantly issued for our suspension and incarceration in Fort Lafayette. The fullest particulars of the fraud, as full as the public have to-day, excepting only the name of the forger, were laid before the administration by telegraph. To the disgrace of Republican institutions, the order was reiterated in the face of those facts. The telegraph wires groaned with dispatches from loyal leaguers, friends of "Howard of the Times," members of Republican committees and anti-slavery churches, begging the President to suppress the copperhead newspapers in New-York. For three days this disgraceful state of things continued, and the sun shone all the while on the land that was cursed with such inhabitants.

The press of New-York city, excepting only the Times, was frank and outspoken in condemning the whole proceeding. Especially should it be noticed that the Tribune, the Post, the Sun, and the Commercial Advertiser, were true to old and noble principles. We regret that the Post subsequently lent its columns to a correspondent whose pen overflowed with folly, falsehoods and malignity.

What had we done to be thus delivered over to ruin?

We call to witness the respectable newspaper press from Atlantic to Pacific, when we say it was impossible by any degree of caution, to prevent such an occurrence. There is not a newspaper editor in America who, had he been in our office, would not applaud the course pursued by our foreman, and free him from all blame. Nor can any living man by any degree of care or ingenuity make himself or his business safe against fraud. Show us the man that dare boast of such immunity.

Mark this. We have within three years done more than fifty thousand dollars' worth of gratuitous advertising for this same administration, who have sent us orders innumerable to hunt up officers, to announce drafts, to proclaim this or that, every order coming to us in almost fac simile of this forged dispatch, and with no verification whatever. There is scarcely a night in the year that the War Department does not not send us, on manifold paper, now in this and now in that handwriting, at 1, 2, 3, or 4 o'clock, some such proclamation or order. If we should refuse to publish one of these we should be denounced as copperheads. If we demanded verification or pay we should be hooted at as traitors. Nay, more, we were ourselves arrested, and our paper was suppressed, on a supposed order from Washington, written out by a telegraphic operator, which General Dix took on trust, because he had seen others that resembled it which were true!

We have no defense of ourselves to make. We had done no wrong. We were victims of fraud, and the President, in a moment of evil judgment, resolved to punish our misfortune, and hurled on us the mandate of a strong power, destroying our property, and inflicting not alone a vast pecuniary damage, but a greater personal wrong and injury. We have asked no pardon from him. The clenched hand of man that strikes with passionate blow on the rock is bruised, and cannot for long time recover the self-inflicted injury. The arm of authority when it wields the sword of anger against the spotless steel of innocence wastes the vigor of its sinews and turns the edge of the weapon. The voice of denunciation hundered ever so loudly against the pure dies feebly on the wind, and its tones become forever powerless. It is not we that have been harmed so much as he who has so fiercely struck at us. We are grieved for him. He has withdrawn his grasp and we are again free. And now for the private wrong done us, we find it in our hearts to forgive him. It was, perhaps, an error of petulance or a mistake of poor judgment. Let it pass for awhile, till he and we can think it over in calmer times.

The public wrong which involves such mighty interests—the Constitution, the sacred authority of law, the liberty of the press, the freedom of the citizen from unjust search and seizure of his person or property, the freedom from arrest, except on warrants duly authorized, the right to be confronted by accusers, to trial by jury—this great wrong we have no power to pardon. Two thousand years ago the Romans enacted the law of Publius Portius Lacca, which authorized an appeal to the Roman people. In the time of Paul that had been sadly changed to the appeal to Cæsar, for Cæsar had grasped the power of the people. We possess the law in its original purity, and by that appeal must this whole act be judged.

We thank our friends for their hearty support. We thank many, very many gentlemen of the Republican party for their outspoken expressions of opinion. We leave to their own shame the contemptible catalogue of men who "stopped" their papers, excepting out of that list and honoring those who on Saturday came boldly to us and said, "We stopped because we thought you were wrong, we renew because we know you were wronged."

But what, Americans, what is to be said for our country and her prospects under the guidance of those who can be so erring, so foolish, so weak? Does it shake our faith in the future? Does it open to us any new view of doubt or despair? In no wise. Patience, patience! On the last day that we issued our paper we spoke in earnest tones, beseeching our countrymen to be patient and faithful. Faithful to the old cause, the old Union, the old Constitution. These men that lead us in the mad course of radicalism are but the men of a day. They cannot save our country. They will vanish from our sight ere long. Their deeds will follow them into oblivion or shame; and then, by the peaceful recurrence of our national election, we shall be placed in the position to save the grand old fabric of free institutions.

From the distant battle-fields the thunder of cannon reaches our ears to-night, and we know that our brothers and sons are struggling, not for a new country, but for the old faith that was given by our fathers. Let us be patient and labor, doing our duty here, in whatever of pain and persecution, under all the obloquy and reproach that the men who desire to overthrow our time-honored system may heap on us. Let no personal wrongs or private griefs shake our faith or lessen our zeal for the truth we uphold, for the principles by which our nation is to be saved if saved at all. The majesty of the law must be revered in our hearts even if violated in our persons, and it will yet be triumphant.

It was a sad and somewhat solemn view, for an American, that rush of the busy world along the street, by the guarded doorway of a suppressed newspaper. It was not for this, some thought, it was not for this our brave boys were dying on the field. Men recently arrived from foreign lands were unable to explain to themselves the strange sight. Some citizens went along chuckling complacently over the accomplished suppression of a free press; but these were few, very few in New-York; and the vast throng, in the main, passed by wish saddened countenances.

The dim sight of old men was dimmer with the mist of tears when this sorrowful exhibition of bayonets was made in our great commercial street. The exceeding beauty of our national character was marred; the splendor of our historic freedom was tarnished; the glory of our American boast was gone. A man of more than eighty years, born in New-Yotk, whose long and peaceful life had blessed himself and benefited his country, as he passed along the street uttered his sorrowful wish that God had let him die before his old eyes looked on such a scene. Young men, strong and earnest, were not moved to tears, but resolved that henceforth they would recall the old traditions, restore if they might the old laws, and be content, when the land was again as of old—united and free—to say their nunc dimittis. Not till then! Oh, not till then! God grant that we may live and work, till this story is remembered as a hideous dream, and from ocean to ocean the breeze that sweeps down from our mountains shall again be the breath of freedom.

The Recent Proceedings Against the Press.

[From the Albany Atlas and Argus, May 23.]

In common with tens of thousands of our fellow-citizens, we have restrained the expression of our indignation at the recent arbitrary course of the government in regard to the Democratic press of New-York city. We saw in it one of those errors into which the administration, on every occasion, blunders, from its mere want of intelligence and capacity. It was an injury and an outrage; but men do not always resent the injuries they receive from foolish and incapable men. We, like others, bore as patiently as we could with this exhibition of headstrong folly, because we regarded it as the result of passion and ignorance. It has no longer this excuse. The suppression of the two papers has been persisted in after the falsehood of the pretense of the original seizure has been fully exposed. We believe that the occasion was seized upon, and the outrage has been persisted in, for the purpose of intimidating the press. The simultaneous seizure of Governor Medary of the Ohio Crisis, upon some false accusation, and in violation of law, confirms this suspicion. These and other acts of the men at Washington go to show that they have grown reckless and desperate with fear, and that they no longer look to public opinion to sustain them, but to force. We do not mean to make these acts of violence the occasion of invective against our rulers at Washington, or of rhetorical appeals in favor of the liberty of the press or the rights of person and property. The day for that has gone by. It behooves citizens of the state to consult, in a time like this, in regard to what action shall be taken—not what words shall be uttered—to protect their rights.

We see that the Democrats of the New-York delegation in Congress have met for such consultation! They are honorable men, and men of courage, and know their duties and how to fulfill them. But if they will permit us to give advice, we would urge them to abandon their seats in Congress and return home to their constituents. When such acts of violence occur and are persisted in, constituting an invasion of the state and the overthrow of city laws, by military power, the part which a representative of the state plays in the federal Congress ceases to be honorable or useful. There is nothing in the position of a member of Congress at this time upon which the people look with much favor. The struggle of Democratic members to restore to the chambers their representative character, and to make the legislative body the organ of the people, under the Constitution, has been in vain. Equally fruitless has been the effort to expose the corruption or to correct abuses, or to restrain or punish usurpations. The struggle may be pursued till it ceases to be heroic, and may become disgraceful. Let the Democratic members leave their seats in a body and come home! Mr. Brooks and his colleagues of the New York delegation, Mr. Cox and the delegates from Ohio, can find among their constituents, a wider and nobler field of usefulness than they now fill. Their silence—their absence, will speak full as eloquently and impressively as any words they can utter.

What remains to be done, in the execution of the laws to repress such injuries, will be done by the civil power of the state, and by the executive as its head. Our system of laws do not provide preventive measures for outrages like these. But it suffices to enforce responsibility upon the authors. Since these words were written, we learn that the order of suppression has been revoked, the military have given up possession of the inhabited journals, and the unhappy and innocent telegraph operators have been released from Fort Lafayette. The universal expression of indignation from the press and the public has told even on the callous apprehension of the President and his cabinet.

The insult and the wrong remain. The wanton infamy on person and property is unatoned. The outrage, if allowed to pass by with impunity, becomes a precedent for future wrongs. It is intended by Messrs. Lincoln, Seward and Co., as an entering wedge of usurpation, and if they find the public mood will bear it, they will repeat the blow.

We let our words stand! We retract none of them. We believe that the advice we have given to our members of Congress will be urged upon them by the Democrats and the Democratic journals of all the states. Let them consider it wisely; and let the people, too, reflect upon what they may be called to do, should such outrages be repeated.

Suppression of Newspapers—Review of The Course of the Administration.

[From the Evening Post, Republican.]

there be any right which the founders of our government sought to guard from violation with a special care, it is the right freely to discuss political questions and public measures by means of the press. Accordingly, the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, and in another article declares that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, from unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated." The freedom of the press is asserted in the same article of our Constitution as the freedom of religious belief, and guarded from infringement by the same explicit terms. It is therefore with pain that we see the offices of any of our journals entered by the agents of the government, and their publication stopped, at the command of the Executive. We do not mean to say that there is no case in which the military power might not interfere to prevent the publication of a newspaper manifestly instigating treason and rebellion in a part of the country for the possession of which the rebel government is contending with ours, and in which the suppression of the delinquent journal becomes a sort of military necessity. But the necessity ought to be clear, and the power of interference ought to be confined to the cases we have mentioned; in all other instances the punishment of sedition should be left to the ordinary remedies provided by law. The publishers of the offending journals may be arraigned, tried, convinced and sentenced; and in cases where it is pretty certain that they are accomplices of those who are at war with our country, more severe personal measures may be justified. But to march a platoon of armed men into the office of a journal and stop its publication, in a part of the country which has not been placed, and which there is no necessity of placing, under martial law, is a proceeding which has a strange aspect when we compare it with the constitutional provisions by which the rights of the press are so sedulously guarded from violation. We cannot, therefore, but join in the hope expressed by some of the morning papers that the order for the suppression of these journals will be immediately rescinded: and this not so much for the reason that the publishers might have been entirely unaware that the pretended proclamation was a forgery, as for the higher and stronger reason that the order is an extreme measure, suited only to a state of things which does not exist in this community, and for which the plea of necessity cannot be urged. As much severity as you please against those who are guilty of the forgery or who favored it—the public feeling will approve it, but that severity should be combined with a manifest desire to infringe none of those rights of the citizen which a free government ought to cherish with a scrupulous regard.

[From the Tribune, May 21.]

There was a rumor last evening that the order closing the offices of The Journal of Commerce and THE WORLD had been rescinded. We trust it is true, and that those journals are to be no longer subjected to so serious an interference with their business. A government can commit no graver mistake than the infliction of punishment for an act where no guilt of intention can be imputed to the parties concerned, and where they were simply the dupes of some designing knave.

[From the same.]

The real facts which led to the publication of this monstrous forgery were not, we presume, known yesterday in Washington, or the suspension of the two journals would not, we suppose, have been ordered. The order, no doubt, will be revoked to-day. We hope it will, for certainly no journal should be punished for a mistake which might have very innocently been committed by the most loyal paper in the land.

[From the New-York Commercial (Rep.)]

It is evident that the journals in question erred innocently, and that they had no intention to mislead, or to be parties to the fraud committed. The Tribune half admits it would not have questioned the document had it been left at that office, and it was this omission to favor the Tribune that put some other papers on their guard, and so obviated the fatal necessity which led Secretary Stanton to commit the grievous error by which he has again shown his contempt for the freedom of the newspaper press. It is so short a time since Mr. Seward was led to put faith in a forged document, and to make it the basis of diplomatic action, that the Washington authorities should be lenient to those who sin in the same way. The forged rebel navy report has done us immensely more harm than this bogus proclamation possibly could do. Yet the "gentleman in New-York" who avented it, and palmed it off as a jeu d'esprit, has not been troubled, and the Secretary of State, who was particularly "originating" by it, has known no sign of an ignition against his author. A more recent fraud is the correspondence between Lyons and Jeff. Davis, or rather the clerk of the latter on which was made the subject of an elaborate editorial in the Post. The sagacity even of the hybrid official may sometimes retard, and he should demand no more of others than he is willing to assume for himself. It is to be hoped that by this time the facts in regard to the publication of this proclamation are known in Washington, and that wisdom enough will be manifested there to revoke the order against these two journals. It is fully time that arbitrary and unjustifiable procedure be brought to an end. The sentiment found expression when the attempt was made to throttle freedom of debate on the floor of Congress, has not less its force when presses are suspended for acts entirely without design or thought of criminality.

[From the New Nation, Radical.]

Some time since, a Mr. Clapp, of Westchester county, was arrested and sent to Fort Lafayette by General Dix upon the suspicion of his being implicated in the frauds committed in connection with volunteer enlistments. As the matter involved military interests, public opinion remained silent, notwithstanding that Mr. Clapp was a citizen and not a military man, and consequently amenable only to civil courts as long as martial law had not been proclaimed. A day or two ago Colonel Arguelles, a Spanish subject, was deemed guilty of having trafficked in slaves in Cuba, and he was not only arrested, but summarily ordered off, though no extradition treaty between this country and Spain exists. An individual requested him to accompany him to attend to some night-cap business; at the door they found a carriage waiting, in which Colonel Arguelles was driven away without being allowed time to execute a letter to his family or friends.

Mr. Seward merely put into practice his doctrine with regard to the respect due to individual liberty, which is comfortable to that of Louis Napoleon. As it was for a crime against liberty that Colonel Arguelles last night was, the affair passed over quietly. On Thursday two newspapers were suppressed, and by whom, whether in selling stock or not, placed in the stead of the editorial pens. This is a more serious matter, and we are astonished that an immediate protest was not at once registered, and an appeal made to secure observance of the inoperable right of property and of the respect due the law. Are we in a state of siege? Have our courts and civil law been abolished and replaced by martial law and courts-martial? Our courts and judges may perhaps be replaced by a board of aides de camp. Is this just? is it legal? is it politic? Has any general whatever the right to cause detriment to property which may belong to a thousand individuals all of them entirely innocent and in fact far removed even without the knowledge of their representative, the chief editor, and to trample upon the fundamental law of all society and the right of property.

An act has been committed which the law holds as a crime or an offense; it is for the law and its judges to take cognizance of it, and not the administration through its generals. We have had a willing slavesaling, and the circulation of false news summarily disposed of, and to-day we have been warned by friends that it will not be allowed us in future to discuss the military worth of General Grant, as the administration have placed him above the laws and above criticism. To-morrow we may be arrested for discussing Lincoln and his re election, and at last Mr. Seward's bell will be supreme and sole law in the country.

(From the Hartford Daily Coursnt (Republican) May 19.]

The manner in which the forgery, purporting to be a proclamation from President Lincoln, was contrived and executed, indicates thorough acquaintance with the arrangements of the Associated Press and with the regulations of newspaper offices. It was written on manifold sheets, such as are always used in sending dispatches to the press, and regularly paged. It was carried to the different offices at a late hour after the editors had left, and just before the papers went to press. Important dispatches often come at such times, and the mode and extent of their publication is left to the judgment of the foreman. Of course, there was no time for investigation. It was necessary to decide at once. Under such circumstances the appearance of the forgery in a number of papers is not to be wondered at. For some reason a copy was not sent to the Tribune. This fact being learned accidentally in one case, and by inquiry in another, prevented two other papers from publishing the document.

[From the Springfield Republican, May 20.]

The New-York WORLD and Journal of Commerce establishments were taken possession of by order of General Dix on Wednesday and the papers were not issued on Thursday morning. Both papers were victims of the proclamation hoax, and the proprietors of the Journal of Commerce believed in its genuineness and refused to withdraw it for several hours after its character had been made known by dispatches from Washington. Both papers subsequently issued bulletins making known the facts, and it is evident that in neither case was there any complicity with the fraud. The proprietors of the two papers made formal protest against the stoppage of their business, and there is no doubt that the government will remove the embargo and allow them to go on.

GREAT SPEECH

HON. ROBERT C. WINTHROP,

At New London, Conn., October 18.

THE PRINCIPLES AND INTERESTS OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY AGAINST THE UNION.

The Election of McClellan the only hope for Union and Peace.

NEW LONDON, Conn., Oct. 18.

Hon. Robert C. Winthrop addressed the citizens of New London, on Tuesday evening, at Lawrence Hall. The meeting could not have been larger without an extension of the walls of the building. The front seats and galleries were occupied by many ladies, and the audience was composed of the eminently solid and respectable people of the community.

Mr. Waller, the President of the McClellan Club, called the meeting to order, and nominated for chairman, Hon. Abiel Converse.

Mr. Winthrop now came upon the platform and was received with the greatest enthusiasm. He was introduced by the chairman, as follows:

Fellow-citizens: We are to-night honored with the presence of a distinguished gentleman, who fondly turns to New London as the birthplace of his father and the home of a long line of illustrious ancestors; a gentleman whose elegant culture and enlightened statesmanship have made him a national—nay, a world-wide reputation; a gentleman who in the better days of the republic was a leading spirit in the national Whig party, but who to-night stands with us shoulder to shoulder in the ranks of the only Constitutional Union party of the country—the party which proposes to place in the Presidential chair George B. McClellan. (Loud cheers.) Fellow-citizens, allow me to present to you the Honorable Robert C. Winthrop.

After the cheering with which he was greeted had subsided, Mr. Winthrop spoke as follows:

MR. WINTHROP'S SPEECH.

Fellow Citizens: I am deeply sensible to the kindness and the compliment of this reception. I thank you for this inspiring welcome to your city. I have come at your request to address you on the great subject which is uppermost in all our minds and in all our hearts. I am here for no purpose of declamation or display. I am here to appeal to no prejudices or passions. No arts of rhetoric can meet the exigences of this hour. If I were ever capable of them, I abandon and discard them all to-night. I am here only from a deep sense of the duty which rests upon each one of us to contribute what we can by word or by deed, for a suffering, bleeding country. Compelled by engagements or by my health, to refuse a hundred other invitations, I could not resist the appeal which was made to me from New London. (Applause.) And if any word of mine may be thought worthy of being listened to or regarded, in Connecticut or elsewhere, there is no place from which it may more fitly go forth than from this old and honored home of my fathers. (Applause.) It is a time, I am aware, my friends, when the best and wisest, and most patriotic men may differ, and do differ, widely from each other. I would cast no reproaches upon my opponents. I do not forget the reproaches which have been cast upon myself in some quarters; but I have no heart for bandying personalities at a period like this. I pass by all such matters as unworthy of a moment's consideration. Or rather, let me say, they pass by me like the idle wind. The air, indeed, is full of them. Arbitrary and arrogant assumptions of superior patriotism and loyalty—coarse and malicious representations and imputations—opprobrious and insulting names and epithets, often applied by men who might well be conscious that nobody deserves them so much as themselves—the air is full of them. They come swarming up from stump and rostrum, and press and platform.

We meet them at every turn. Let us not retort them. Let us not resent them. Let no one by any means be tempted or provoked by them into acts of vengeance or violence. Let us simply overwhelm them with contempt, and pass on, unawed and unintimidated, to the declaration of our own honest opinions, and to the assertion and exercise of our rights as freemen. (Applause.) Let us imitate the example of our own noble candidate, whose quiet endurance of injustice and calumny h s been one of the most beautiful illustrations of his character, and has won for him a respect which will outlive the ephemeral notoriety of his revilers. Our country calls at this moment for the best thoughts, the bravest counsels, the freest utterances, the most unhesitating devotion of every one of her sons. Let us compare our opinions with each other honestly, independently, fearlessly; and let no man shrink from following his own conscientious convictions, wherever they may lead him. It may be a misfortune, fellow-citizens, that a new election of our national rulers should have come upon us precisely at this moment. We would all gladly keep our eyes steadily fixed upon our country's flag, as it waves and wavers upon yonder battle fields. We would wil ingly follow its gallant supporters, in the conflicts in which they are engaged, with undivided and uninterrupted sympathies. But it is not in our power to postpone the time appointed for our great political struggle. The Constitution of the United States has fixed that time unalterably, and nothing remains for us but to discharge our duties as intelligent and responsible citizens. A great, a tremendous responsibility, certainly, is upon us. When the votes of the people of the United States—your votes, Men of New London, and mine among them shall have once decided the question — by what party and upon what principles and policy the national government shall be administered for the next four years—they will have determined, under God, the destinies of our country for unborn generations. No one in his senses can doubt that the results of the administration of the next four years will be decisive of the fate of this republic. Within that period the Union is to be saved or lost. Within that period the Constitution is to be vindicated or overthrown. Within that period the old flag of our fathers is to be re-advanced in triumph over all the States of which it has ever been, or ever borne, the emblem; or, rent in twain and shorn of half its lustre, it is to droop over a divided land. If the stake of the impending contest, my friends, were anything less than this, if anything less or anything other than the rescue of the Union and the salvation of the republic, were to be the result of this election, we might well hesitate about entering into a political struggle and arraying ourselves against an existing administration in a time of civil war. But with such an issue of national life, or national death, before us, there ought to be, there can be, no hesitation on the part of any patriotic citizen. Every one of us, young and old, is called upon by considerations from which there can be no appeal, by obligations from which there can be no escape, to form a careful, dispassionate, conscientious opinion as to his own individual duty, and then to perform that duty without flinching or faltering. We may be pardoned for an honest mistake. We may be excused for an error of judgment. But we can never be excused, before men or before God, or standing neutral and doing nothing. There is no exemption from this warfare. Not only should it be written on every man's forehead what he thinks of the republic; but no man should give sleep to his eyes or slumber to his eyelids without asking himself: What can I do for my country? How can I exercise that most precious of all privileges, that greatest of all rights, the elective franchise, in a way to rescue her from the dangers by which she is encompassed? (Applause.)

GRATITUDE FOR VICTORIES.

And now, my friends, the first emotion which belongs to these occasions of assembling ourselves together, and the one to which we are all and always most eager to give expression, is that of joy and gladness and gratitude for the signal successes which have been recently vouchsafed to our arms. (Cheers.) Most signal they certainly have been. It cannot be denied that, since the nomination of Gen. McClellan was promulgated at Chicago (loud cheers), the military aspect of our affairs has been greatly improved. The gallant Sherman at Atlanta (cheers), and the daring and dashing Sheridan, in the Shenandoah valley (cheers), have achieved victories of vital importance to the cause of the Union; and most heartily would we unite with our fellow-citizens of all parties in paying a well-earned tribute of respect and admiration to the commanders, and to the soldiers, who have been instrumental in accomplishing these glorious results. (Applause). We are told, indeed, that all these victories are impairing the prospects of our own political success, and diminishing the chances of General McClellan's election to the Presidency. (Laughter.) But we rejoice in them all, notwithstanding, and thank God for them with undivided hearts. ("Yes, yes.") The more of them the better, whatever may be their influence on the election before us. We are content to be so defeated—if that be their legitimate, or even their illegitimate, result—we are more than content. I venture to say, that our noble candidate would rejoice as heartily as President Lincoln himself at every success of our arms, even should the consequences be to leave him without a single electoral vote. He had rather see his country saved, and the Union restored, and the Constitution rescued, than to secure the highest honor for himself which it is in the power of man to bestow. Let us congratulate him, and let us congratulate each other—for we have a right so to do—that his nomination has roused the administration to new efforts. Let us rejoice that the army has been spurred on to redeem the failures of the civil policy of the administration. (Cheers.) The supporters of General McClellan may well be satisfied—even should they accomplish nothing more—with having given an impulse to the prosecution of the war, which not only affords the best promise of military success in the future, but which has already given so glorious an earnest of the fulfillment of that promise.

But why, why, my friends, should success on the battle field diminish the chances of General McClellan's election? What possible reason is there for such a result? Nobody imagines, I presume, that the hero of Antietam would be a less prudent or a less skillful superintendent of our military affairs than Abraham Lincoln or Secretary Stanton. Nobody dreams that he would be likely to interfere disadvantageously with the conduct of the war. The President, certainly, could not have thought so, when he so obviously connived a few weeks ago at offering him a high command, if he would only decline to be a candidate for the Presidency. (Laughter and applause.) The Republican party will hardly be ready to accuse the President of being willing to buy off a dangerous competitor at the expense of putting a doubtful general into the field.

VICTORIES ALONE CANNOT RESTORE PEACE.

No, it is the civil policy of the government which General McClellan is relied upon to change. It is the civil policy of the administration which imperatively demands to be changed. We believe that this civil policy of the administration has prevented all our military successes in the past, and will, if continued, prevent all our military successes in the future from effecting the great end for which we are contending — the only end for which we could constitutionally take up arms. We believe that this civil policy—if anything the administration has recently done can fairly be called civil (laughter)—has been calculated to extin-uish every spark of Union sentiment in the South-n States; that it has been calculated to drive those tates finally out of the Union, instead of being dapted to draw them back to their old allegiance.

"That's so." Cheers.) We believe that this civil olicy has tended to breathe a spirit of defiance and esperation into the breasts of every southern man nd woman and child, that it has rendered the work f our own brave soldiers a thousand fold harder to e achieved, and has thus far given them only a barn and fruitless victory, whenever they have suc-eeded. Who is there wild enough to imagine that mere ilitary triumphs can accomplish that great con-ummation of Union and peace, which is the evout wish and prayer of every patriotic heart?
Applause.) Why, my friends, we may go on con-uering and to conquer month after month, and year fter year; we may overcome armies, we may take ossession of cities, we may strip and devastate hole territories and regions of country, we may ake a solitude and call it peace; but the restoration f the old Union of our fathers, with all the States in eir constitutional relations to the General Govern-ent, and all the stars upon the folds of our couny's flag will require something more than any mere rce of arms can effect. (Applause.) Nobody saw is more clearly, or admitted it more frankly than resident Lincoln himself, when he declared so nphatically in his inaugural address: "Suppose ou go to war, you cannot fight always; and when, ter much loss on both sides and no gain on either, ou cease fighting, the identical questions as to terms intercourse are again upon you." The great ad-come in and settle the questions at issue; d it is thus at the very moment when those ctories are achieved, that we most need men the head of the Government who can turn the iumphs of our armies to the only account r which they are worth a straw. It is this—this plication of a wise, conciliatory, healing policy—hich must follow close upon the track of military iumph in order to render it fruitful,—it is this for hich the present administration, as we think, is holly incapacitated, and for which we believe a new lministration is the great and paramount necessity the hour. It is in this view that victories, stead of impairing the prospects of General Mcellan's election, ought to plead trumpet-tongued in s behalf. The question prompted by every victory ou'd be, "Where, where are the men who can turn this conflict and carnage to account, and render a petition of it needless? Where are the men who n save us from the reproach of having shed all this ecious blood in vain, and can originate and pursue policy which shall make that blood effective for the aling of the nation? Where are the men, where is e man, who can extricate his country from impendg ruin, by first extricating himself from all mere ctional and partisan pledges and entanglements id by planting himself on the simple platform of e Constitution?" (Loud cheers.) These are the estions which each succeeding victory should call on us to put to ourselves, and these are the quesons which, in my judgment, can only be satisfacto-y answered by the resolution to change the admin-ration. If any man would vote for General Mcellan in case our military successes had not occur-d, a hundred fold more should vote for him now. heers.) Without those successes it would have attered little who was President. We could have complished nothing. But with them a way is ened for a new President to restore Union and ace to our land. Shall we not have a new Presint to take advantage of that opening? ("Yes, s.")

A CHANGE OF CIVIL POLICY DEMANDED.

But let us look at the issue before us a little more osely, and more deliberately. You will not expect e, my friends, to go back to the origin of the great struggle in which we are involved. I can tell you nothing about the history of the past which is not abundantly familiar to you. You all know that a wanton and unjustifiable rebellion against our national government was inaugurated in South Carolina nearly four years ago; that it soon expanded to the proportions of the most gigantic civil war the world has ever witnessed, and that it is raging madly and wildly still. You all know the story of its rise and progress. You all know how much treasure and how much blood it has already cost. And you all know what has been accomplished. You have followed our brave soldiers and sailors in all their toils and perils, in all their reverses and in all their triumphs, on the land and on the sea, from that first most impressive scene at Fort Sumter, when the stars and stripes were lifted by the gallant Anderson on the breath of solemn prayer, down to the latest achievements of Sherman, and Farragut, and Sheridan, at Atlanta, and in Mobile Bay, and in the Valley of the Shenandoah. (Cheers.) You have watched, too, the course of our civil rulers at Washington. Their shifting and drifting policy—as it has been strangely developed in resolutions and proclamations, and manifestoes, "To whom it may concern," is familiar to you all. You know what they have promised, and you know what they have performed in the past; and you know what they propose for the future. And now it is for you, and for each one of you to say, whether you are satisfied to recommit the final destinies of this republic to the same hands; whether you are satisfied that the men now in power are in the way of bringing this fearful struggle to a safe and successful termination; whether, in a word, you are ready to take your share of the responsibility of continuing their domination through that presidential term of all others, which is to decide whether there shall ever again be a President over the whole United States of America? (Applause.) For myself, as I have said elsewhere, I have reflected deliberately and deeply on this question, and I have in vain attempted to resist the conclusion, that the best interests of our country, and the best hopes of restoring the Union of our country, demand a change of our national rulers. I have not been able to resist the conclusion, that almost any other party would be more able than the Republican party, and almost any other President would be more likely than Abraham Lincoln, to accomplish that great consummation which every Christian patriot ought to have, and must have, at heart—the earliest practicable restoration of Union, and peace, and constitutional liberty to our afflicted land. I have not been able to resist the conviction that there would be a better chance under any other administration than the present for speedily effecting a termination of the rebellion, upon that basis of "the Union as it was, and the Constitution as it is," which is the only legitimate aim of loyal men. (Cheers.)

CONCERNING THE SWAPPING OF HORSES.

And let me say, in the first place, my friends, that I should have come to this conclusion, as I think, without any regard to the peculiar policy which the Administration has adopted during the last two years. I should have come to this conclusion upon the same plain, common sense views which President Lincoln himself seems to have expressed upon a somewhat similar state of facts. Some of you may remember, perhaps, to have seen an account of an interview which certain very earnest anti-slavery gentlemen, of Massachusetts, held with the President not a great while ago, on the subject of substituting Gen. Fremont for my old and valued friend Edward Stanley, now of California, as the Provisional Governor of North Carolina. The account is given in a letter written by the Rev. Mr. Conway, dated London, July 20, 1864, and published in the Boston Commonwealth. In that letter President Lincoln is represented as saying, in his most characteristic style, "Gentlemen, it is generally the case that a man who begins a work is not the best man to carry it on to a successful termination. (Laughter.) I believe it was so (he proceeded to say) in the case of Moses. Wasn't it? He got the children of Israel out of Egypt, but the Lord selected somebody else to bring them to their journey's end. A poineer (continued President Lincoln) has hard work to do, and generally gets so battered and spattered that people prefer another, even though they may accept the principle. (Continued laughter.) Now, the letter of Mr. Conway gives us the application of these remarks in a manner that could hardly be mended. It quietly suggests that "Mr. Lincoln is averse to seeing the application of whatever truth there is in his theory to the one to whom it particularly applies—himself;" and Mr. Conway most pertinently adds: "Under him the war was begun; he had to deal with the disaffected; is it not possible that he has become so battered and spattered as to make it well for him to give up the leadership to some Joshua?" (Loud laughter and cheering.) It would seem, my friends, that nothing was said at this interview about "the danger of swapping horses in crossing a stream." (Laughter.) On the contrary, the President emphatically appealed to that memorable precedent in Holy Writ when the children of Israel, being themselves about to cross a stream, were compelled to follow a new leader, in order to get safely over. "I believe it was so (said he) in the case of Moses, wasn't it?" We all know it was so. We all know that the children of Israel could never have crossed the Jordan and entered into the promised land, had they refused to accept Joshua as their leader. And some of us are not a little afraid that the same fatality which attended the ancient Moses, is about to find a fresh illustration in the case of our modern Abraham. (Laughter and cheers.)

THE PRESENT ADMINISTRATION A STUMBLING BLOCK IN THE WAY OF THE RESTORATION OF THE UNION.

Why, my friends, no one of us can have forgotten how much there was of mere personal prejudice and personal antipathy at the outset of that outrageous assault upon the national government by the Southern States. No one of us can fail to remember how deeply political and party antagonism entered into the origin of this rebellion. It has been said a thousand times, and everybody admits it to be true, that the first treasonable and fatal step could never have been taken but for the election of Abraham Lincoln as President. It has been said a thousand times, and no man denies it, that the Southern secession leaders —long as they may have contemplated their conspiracy against the Union, and earnestly as they may have desired to accomplish a separation of the States —could never have mustered followers enough to embolden them to attempt it, but for the success of the Republican party. We all know that the secession leaders aided and abetted the election of President Lincoln for that very purpose. (Applause.) He was their favorite candidate then, as I think he is their favorite candidate now. It was the triumph of that great sectional organization—the Republican party—which was originally relied upon for firing the heart of the Southern people. We cannot forget that the war cry of the South, at the time of their orignal revolt, was not so much—"We will not submit to the Constitution." "We will not abide by the Union," as "we will not have these men to rule over us." "We will not come under the dominion of the Black Republicans." Fellow-citizens, I need not say that this conduct on the part of the Southern States was utterly unwarrantable and worthy of all condemnation. The Republican party, to which I shall myself apply no opprobrious epithets, had prevailed fairly at the polls. The Southern States had enjoyed their full proportionate share in the national vote, and they were bound in honor as well as in law, to abide by the result. Nothing but the most direct and palpable violation of their rights would have furnished any shadow of justification for the course which they pursued. Abraham Lincoln was duly elected President of the United States for four yea of the Union, to call upon them to withdraw fro

the high places of the land, and to make way for me

AT A PATRIOT IN LINCOLN'S PLACE WOULD HAVE SAID SIX MONTHS AGO?

ellow citizens, I am not here to indulge in any onal imputations upon President Lincoln ugh I have never been one of his partisan sup-ters, I have never been one of his revilers. And humble judgment, he would have adopted a for a moment in your great struggle to restore Union of our fathers. I do not forget how much personal prejudice and party jealousy were ared against me at the outset. I do not for-how deeply political and sectional antagoms entered into the causes of this ellion. I am not insensible that the policy ch I have recently felt constrained to adopt has reased and aggravated those prejudices and those agonisms. Select a new candidate. Choose a President, against whom, and against whose nds, there will be less of preconceived hostility hate; and may God give him wisdom and cour-friends, what a glorious example of patriotic -denial and magnanimity this would have been !

very far, towards securing unanimity in favor of y way to prevent that division of the Northern timent which is in some quarters so earnestly dered as unfavorable to the success of our arms.

pplause.)

W MR. LINCOLN ABIDES BY HIS "NO-SWAP" POLICY.

But President Lincoln has thought fit to adopt the y reverse of this magnanimous and self-denying icy. He has quite forgotten that one term princito which he and I were committed as mem-s of the old Whig party. We see n clinging eagerly and desperately to pat-age and place. We see him demanding to be nominated—demanding to be re-elected and claim-it almost as a test of patriotism and loyalty that should all with one accord support him for four rs more. We hear his Secretary of State compar-a vote against Abraham Lincoln to giving aid and nfort to the rebels, and even indulging in what is ll called a portentous threat, that if the people ll dare to choose a new President, the government
l be abdicated, and left to fall to pieces of itself, be-een the election and the inauguration. An absurd assumption, that a support of the government must necessarily involve a support of the policy of an existing administration,—this absurd and preposterous assumption, which has been put forward so arrogantly during the last year or two, is now pushed on to the monstrous length of maintaining that, patriotism demands the re-election of an existing President in time of war, even though a majority of the people may have no confidence in the capacity of the incumbent, either for conducting the war or for negotiating a peace. (Cheers.) No changing Presidents in the hour of danger or struggle is the cry. No swapping horses in crossing a stream. Everything else may be changed or swapped. You may change commanders-in-chief in the very face of the enemy; you may remove a gallant leader, as you did General McClellan, (tremendous cheering,) when he had just achieved one glorious victory, and was on his way to the almost certain achievment of another, (continued cheering;) you may swap Secretaries of War, as you did Cameron for Stanton (laughter;) you may swap Secretaries of the Treasury, as you did Chase for Fessenden; you may swap Postmaster-Generals, as you have just done, Blair for Dennison, (continued laughter;) you may change your candidates for the Vice-Presidency, "handy-dandy," and leave Mr. Hannibal Hamlin to shoulder his musket in a Bangor militia company, (laughter.) Thus far you may go, but no further. You must not touch me. (Laughter.) You must not change Presidents. Patriotism requires that Abraham Lincoln should be exempt from all such casualties. And so we are all to be drummed into voting for him under a threat of the pains and penalties of treason. Indeed, my friends, this extraordinary doctrine is getting to be a little contagious about these times; and from some recent manifestations in my own part of the country at least—however it may be here or elsewhere — I should suppose it was fast becoming a cherished dogma among officeholders of all grades, both national and State, that the only true patriotism consisted in keeping them all snugly in place, and that a failure to vote for any or all of them was little better than disloyalty to the government! It is certainly very accommodating in our Presidents and governors, and senators, and representatives, thus to save the people the trouble of an election. (Laughter.) If the war only lasts four years more, we shall, perhaps, be spared the trouble of elections altogether. ("That's true.") My friends, if the people are wise, they will give some of their public servants a lesson on this subject before it is too late, and teach them that the freedom of elections is too precious a privilege to be abandoned at the dictation of those who have already enjoyed a greater length of service, as some of us think, than is altogether consistent with the public welfare and the public safety. The progress of this terrible war is leaving its mark on not a few of our most cherished privileges as freemen. An overshadowing doctrine of necessity has obliterated not a few of the old constitutional limitations and landmarks of authority. An armed prerogative has gradually lifted itself to an appaling height throughout the land. But, thank heaven, it is still in the power of the people to assert their right to a fair and free election of their rulers. (Loud cheers.) And if they shall do so successfully—whatever may be the result—no nobler spectacle will have been witnessed in this land since it first asserted its title to be called a land of liberty. (Cheers.) Let it be seen that the American people can go through a Presidential election freely and fairly, even during the raging storm of civil war, and our institutions will have had a glorious triumph, whatever party, or whatever candidate may suffer a defeat. But, on the other hand, let the approaching election be overawed, or overruled by force or by fraud, and our institutions will have sustained a disastrous defeat, whatever may be the result to parties or to candidates. (Applause.)

THE UNION INIMICAL TO THE INTERESTS OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

And here, fellow-citizens, let me say, that in this eager and desperate determination of the President and his party to prolong their official supremacy at all hazards, and even by the most unblushing exercise of all the patronage and power, and influence of the government, in their own behalf, I find renewed reason for fearing that they cannot safely be trusted for an early restoration of "the Union as it was, under the Constitution as it is." No one can help seeing that it is by no means for their interest, as a party, to accomplish that result. No one can help seeing that such a restoration, under present circumstances, would give the finishing stroke to that political supremacy which they so eagerly seek to perpetuate. They themselves, certainly, are not blind, nor indifferent to the fact that when the South shall return to its allegiance, their own party domination is at an end. Why, we all know how it was, even when the Republican party achieved its first and only great success by the election of President Lincoln. We all remember that even then their sceptre would have proved a powerless and barren sceptre, if there had been no secession and no rebellion. We all remember that if the Senators and Representatives of the Southern States had not withdrawn so rashly and wantonly from their seats, the Republican party would soon have been in a helpless minority in one, if not in both branches of Congress. They could not have carried a measure, they could not have confirmed a nomination without the co-operation or consent of their opponents. And does anybody imagine that if the South were to lay down their arms to-morrow, and come back again into the old family fold, they would send any Senators or Representatives to Washington, whoever they might be, to sustain the measures or the men of the Republican party? No, my friends, that party itself sees plainly that no such thing is within the prospect of belief. That party sees that the restoration of union and peace under the old Constitution of our fathers is thus the end and upshot of their own dynasty. How, then, can we help fearing that they will willingly, if not systematically, postpone a result which is so sure to cut them off from any further enjoyment of power—of that power to which they are clinging with so phrenzied and frantic a grasp? The truth is, that the Republican party have so thriven and fattened on this rebellion, and it has brought them such an overflowing harvest of power-patronage, offices, contracts and spoils, and they have become so enamored of the vast and overshadowing influence which belongs to an existing administration at such an hour, that they are in danger of forgetting that their country is bleeding and dying on their hands. ("That's so." Applause.) And this suggests to me, my friends, an idea to which I cannot refrain from giving a brief expression. You have not forgotten, I am sure, that most memorable period which immediately preceded the inauguration of President Lincoln, when the minds and hearts of so many good men throughout the country were earnestly intent on devising some mode of arresting and averting that terrible struggle in which we were so soon afterward involved. You all remember that Peace Convention, as it was called, which assembled at Washington in February, 1861. You all remember the high and sanguine hopes which greeted its assembly; and you have not forgotten—no patriot can ever forget—how sadly those hopes were disappointed. For one, I have never for a moment doubted that if the incoming President and his friends in Congress had given countenance and encouragement to that convention, and to the measures it proposed, the secession would have ended with South Carolina and the Gulf States, and we should have had Union and peace before six months had expired. The rebebellion would have been nipped in the bud. It would have been crushed in the egg, and the wounds it had occasioned would have healed up, as the surgeons say, by first intention. I could furnish the opinions of some of the best men in our country, living and dead, to the effect. And why, why was that convention so repelled and repudiated by the ultra wing of the Republican party? Why did they stand idly by mocking at every effort to prevent and avert this great and terrible struggle, and rejoicing at what they called the glorious future before them? How can any one doubt that it was because the secession of the South, and the withdrawal of the Southern representation, would secure that party predominance which was essential to the carrying out of their cherished policy, as well as to the distribution of the spoils of victory. I was at Washington myself, during a portion of that period, in company with friends whom I esteem and honor to day, as I esteemed and honored then, though I find myself differing from more than one of them. We went on as the bearers of a petition of fifteen thousand citizens of Boston for the adoption of measures of conciliation and peace. It is not for me to say, even if I knew, what views were brought back by others of that little embassy; but I cannot forget the painful impression which was left upon my own mind, that there were men there, and in high places, too, who, instead of lifting a finger to arrest the dreadful catastrophe which was so obviously impending, were gloating and glorying over the departure of the successive southern delegations as furnishing a clearer field for the more successful prosecution of their own fanatical views, and for the more undisputed establishment of their own party supremacy. And can it be imagined that such men will be ready or willing to co-operate in bringing back the Southern States to their old allegiance to the Union? In bringing them back too, be it remembered, not merely with their old quota of representation, but with a much larger delegation in the House of Representatives than they have ever before enjoyed? For, my friends, if the President's proclamation is to have the full interpretation and sweeping efficacy which some of his friends claim for it, the representation of the Southern States,—after the next apportionment, certainly—is to be not merely on the old three-fifth principle, but on the whole black race, man for man, as well as on the whole white race. It will hardly lie in the mouth of the Republican party, most assuredly, to rufuse to the South a full representation on its whole black population. If the proclamation accomplished anything, it abolished the three-fifth principle of the Constitution—not, indeed, the way in which John Quincy Adams once tried to abolish it many years ago, by striking out all representation of those to whom it related; but by giving a full, complete five-fifths representation on the whole black population of the Southern States. I repeat, then, fellow-citizens, that it is too much the interest of the Republican party, as a party, to defer and postpone the return of the Southern States to the Union, for that party to be safely trusted with the work of restoration. (Applause.) Or, indeed, does any one imagine that those States are to be brought back without any representation? Is any one proposing to bring them back only as so many desolated and subjugated provinces, to be held for generations in a state of subjection and vassalage by enormous standing armies, and at an immeasurable cost of treasure and blood? Are we deliberately bent on having an American Hungary, or an American Poland, or an American Venice, on our continent? Do we desire to see even an American Ireland? Are all our efforts for the abolition of black slavery to end in establishing a quasi-condition of white slavery? (Cheers.) Is that what we are fighting for, under the old Liberty Flag of our fathers? ("No, no.") No, no, my friends, we must have the Old Constitutional Union again, if we have anything—with all the States and with all the rights reserved to the States or to the people, as well as with all the powers secured to the general government. (Applause.) We are not fighting for a mere territorial

Union. We are not fighting for a mere geographical area. We want, indeed, all the valleys and all the mountains and all the rivers, and all the lakes, which were ever included within the rightful limits of our once happy and prosperous land. But we want the men and women and children—white, certainly, not less than black—who have dwelt within those limits. And we want them in the old political organizations, which the Constitution has recognized, under their own State Governments, and with all the rights which belong to those governments. We want the Constitution of Washington, and Franklin, and Hamilton, and Madison, and Jay, without addition and without diminution. We want the glorious Union which that Constitution has secured to us in the past, and which, by the blessing of God overruling the madness of men, we trust, it is still destined to secure to us for the future. And Heaven forbid, that the temporary interests of any party should be suffered to interfere with the earliest practicable accomplishment of this great restoration! Heaven forbid, that this fratricidal war should be prolonged for a day or an hour, or an instant, in order to perpetuate or continue any mere party ascendancy! Heaven forbid, that so horrible a struggle should be suffered to degenerate into a great game of Rouge et Noir—blood and negroes—with nothing better than the spoils of office for its stake! (Cheers.) It is sometimes suggested, my friends, that the Democratic party have been too good friends with the South to be trusted in arranging this difficulty. Why, that is the very reason why they should be trusted. I have often had reason to find fault with the Southern proclivities of some of the Northern Democrats; but if those proclivities can now be turned to the account of saving the Union, they may well be forgiven for more than all the mischief they have ever done in the past. And now, bear with me once more, fellow-citizens, while I urge upon you, finally, that the principles or the policy of the Republican party, as well as their interest as a party, seem to me utterly incompatible with any early restoration of Union and peace. I refer, I need hardly say, to their policy or principles in regard to domestic slavery, as developed in the speeches of some of their leading members, and in the acts and express declarations of the President himself. We all know that the Administration have solemnly adopted the policy of complete emancipation as a necessary result of the rebellion and the war. We all know that after having rallied the country for two years on the plain, direct, constitutional issue of enforcing the laws, and restoring the Union, the President suddenly changed his hand, and, in the teeth of all his own declarations and arguments, put forth a solemn proclamation of universal emancipation. We all know that, at this moment, no man in the rebel States is allowed to return to his allegiance and resume his place as a loyal citizen, without swearing to support this proclamation, as well as to support the Constitution of the United States. And we all remember that recently, on the first authentic or unauthentic overtures of peace and submission, the President issued a formal manifesto—"To Whom it May Concern"—making an abandonment of slavery a condition precedent for even the reception of any such proposals.

THE POLICY OF "NO UNION WITH SLAVEHOLDERS."

Meantime Mr. Secretary Seward, for whom I have nothing but the kindest feelings, and who I honestly believe regrets such extravagances as much as any of us, has expressly admitted in his recent and most extraordinary speech at Auburn, in New York, that there are those of the Republican party, "who want guarantees for swift, and universal, and complete emancipation, or they do not want the nation saved." Ah, my friends, is there not too much reason for apprehending that this class of men is more numerous than even Mr. Seward imagines, and that in the next four years they will have acquired—even if they have not already acquired—a prevailing and paramount influence over the Administration? (Applause.) Mark the words: "Men who want guarantees for swift, and universal, and complete emancipation, or they do not want the nation saved." And this, I suppose, is what these men would call unconditional Unionism! (Laughter.) But it is what you and I, fellow-citizens, should call conditional dis-unionism, and it can hardly fail to be so stigmatized wherever it is openly encountered. Why, what have we heard of late from gentlemen holding the highest official positions under the Republican regime in my own Commonwealth of Massachusetts? What have been the most recent utterances of the most distinguished Republicans in Faneuil Hall? I will not name names, for I have no taste for personality, but I will give the precise language. From one we have the declaration that "the appeal from sire to son should go on forever and forever until the last acre of southern land, baptised by Massachusetts' blood, should be rescued from the infidels to liberty." This, certainly, would seem very like preaching an eternal crusade against southern slavery, without regard either to Union, peace, or the Constitution. From another equally distinguished Republican, we have even more distinct declaration, that "the Baltimore Convention and Abraham Lincoln ask something more than the Union as the condition of peace;" and that "he has announced in his letter 'to all whom it may concern,' that all terms of peace must begin with the abandonment of slavery." While from the same eminent source we are assured, that a vote for Abraham Lincoln is to usher in the glorious day, when the eloquence of Wendell Phillips may be enjoyed at Richmond and Charleston, as it is now enjoyed at New York and Boston." (Laughter.) I may be told, indeed, that all this is only the rant and rhapsody of fanatical rhetoricians; but I cannot so regard it. What said the resolutions adopted at this same meeting? One of them concluded by the unequivocal announcement, that "the war must go on until the pride of the (southern) leaders is humbled, their power broken, and the civil and social structure of the South reorganized on the basis of free labor, free speech, and equal rights for all before the law."

HOW LONG MUST WAR CONTINUE TO ACCOMPLISH COMPLETE EMANCIPATION?

Well, now, my friends, there can be no misunderstanding the import of this language. It is clear, explicit, unequivocal. It does not pretend that the war is to be prosecuted for the restoration of the Union, but for something more than the restoration of the Union; and it expressly defines that something more to be "the total abandonment of slavery," and "reorganization of the social structure of the South on the basis of free labor, free speech, and equal rights for all before the law." These are the ends for which the war is to be prosecuted; and it is not to be permitted to cease until these ends are accomplished. From these declarations we may form, I think, a pretty distinct idea of the prospect before us if the Republican party remains in power, and make some approximate estimate of the chances of an early peace. Why, in what millenial period are all these results to be accomplished? By what process are they to be brought about? How is this total abandonment of slavery to be enforced? Are we to wait till each individual master has filed his separate bill of release? Are we to go on fighting till each individual State has adopted amendments to those constitutions which now prohibit any such proceeding? Or shall we recognize the power of the confederate government, and wait for that to initiate and enforce this reorganization of the social structure of the South? Within what period, I say, this side of the Greek kalends, can all this be accomplished? (Cheers.) Fellow-citizens, there is not a man in the loyal States who would not rejoice with all his heart and soul, if African slavery could be safely and legitimately brought to an end on this whole continent. The Republican party have no monopoly of the philanthropy or of the patriotism of the land, though some of them would seem to claim it. But, for one, I have never had a particle of faith that a sudden, sweeping, forcible emancipation could result in anything but mischief and misery for the black race, as well as the white. The proclamation, however, has been issued long ago, and its efficacy and its authority are to be the subjects of future experience and future adjudication. To those I willingly leave it. It was undoubtedly one of the greatest stretches of the doctrine of necessity—it was unqu stionably one of the most startling exercises of the one man power, which the history of human government, free or despotic, ever witnessed. I have no disposition to question its wisdom or its authority, as a measure adopted for securing greater success to our arms, and an earlier termination of the war—though I cannot help entertaining grave doubts on both points. But the idea that it is now to be made the pretext for prolonging that war, after the original and only legitimate end for which it was undertaken shall have been accomplished; the idea that we are to go on fighting and fighting for "something more" than the Union; the idea that the war is not to be permitted to cease until the whole social structure of the South has been reorganized, is one abhorrent to every instinct of my soul, to every dictate of my judgment, to every principle which I cherish as a statesman or as a Christian. It is a policy, too, in my opinion, utterly unconstitutional; and as much in the spirit of rebellion as almost anything which has been attempted by the Southern States. Why, does any one doubt for an instant, that if the Southern States were to lay down their arms to-morrow, and throw themselves unreservedly on their rights under the Constitution, that it would be the bounden duty of the government to receive their submission, and recognize their rights, subject only to such pains and penalties as might be legally enforced upon individuals duly convicted of treason? I have often hoped that this question might be brought to a practical test. I have often hoped, and still hope, that some one State, like the old State of North Carolina, or the great State of Georgia, might be induced to try the experiment of simply coming back under the old flag, without asking any questions, or seeking to exact in advance any conditions whatever. (Cheers.) What President, what administration, what party shall dare to stand in the way, and tell either of those States that we have ceased to fight for the Union—that we are fighting for something more than the Union, and that she must stay out until she has reorganized her whole social structure? What President, what administration, what party, shall dare to repel and repulse such a returning sister, and tell her that she cannot be readmitted to the old family household until she has prepared herself for relishing the eloquence of Wendell Phillips, justly celebrated as that eloquence may be? Why, my friends, the proclamation of the President, as an instrument for achieving success and securing submission is one thing, but a demand for the total abandonment of slavery, and the reorganization of the whole social structure of the South, as conditions precedent for receiving and accepting submission whenever it shall be tendered, and after it has been secured, is a wholly different thing. The one may, perhaps, be justified on a constructive plea of necessity. But there can be no plea of necessity after the submission is accomplished. If the States in rebellion, one or all, were simply to lay down their arms to-morrow, and throw themselves unconditionally on the old Constitution, and range themselves once more under the old flag, what else could we do, what else should we do, but receive them with open arms to the old Union of our fathers? Pains and penalties might be enforced on individual offenders. The law and the officers of the law would have all that matter to look after. But pains and penalties would soon be almost forgotten in the joy which would pervade the country. The return of the prodigal son would be nothing to it. We should get a nearer and clearer impression than almost ever before of that exquisite idea of the good Book—that there is more joy over one sinner that repenteth, than over ninety and nine just men that need no repentance.

WHAT SHERMAN THINKS ABOUT IT.

Whatever the administration or the President might say, the great majority of the people of the United States, as I believe, would adopt the tone of that noble letter of the hero of Atlanta, when he said to the mayor of that captured city: "We don't want your negroes, or your horses, or your houses, or your land, or anything you have; but we do want, and will have, a just obedience to the laws of the United States." (Cheers.) "I want peace, and believe it can only be reached through Union and war, and I will ever conduct war purely with a view to early and perfect success. But, my dear sir, when that peace does come you may call on me for anything. Then will I share with you the last cracker, and watch with you to shield your homes and families against danger from every quarter. (Tremendous cheering.) Yes, not only would the gallant Sherman "watch with them to shield their homes and families against danger from every quarter," but that whole noble army, which has done such glorious service in the West, would watch with him, and we should witness such a fraternization, and such a jubilee, as would send a thrill of joy to the heart of every real friend of Union and peace and constitutional liberty in our land. (Cheers.) We should not stop to ask whether we had obtained anything more than Union and peace. We should leave the judicial tribunals to ascertain that. We should remit that question to the constables and the court-houses. We should feel that in vindicating the authority of the Constitution and laws, and in restoring the Union of our fathers, we had prepared the way for a glorious future for our country, and had accomplished the great end for which so many noble young men had shed their blood and laid down their lives. And so we should all thank God and be joyful. (Cheers.) Undoubtedly, my friends, it is the hope of us all, that, in some way or other, sooner or later, out of this abhorrent rebellion will have come the ultimate extinction of domestic slavery. Many of us believe that, if the war were to cease to-morrow, and the Southern States were to come back without any condition or terms whatever, slavery would be found to have received a wound from which it could never recover. Mr. Seward himself, in that same extraordinary speech from which I have already quoted, has expressly told us that, practically, slavery is no longer in question. "I told you here, (he says,) a year ago, that, practically, slavery was no longer in question—that it was perishing under the operation of the war." "That assertion," he adds, "has been confirmed. Jefferson Davis tells you in effect the same thing." And Jefferson Davis does indeed tell us very much the same thing, if the report is to be credited of his conversation with certain quasi-peace commissioners who went to Richmond under a pass furnished by General Grant at the request of President Lincoln. Jefferson Davis is stated in that report to have admitted that two millions of slaves—one-half of the whole number in the Southern States—had been practically freed already.

THE UNION THE ONE CONDITION OF PEACE.

But whatever may be our opinions on this point, it will be enough for us all—enough, certainly, for General McClellan and his supporters, if we shall have succeeded in restoring the Union; and I believe the people of the loyal States will agree with him and agree with us, that the war ought not to be prosecuted another day, another hour, another instant, for any purpose under the sun, except the simple restoration of the Union. "The Union—the Union—the one condition of peace. We ask no more." (Cheers.) That is the platform of our candidate, and that is our platform. We are not for propagating philanthropy at the point of the bayonet. We are not for wading through seas of blood in order to reorganize the whole social structure of the South. Christianity forbids us; for it tells us not to do evil even that good may come. The Constitution forbids us; for, the moment the rebellion is suppressed, the war becomes unconstitutional, whatever may be its pretext. The condition of our country, which has already sent forth more than two millions of soldiers into the field, and which is already groaning beneath a debt of three or four thousand millions of dollars; the condition of our beloved country forbids us from sending another soldier, or spending another dollar, after the Union is saved. Fellow-citizens, a solemn oath to support "the Constitution of the United States as it is," is still upon all our rulers, and a solemn obligation to do so still rests upon the whole people. No rebellion elsewhere can justify rebellion on our part. We must pursue constitutional ends, and we must pursue them by constitutional means. Then we shall succeed, and then our success will be substantial and permanent. Oh, what a triumph it would be if the Constitution of our fathers should come out, after all, unscathed from this fiery trial; if it should be seen to have prevailed, by its own innate original force and vigor, over all the machinations and assaults of its enemies! How proudly, then might we hold it up before all mankind, in all time to come, as we have in all time past, as indeed the masterpiece of political and civil wisdom! How confidently could we then challenge all the world to show, us a system of government of equal stability and endurance. (Cheers.) It has already stood the strain of prosperity and of adversity. Foreign wars and domestic dissentions have hitherto assailed it in vain. The rains have descended, and the winds have blown, and the floods have come and beaten upon it, but it has not been shaken. The great final test is now upon it; rebellion, revolution, civil war, in their most formidable and appalling shape. Oh, if we can but carry it through this last trial unharmed! we never again need fear for its security. Let us then hold it up—Constitution, the whole Constitution, and nothing but the Constitution—as at once the end and the instrument of all our efforts. Let us demand a faithful adherence to all its forms and to all its principles. Let us watch jealously for the observance and fulfillment of all its provisions. And let us resolve that if it does fail and fall at last, it shall be by the madness of its enemies, and not by the supineness or willing surrender of its friends. (Applause.)

MR. LINCOLN MAKING FUN OF HIMSELF—A REMINISCENCE.

Fellow-citizens, with such issues before us, I need say but little about candidates. You know already, I am sure, all that you care to know about President Lincoln. Yet, perhaps, I can recall a little passage in his public life which may at least amuse you. His only term of Congressional service was during the period when I had the honor to preside over the House of which he was a member. He helped me to the Speaker's chair by his own vote, and I really wish I could find it in my conscience to return the compliment at this moment. (Laughter.) But I cannot forget a certain speech which he made, in the month of July, 1848, in reference to the nomination for the Presidency of a distinguished Democrat who still lives (I rejoice to remember), to enjoy the esteem and respect of all who knew him.

"By the way, Mr. Speaker, (said he,) did you know that I am a military hero? Yes sir, (continued he,) in the days of the Black Hawk war, I fought, bled, and came away. Speaking of General Cass's career, reminds me of my own. I was not at Stillman's defeat, but I was about as near it as Cass was to Hull's surrender; and like him, I saw the place soon afterward. It is quite certain that I did not break my sword, for I had none to break; but I bent a musket pretty badly on one occasoin. If Cass broke his sword, the idea is, he broke it in desperation; I bent the musket by accident. If General Cass went in advance of me in picking whortleberries, I guess I surpassed him in charges upon the wild onions. (Laughter.) If he saw any live fighting Indians it was more than I did, but I had a good many bloody struggles with the mosquitos; and, although I never fainted from loss of blood, I can truly say I was often very hungry. Mr. Speaker, if I should ever conclude to doff whatever our Democratic friends may suppose there is of black cockade federalism about me, and thereupon they shall take me up as their candidate for the Presidency, I protest they shall not make fun of me, as they have of General Cass, by attempting to write me into a military hero." (Great laughter.)

Ah, my friends, what a blessed thing for the country it would have been if President Lincoln had only "recked his own rede;" if, after he became President, he had not made fun of himself by attempting to play the part of a military hero? Why, it is hardly too much to say that if he had never undertaken to direct and control the course of our armies, if he had not so rashly interfered with the movements of at least one of our generals, Richmond might have been taken, and the war triumphantly terminated, long before this time. You all know the General to whom I refer, and the circumstances of that interference. (Cheers.)

GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S CAREER AND MERITS.

Indeed the whole career of our noble candidate, is fresh in the minds and hearts of the whole American people. You have followed the story, I doubt not, as admirably narrated by my accomplished and excellent friend, Mr. Hillard. You have traced him through that memorable campaign in Mexico, and have not forgotten his gallantry at Contreras, where like Washington at Braddock's defeat, he had two horses shot under him, but came off substantially unharmed. (Cheers.) You have accompanied him on his visit to the scene of the Crimean war, and have not forgotten his masterly report on the armies of Europe. (Applause.) You have followed him in that glorious little pioneer campaign in Western Virginia, at the outbreak of the rebellion, and have not forgotten the brilliant victories by which that campaign was crowned. (Applause.) You have seen him assume the command of the whole forces of the Union, and have not forgotten with what devotion, and with what consumate skill, he organized the grand Army of the Potomac. (Applause.) You have followed him through that terrible Peninsular campaign. (Cheers.) You have accompanied him through these fearful seven days of agony and glory. (Cheers.) You have seen how cruelly he was thwarted and stripped of his troops on the right hand and on the left, and you have not forgotten how bravely he bore up under all the grievous disappointments to which he was subjected. You have seen him assuming command again at the solicitation of the President, at an hour of the greatest peril to our capital and our county—reorganizing as by magic the brave but broken battalions of the Army of the Potomac, and achieving the glorious victory of Antietam on the very birthday of the Constitution. (Immense cheering.) And you have not failed to read his admirable dispatch from Harrison's Landing, his brilliant oration at West Point, and his noble letter accepting the nomination for the presidency. (Cheers.) No words of mine, no words of anybody could add anything to such a record. No words of his enemies can take away one jot or tittle from that record. I have no disposition to exaggerate his services or his merits, much less to disparage those of others. We all know that other commanders have done nobly, and have achieved victories which have entitled them to the honor and gratitude of the whole country. It has been their fortune, however, to be let alone. Many of them, too, are still in the field, privileged still to lead the armies and fight the battles of their country, instead of being unjustly deprived of their command and inexorably doomed to inaction. There will be an opportunity for doing full justice to their deserts hereafter. But what can be more fit, than for the people of the United States now to take up this young and gallant leader whom the rulers have so wantonly rejected, and to place him where his experience and abilities may be turned to account for the rescue of his country? In the full vigor of manhood, without a stain or a shade upon his character, a man of virtuous life and Christian principle, brave, prudent, patriotic, a stranger to all mere party politics a perfect stranger to anything like political management or political intrigue, one who has known how to command a great army and has never forgotten how to command himself, with no pledges on his lips or in his heart, except to the enforcement of the laws, the vindication of the Constitution, and the restoration of the Union;—what is there wanting in him to attract the confidence and support of all loyal men, and to secure the respect and admiration even of his enemies? (Loud and continued cheering.) Let me not forget, however, to remind you, my friends, that he has in his veins, in common with so many of you, and in common, as I am glad to remember, with myself, too, a little good old Connecticut blood, coming down from an ancestor who settled here a century ago. I am sure you will not think any the worse of him for that. (Cheers.)

A BIT OF TESTIMONY FROM THE SOUTH.

I fear, my friends, that I have already detained you too long. My own strength, certainly, will hardly hold out longer, even if your indulgence and your patience be not already exhausted. But I must not take my leave of you without giving you a little piece of testimony of the highest interest and importance. Among the refugees from Atlanta, immediately after its capture, there came within our lines not many days ago a person of the most estimable and excellent character, who had enjoyed the best opportunities of understanding the southern heart. And what said he, do you think, on being interrogated as to the prospects of the future? I can give you his remarks from the most authentic source. They were communicated to me by a good friend of the Union in one of the border states. "If Mr. Lincoln is re-elected," said he, "the people of the South will fight for thirty years, for they feel that they can do nothing better, but if McClellan is elected, such an overwhelming Union party will be formed in the South, that peace will be the almost immediate result." ("That's so." Loud cheers.) "I speak," said he, "the sentiments of the people, not the officials. The leaders of the rebellion are anxious for the re-election of Mr. Lincoln, as giving most hope of the ultimate success of the rebel cause. But the people," he added, "respect McClellan, and believe in his honesty, capacity, and patriotism; and, being heartily tired of the war, they will be willing to trust him." (Cheers.) Such is the latest and most authentic testimony from the very heart of the Southern Confederacy. It was communicated to me from a source entitled to the highest confidence, and it concurs, I need hardly say, with every opinion which I have been able to form for myself. I do firmly and honestly believe that, if by the aid of this good old State of Connecticut, George Brinton McClellan shall be proclaimed President of the United States of America on the 4th day of March next, as I hope and trust he may be (cheers), another year will not have expired without witnessing the final termination of the rebellion; and that the succeeding 4th of July will find us celebrating such a jubilee as has not been seen since that day was first hailed as the birthday of American independence. (Continued cheering.) I do not forget the danger of indulging in these ninety-days, or even twelve-months prophecies. ("That's so, too," and laughter.) I do not forget how many memorable warnings we have had of their fallacy. I can only say, that in that hope, in that trust, in that firm and unswerving confidence, I shall give my vote to the candidate of the Democratic party; and whether that vote shall prove to have been cast with the many or with the few, with majorities or with minorities, I shall feel that I have followed the dictates of my own best judgment, of my own conscientious convictions of duty, and of my own unalterable attachment and devotion to the Constitution and the Union of my country. (Loud cheering.)

DO NOT DESPAIR OF THE REPUBLIC.

I will not undertake to calculate the chances of success. The results of the late elections seem to decide nothing, except that the great battle is still to be fought, and that a victory is still within our reach. But whatever may be the results of the election, let us resolve never to despair of the republic. We are on the eve of one of the most memorable anniversaries in our history as a nation. Eighty-three years ago to morrow, on the 19th of October, 1781, the soil of Virginia was the scene of a far different spectacle from that which it unhappily witnesses at this hour. The soldiers of the North and of the South, instead of confronting each other in deadly strife, were then standing triumphantly side by side, under the glorious lead of Washington, to receive the final surrender of the forces which had been so long arrayed against our national independence. Would to Heaven that the precious memories of that event might be once more revived in every American heart! Would to Heaven that even now the associations of that day might overpower and disarm the unnatural hostility of our adversaries, and that the soldiers of the North and South might be seen like the soldiers in the old Roman story, rushing into each other's embrace under the old flag of our fathers! But even if such a result is to be longer, and still longer, and still longer postponed, let us never despair that such a day of final surrender will come; a day when rebellion will be everywhere suppressed and extinguished; a day when a policy of Christian statesmanship, breathing something better than threatenings and slaughter, and based upon a juster idea than that the whole southern people are barbarians and outlaws, shall accomplish its legitimate work of restoring Union and peace to our afflicted land—a day when, by the blessing of God, that glorious vision of Daniel Webster may again be verified for us and for our children, from Lake Superior to the Gulf of Mexico, and from ocean to ocean: "One country, one Constitution, one destiny." (Enthusiastic cheers.) And when that day shall come, I can desire for myself no other distinction than to be thought not unworthy of some humble share in that inscription which was engraved on the old tomb of my ancestors two centuries and a half ago—before New London, before even Boston, had a name or a local habitation on the American continent — "Beati Sunt Pacifici,"—blessed are the peace-makers. I can desire no other distinction for myself, than to be remembered among those who, in the words of our noble candidate, "would hail with unbounded joy the permanent restoration of peace on the basis of the Union under the Constitution, without the effusion of another drop of blood." (Loud and continued applause.)

The chairman said: My friends, I know you are anxious to testify your approbation of the eloquent and statesmanlike speech to which you have just listened, I therefore call upon you as the best method of doing so to give three cheers for the speaker.

They were given enthusiastically. After three hearty cheers for McClellan, the meeting adjourned.

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S LETTER OF ACCEPTANCE.

ORANGE, NEW JERSEY,
September 8, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter informing me of my nomination by the Democratic National Convention, recently assembled at Chicago, as their candidate at the next election for President of the United States.

It is unnecessary for me to say to you that this nomination comes to me unsought.

I am happy to know that when the nomination was made the record of my public life was kept in view.

The effect of long and varied service in the army during war and peace, has been to strengthen and make indelible in my mind and heart the love and reverence for the Union, Constitution, laws, and flag of our country, impressed upon me in early youth.

These feelings have thus far guided the course of my life, and must continue to do so to its end.

The existence of more than one government over the region which once owned our flag is incompatible with the peace, the power, and the happiness of the people.

The preservation of our Union was the sole avowed object for which the war was commenced. It should have been conducted for that object only, and in accordance with those principles which I took occasion to declare when in active service.

Thus conducted, the work of reconciliation would have been easy, and we might have reaped the benefits of our many victories on land and sea.

The Union was originally formed by the exercise of a spirit of conciliation and compromise. To restore and preserve it, the same spirit must prevail in our councils, and in the hearts of the people.

The reëstablishment of the Union in all its integrity is, and must continue to be, the indispensable condition in any settlement. So soon as it is clear, or even probable, that our present adversaries are ready for peace, upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilized nations, and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interests of the country, to secure such peace, reëstablish the Union, and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace — we ask no more.

Let me add, what I doubt not was, although unexpressed, the sentiment of the Convention, as it is of the people they represent, that when any one State is willing to return to the Union, it should be received at once, with a full guarantee of all its constitutional rights.

If a frank, earnest, and persistent effort to obtain those objects should fail, the responsibility for ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards.

I could not look in the face of my gallant comrades of the army and navy, who have survived so many bloody battles, and tell them that their labors and the sacrifice of so many of our slain and wounded brethren had been in vain; that we had abandoned that Union for which we have so often periled our lives.

A vast majority of our people, whether in the army and navy or at home, would, as I would, hail with unbounded joy the permanent restoration of peace, on the basis of the Union under the Constitution, without the effusion of another drop of blood. But no peace can be permanent without Union.

As to the other subjects presented in the resolutions of the Convention, I need only say that I should seek, in the Constitution of the United States and the laws framed in accordance therewith, the rule of my duty, and the limitations of executive power; endeavor to restore economy in public expenditure, reëstablish the supremacy of law, and, by the operation of a more vigorous nationality, resume our commanding position among the nations of the earth.

The condition of our finances, the depreciation of the paper money, and the burdens thereby imposed on labor and capital, show the necessity of a return to a sound financial system; while the rights of citizens, and the rights of States, and the binding authority of law over President, army, and people, are subjects of not less vital importance in war than in peace.

Believing that the views here expressed are those of the Convention and the people you represent, I accept the nomination.

I realize the weight of the responsibility to be borne should the people ratify your choice.

Conscious of my own weakness, I can only seek fervently the guidance of the Ruler of the universe, and, relying on His all-powerful aid, do my best to restore union and peace to a suffering people, and to establish and guard their liberties and rights,

I am, gentlemen,
very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

Hon. HORATIO SEYMOUR,
and others, Committee.

General McClellan's Views of the War and the Country.

The Harrison's Bar Letter.

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
Camp near Harrison's Landing, Va., July 7, 1862.

MR. PRESIDENT: You have been fully informed that the rebel army is in our front, with the purpose of overwhelming us by attacking our positions, or reducing us by blockading our river communications. I cannot but regard our condition as critical; and I earnestly desire in view of possible contingencies, to lay before your Excellency, for your private consideration, my general views concerning the existing state of the rebellion, although they do not strictly relate to the situation of this army, or strictly come within scope of my official duties. These views amount to convictions; and are deeply impressed upon my mind and heart. Our cause must never be abandoned; it is the cause of free institutions and self-government. The Constitution and the Union must be preserved, whatever may be the cost in time, treasure or blood. If secession is successful, other dissolutions are clearly to be seen in the future. Let neither military disaster, political faction, or foreign war, shake your settled purpose to enforce the equal operation of the laws of the United States upon the people of every State.

The time has come when the Government must determine upon a civil and military policy covering the whole ground of our national trouble. The responsibility of determining, declaring, and supporting such civil and military policy, and of directing the whole course of national affairs in regard to the rebellion must now be assumed and exercised by you, or our cause will be lost. The Constitution gives you power sufficient even for the present terrible exigency.

This rebellion has assumed the character of war; as such it should be regarded; and it should be conducted upon the highest principles known to Christian civilization. It should not be a war looking to the subjugation of the people of any State, in any event. It should not be at all a war upon population, but against armed forces and political organizations. Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organizations of States, or forcible abolition of slavery, should be contemplated for a moment. In prosecuting the war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject only to the necessity of military operations. All private property, taken for military use, should be paid or receipted for; pillage and waste should be treated as high crimes; all unnecessary trespass sternly prohibited, and offensive demeanor by the military towards citizens promptly rebuked. Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist; and oaths not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. Military government should be confined to the preservation of public order, and the protection of political rights. Military power should not be allowed to interfere with the relations of servitude, either by supporting or impairing the authority of the master, except for suppressing disorder, as in other cases. Slaves contraband under the act of Congress, seeking military protection, should receive it. The right of the Government to appropriate permanently to its own service claims to slave labor, should be asserted; and the right of the owner to compensation therefor should be recognized.

This principle might be extended, upon grounds of military necessity and security, to all the slaves within a particular State; thus working manumission in such State; and in Missouri, perhaps in Western Virginia also, and possibly even in Maryland, the expediency of such a measure is only a question of time.

A system of policy thus constitutional and conservative, and pervaded by the influences of Christianity and freedom, would receive the support of almost all truly loyal men; would deeply impress the rebel masses and all foreign nations, and it might be humbly hoped that it would commend itself to the favor of the Almighty.

Unless the principles governing the future conduct of our struggle shall be made known and approved, the effort to obtain requisite forces will be almost hopeless. A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our present armies.

The policy of the Government must be supported by concentration of military power. The national forces should not be dispersed in expeditions, posts of occupation and numerous armies; but should be mainly collected into masses, and brought to bear upon the armies of the Confederate States. Those armies thoroughly defeated, the political structure which they support will soon cease to exist.

In carrying out any system of policy which you may form, you will require a commander-in-chief of the army: one who posesses your confidence, understands your views, and who is competent to execute your orders by directing the military forces of the nation to the accomplishment of the objects by you proposed. I do not ask that place for myself. I am willing to serve you in such position as you may assign me, and I will do so as faithfully as ever subordinate served superior.

I may be on the brink of eternity; and as I hope for forgiveness from my Maker, I have written this letter with sincerity towards you and from love of my country.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
G. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

HENRY CLAY.

EXTRACT FROM A SPEECH OF THE HON. HENRY CLAY, IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, ON THE SUBJECT OF ABOLITION PETITIONS, FEBRUARY 7, 1839.

"Sir, — I am not in the habit of speaking lightly of the possibility of dissolving this happy Union. The Senate knows that I have deprecated allusions, on ordinary occasions, to that direful event. The country will testify, that, if there be anything in the history of my public career worthy of recollection, it is the truth and sincerity of my ardent devotion to its lasting preservation. But we should be false in our allegiance to it if we did not discriminate between the imaginary and the real dangers by which it may be assisted. Abolition should no longer be regarded as an imaginary danger. The Abolitionists, let me suppose, succeed in their present aims of uniting the inhabitants of the Free States as one man, against the inhabitants of the Slave States. Union on the one side will beget union on the other. And this process of reciprocal consolidation will be attended with all the violent prejudices, imbittered passions, and implacable animosities which ever degraded or deformed human nature. A virtual dissolution of the Union will have already taken place, whilst the form of its existence remains. The most valuable element of union, mutual kindness, the feelings of sympathy, the fraternal bonds, which now happily unite us, will have been extinguished forever. One section will stand in menacing and hostile array against the other. The collision of opinion will be quickly followed by the clash of arms. I will not attempt to describe scenes which now lie happily concealed from our view. Abolitionists themselves would shrink back in dismay and horror at the contemplation of desolated fields, conflagrated cities, murdered inhabitants, and the overthrow of the fairest fabric of human government that ever rose to animate the hopes of civilized man. Nor should these Abolitionists flatter themselves, that, if they can succeed in their object of uniting the Free States, they will enter the contest with a numerical superiority that must insure victory. All history and experience proves the hazard and uncertainty of war; and we are admonished by Holy Writ, "that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong." But if they were to conquer, whom would they conquer? A foreign foe? one that had invaded our shores, insulted our flag, and laid our country waste? No, sir; no, sir. It would be a contest without laurels, without glory, — a self, a suicidal conquest, — a conquest of brothers over brothers, — achieved by one over another portion of the descendants of common ancestors, who, nobly pledging their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, had fought and bled, side by side, in many a hard battle on land and ocean, severed our country from the British crown, and established our national independence.

The inhabitants of the Slave States are sometimes accused by their Northern brethren with displaying too much rashness and sensibility to the operations and proceedings of Abolitionists. But, before they can be rightly judged, there should be a reversal of conditions. Let me suppose that the people of the Slave States were to form societies, subsidize presses, make large pecuniary contributions, send forth numerous missionaries throughout all their own borders, and enter into machinations to burn the beautiful capitals, destroy the productive manufactories, and sink into the ocean the gallant ships of the Northern States. Would these incendiary proceedings be regarded as neighborly, and friendly, and consistent with the fraternal sentiments which should ever be cherished by one portion of the Union towards another? Would they excite no emotion, occasion no manifestations of dissatisfaction, nor lead to any acts of retaliatory violence? But the supposed case falls far short of the actual one, in a most essential circumstance. In no contingency could these capitals, manufactories, and ships rise in rebellion and massacre inhabitants of the Northern States.

"I am, Mr. President, no friend of slavery. The Searcher of all hearts knows that every pulsation of mine beats high and strong in the cause of civil liberty. Whenever it is safe and practicable I desire to see every portion of the human family in the enjoyment of it. But I prefer the liberty of my own country to that of any other people; and the liberty of my own race to that of any other race. The liberty of the descendants of Africa in the United States is incompatible with the safety and liberty of the European descendants. Their slavery forms an exception — an exception resulting from a stern and inexorable necessity — to the general liberty in the United States. We did not originate, nor are we responsible for, this necessity. Their liberty, if it were possible, could only be established by violating the incontestable powers of the States, and subverting the Union. And beneath the ruins of the Union would be buried, sooner or later, the liberty of both races."

THE MEANEST MAN IN CREATION.

We ask the attention of readers to the following extract from Judge Abbott's late speech at Boston: —

Let me ask for a moment who these men are who denounce those who appeal to the better part of man's nature? For twenty years past they have endeavored to destroy the Union; year in and year out they have denounced the glorious Constitution — the ark of our safety, as "a covenant with death and an agreement with hell;" who have scouted at and denounced the Union as it was and the Constitution as it is, and these are the men who denounce you and me. They don't want the Union. They are the men who have talked about war, war that is to last always, but who never have and never will risk a hair of their own miserable heads. When they talk of war they mean to risk the lives of your children and mine, while they remain at home. They belong to the class you have heard of before, who are willing to sacrifice all their wives' relations, and even consent to sacrifice their first cousins in the war, but not a mother's son of them will even get within the sound of a bullet.

They are the men who get your children and mine under false pretences — not for the Constitution, but for the negro. When they have got of us all they can get, — thank God they can get no more of mine, — their patriotism expends itself in buying negroes, and in sending to Germany for recruits to fight in a war they don't care anything about. Do you — I mean to be plain — do you want to know who is the meanest, most despicable creature, animal — I'll not call him man — who crawls? I'll tell you.

Voices — Wilson! Sumner!

Abbott — Gentlemen, don't call names. I'll describe a class. It is the man who constantly appeals to the worst passions of our nature; who is constantly urging us to battle, and who has not courage, ability, or capacity to risk a hair of his own head. You think of that, and when you have found such a man, you have found one of the most miserable wretches who crawls. That is one class. There is another. They who are constantly denouncing us if we say a word for peace and Union. If you ask these men to turn their pockets inside out, you will find them stuffed with "greenbacks," the spoils of your industry and mine. They want war because it means power and spoils. Of course these patent patriots don't want to end the war. These are the men who find fault with us because we want to restore the Union.

WATCHWORDS FOR PATRIOTS.

MOTTOES FOR THE CAMPAIGN, SELECTED FROM GENERAL McCLELLAN'S WRITINGS.

Our cause must never be abandoned; it is the cause of free institutions and self-government. — Harrison's Landing Letter.

We are fighting solely for the integrity of the Union, to uphold the power of our national government, and to restore to the nation the blessings of peace and good order. — Instructions to General Halleck, November 11, 1861.

You will please constantly to bear in mind the precise issue for which we are fighting; that issue is the preservation of the Union and the restoration of the full authority of the general government over all portions of our territory. — Instructions to General Buell, November 7, 1861.

We shall most readily suppress this rebellion and restore the authority of the government by religiously respecting the constitutional rights of all. — Instructions to General Buell, November 7, 1861.

Be careful so to treat the unarmed inhabitants as to contract, not widen, the breach existing between us and the rebels. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

I have always found that it is the tendency of subordinates to make vexatious arrrests on mere suspicion. — Instructions to General Buell, November 12, 1861.

Say as little as possible about politics or the negro. — Instructions to General Burnside, January 7, 1862.

The unity of this nation, the preservation of our institutions, are so dear to me that I have willingly sacrificed my private happiness with the single object of doing my duty to my country. — Letter to Secretary Cameron, October, 1861.

The Constitution and the Union must be preserved, whatever may be the cost in time, treasure, or blood. — Harrison's Bar Letter.

Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organization of States, nor forcible abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a moment. — Letter to President Lincoln, July 7, 1862.

In prosecuting this war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject to the necessity of miltary operations. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist; and oaths, not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. — Letter to the President, July 7, 1862.

It should not be a war looking to the subjugation of the people of any State in any event. It should not be at all a war upon populations, but against armed forces and political organizations. — Harrison's Bar Letter.

If it is not deemed best to entrust me with the command even of my own army, I simply ask to be permitted to share their fate on the field of battle. — Despatch to General Halleck, August 30, 1862.

By pursuing the political course I have always advised, it is possible to bring about a permanent restoration of the Union — a re-union by which the rights of both sections shall be preserved, and by which both parties shall preserve their self-respect, while they respect each other. — General McClellan's Report.

I am devoutly grateful to God that my last campaign was crowned with a victory which saved the nation from the greatest peril it had then undergone. — General McClellan's Report.

At such a time as this, and in such a struggle, political partisanship should be merged in a true and brave patriotism, which thinks only of the good of the whole country. — General McClellan's West Point Oration.

A system of policy thus constitutional and conservative, and pervaded by the influences of Christianity and freedom, would receive the support of almost all truly loyal men, would deeply impress the rebel masses and all foreign nations, and it might be humbly hoped that it would commend itself to the favor of the Almighty. — Harrison's Bar Letter.
